PREFACE.

That the Proceedings and Debates of both branches of the Congress of the United States have been, until recently, very imperfectly reported, is now pretty generally acknowledged with regret and surprise. The Senate has been peculiarly unfortunate in this respect. No copious and authentic record of its debates up to the commencement of the last Congress, is any where to be found; and all that now remains is a meagre, and often an erroneous sketch, of the discussions which have taken place, during that period of the existence of one of the most important deliberative bodies in the world. This is not, of course, the place to speak of the causes which have deprived us of full and accurate reports of the Senate, or of the evils of that deprivation. The fact is merely stated, in order to introduce a very brief explanation, of the circumstances which led to the production of this volume.

Struck by the remarkable neglect with which the debates of the Senate appeared to be treated by the journals issued at the seat of the federal government, and anxious to contribute something towards supplying a remedy for the evil, I devised a plan of reporting those debates, which was submitted to several of the oldest and most influential members of the body, nearly at the close of the second session of the last Congress. This plan proposed to give to the reports the utmost impartiality and fullness, together with the stamp of authoritative sanction. It met with approbation and was adopted.

The execution of the work was entered upon under some disadvantages. Circumstances prevented the engagement of a sufficient number of competent assistants; and the prompt publication of full and close reports was regarded by some of the Senators as being, perhaps, not always practicable, or, at all events, expedient. However, notwithstanding all difficulties and drawbacks, the work was performed throughout the past session in such a manner as to elicit the commendation of many of the most distinguished Senators, and all the leading daily journals out of the city of Washington. Many able arguments—many bursts of eloquence—many scintillations of genius, which otherwise would have perished in the hour of their birth, have by this means been preserved, while I have the satisfactory reflection to console me, in reviewing the result of many weary hours of anxious toil, that I have been instrumental in giving to the country an accurate and a complete record of conflicts and debates, which will never lose their interest so long as the great principles of justice, humanity and freedom, inspire the souls of men. At least, one important step has been taken towards the elevation of Congressional reporting to respectability and usefulness, and I have no fear that the movement in this important matter will, hereafter, be retrograde.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message from the House of Representatives was delivered by B. B. FRENCH, Esq., their Clerk:

Mr. President: I am directed to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled, and that ROBERT C. WINTHROP, one of the Representatives from the State of Massachusetts, has been chosen Speaker, and that the House is now ready to proceed to business.

The House of Representatives have passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the House is assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make; and Mr. HUNT and Mr. HOWELL COBB have been appointed the committee on their part.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SEVIER moved to take up the resolution from the House; which was agreed to.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. SEVIER observed, that it only provided for informing the President that a quorum of the House had assembled, instead of a quorum of both Houses. This was no doubt an inadvertence, and he therefore moved that the resolution be laid upon the table, for the purpose of offering another; which was agreed to.

Mr. SEVIER then submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, jointly with the committee appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of both Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

On motion it was Ordered, That the committee be appointed by the Vice President.

Messrs. SEVIER, MANGUM, and FAIRFIELD were appointed.

SAULT DE STE. MARIE.

Mr. CASS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to the Senate a copy of the report of the commissioners appointed to survey the Sault de Ste. Marie, in the State of Michigan, and of any other surveys and estimates which may have been made of that locality, in connexion with the claims to be found in the General Land Office.

NOTICE OF BILLS.

Mr. HANNEGAN gave notice that he should, on to-morrow, ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill for the relief of the heirs of John Paul Jones.

Mr. WESTCOTT gave notice that he should, on to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill further to carry into effect the provisions and stipulations of the 9th article of the Florida treaty, with respect to certain losses of Spanish subjects in West Florida.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on the part of the Senate, jointly with the Committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of each house has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make, reported, that they had performed the duty assigned them, and that the President stated that he would make a communication to each house forthwith.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. J. KNOX WALKER, his private secretary:

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The annual meeting of Congress is always an interesting event. The Representatives of the States and of the people come fresh from their constituents to take counsel together for the common good. After an existence of near three-fourths of a century as a free and independent republic, the problem no longer remains to be solved whether man is capable of self-government. The success of our admirable system is a conclusive refutation of the theories of those in other countries who maintain that "a favored few" are born to rule, and that the mass of mankind must be governed by force. Subject to no arbitrary or hereditary authority, the people are the only sovereigns recognized by our constitution. Numerous emigrants, of every lineage and language, attracted by the civil and religious freedom we enjoy, and by our happy condition, annually crowd to our shores, and transfer their heart, not less than their allegiance, to the country whose dominion belongs alone to the people.

No country has been so much favored, or should acknowledge with deeper reverence the manifestations of the Divine protection. An all-wise Creator directed and guarded us in our infant struggle for freedom, and has constantly watched over our surprising progress, until we have become one of the great nations of the earth.

It is in a country thus favored, and under a government in which the executive and legislative branches hold their authority for limited periods, alike from the people, and where all are responsible to their respective constituencies, that it is again my duty to communicate with Congress upon the state of the Union and the present condition of public affairs.

During the past year the most gratifying proofs are presented that our country has been blessed with a wide-spread and universal prosperity. There has been no period since the Government was founded, when all the industrial pursuits of our people have been more successful, or when labor in all branches of business has received a fairer or better reward. From our abundance we have been enabled to perform the pleasing duty of furnishing food for the starving millions of less favored countries.

In the enjoyment of the bounties of Providence at home, such as have rarely fallen to the lot of any people, it is cause of congratulation, that our intercourse with all the powers of the earth, except Mexico, continues to be of an amicable character.

It has ever been our cherished policy to cultivate peace and good will with all nations; and this policy has been steadily pursued by me.

No change has taken place in our relations with Mexico since the adjournment of the last Congress. The war in which the United States were forced to engage with the government of that country still continues.

I deem it unnecessary after the full exposition of them contained in my message of the eleventh of May, 1846, and in my annual message at the commencement of the session of Congress in December last, to reiterate the serious causes of the complaint which we had against Mexico before she commenced hostilities.

It is sufficient on the present occasion to say, that the wanton violation of the person and property of our citizens committed by Mexico, her repeated acts of bad faith, through a long series of years, and her disregard of solemn treaties, stipulating for indemnity to our injured citizens, not only constituted ample cause of war on our part, but were of such an aggravated character as would have justified us before the whole world in resorting to this extreme remedy. With an anxious desire to avoid a rupture between the two countries, we forebore for years to assert our clear rights by force, and continued to seek redress for the wrongs we had suffered by amicable negotiation, in the hope that Mexico might yield to pacific councils and the demands of justice. In this hope we were disappointed. Our minister of peace sent to Mexico was insultingly rejected. The Mexican government refused even to hear the terms of adjustment which he was authorized to propose; and finally, under wholly unjustifiable pretexts, involved the two countries in war, by invading the territory of the State of Texas, striking the first blow, and shedding the blood of our citizens on our own soil.

Though the United States were the aggrieved nation, Mexico commenced the war, and we were compelled, in self-defence, to repel the invader, and to vindicate the national honor and interests by prosecuting it with vigor until we could obtain a just and honorable peace. On learning that hostilities had been commenced by Mexico, I promptly communicated that fact, accompanied with a sufficient statement of our causes of complaint against Mexico, to Congress; and that body, by the act of the thirteenth of May, 1846, declared that "by the act of the republic of Mexico, a state of war exists between that government and the United States,"—this act declaring "the war to exist by the act of the republic of Mexico," and making provision for its prosecution "to a speedy and successful termination," was passed with great unanimity by Congress, there being but two negative votes in the Senate, and but fourteen in the House of Representatives.

The existence of the war having thus been declared by Congress, it became my duty, under the constitution and the laws, to conduct and prosecute it. This duty has been performed; and though, at every stage of its progress, I have manifested a willingness to terminate it by a just peace, Mexico has refused to accede to any terms which could be accepted by the United States, consistently with the national honor and interest.

The rapid and brilliant successes of our arms, and the vast extent of the enemy's territory which had been overrun and conquered, before the close of the last session of Congress, were fully known to that body. Since that time, the war has been prosecuted with increased energy, and I am gratified to state, with a success which commands universal admiration. History presents no parallel of so many glorious victories achieved by any nation within so short a period. Our army, regulars and volunteers, have covered themselves with imperishable honors. Whenever and wherever our forces have encountered the enemy, though he was in vastly superior numbers, and often entrenched in fortified positions of his own selection, and of great strength, he has been defeated. Too much praise cannot be bestowed upon our officers and men, regulars and volunteers, for their gallantry, discipline, indomitable courage and perseverance, all seeking the post of danger, and vieing with each other in deeds of noble daring.

While every patriot's heart must exult, and a just national pride animate every bosom, in beholding the high proofs of courage, consummate military skill, steady dicipline, and humanity to the vanquished enemy, exhibited by our gallant army, the nation is called to mourn over the loss of many brave officers and soldiers who have fallen in defence of their country's honor and interests. The brave dead met their melancholy fate in a foreign land, nobly discharging their duty, and with their country's flag waving triumphantly in the face of the foe. Their patriotic deeds are justly appreciated, and will long be remembered by their grateful countrymen. The parental care of the government they loved and served should be extended to their surviving families.

Shortly after the adjournment of the last session of Congress, the gratifying intelligence was received of the signal victory of Buena Vista and of the fall of the city of Vera Cruz, and with it the strong castle of San Juan de Ulloa, by which it was defended. Believing that after these and other successes, so honorable to our arms and so disasterous to Mexico, the period was propitious to afford her another opportunity, if they thought proper to embrace it, to enter into negotiations for peace, a commissioner was appointed to proceed to the headquarters of our army, with full powers to enter upon negotiations, and to conclude a just and honorable treaty of peace. He was not directed to make any new overtures of peace, but was the bearer of a despatch from the Secretary of State of the United States, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Mexico, in reply to one received from the latter of the twenty-second of February, 1847, in which the Mexican government was informed of his appointment, and of his presence at the headquarters of our army, and that he was invested with full powers to conclude a definitive treaty of peace, whenever the Mexican government might signify a desire to do so. While I was unwilling to subject the United States to another indignant refusal, I was yet resolved that the evils of the war should not be protracted a day longer than might be rendered absolutely necessary by the Mexican government.

Care was taken to give no instructions to the commissioner which could in any way interfere with our military operations, or relax our energies in the prosecution of the war. He possessed no authority in any manner to control these operations. He was authorized to exhibit his instructions to the General in command of the army, and in the event of a treaty being concluded and ratified on the part of Mexico, he was directed to give him notice of that fact. On the happening of such a contingency, and on receiving notice thereof, the general in command was instructed by the Secretary of War to suspend further active military operations until further orders. These instructsons were with a view to intermit hostilities until the treaty, thus ratified by Mexico, could be transmitted to Washington, and receive the action of the government of the United States.

The commissioner was also directed, on reaching the army, to deliver to the general in command the despatch which he bore from the Secretary of State to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Mexico, and on receiving it, the General was instructed by the Secretary of War, to cause it to be transmitted to the commander of the Mexican forces, with a request that it might be communicated to his government.

The commissioner did not reach the headquarters of the army until after another brilliant victory had crowned our arms at Cerro Gordo.

The despatch which he bore from the Secretary of War to the general in command of the army was received by that officer, then at Jalapa, on the seventh day of May, 1847, together with the despatch from the Secretary of State to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Mexico; having been transmitted to him from Vera Cruz. The commissioner arrived at the headquarters of the army a few days afterwards. His presence with the army and his diplomatic character were made known to the Mexican government, from Puebla, on the twelfth of June, 1847, by the transmission of the despatch from the Secretary of State to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Mexico.

Many weeks elapsed after its receipt, and no overtures were made, nor any desire expressed by the Mexican government to enter into negotiations for peace.

Our army pursued its march upon the capital, and, as it approached it, was met by formidable resistance. Our forces first encountered the enemy, and achieved signal victories in the severely contested battles of Contreras and Churubusco. It was not until after these actions had resulted in decisive victories, and the capital of the enemy was within our power, that the Mexican government manifested any disposition to enter into negotiations for peace; and even then, as events have proved, there is too much reason to believe they were insincere, and that in agreeing to go through the forms of negetiation, the object was to gain time to strengthen the defences of their capital, and to prepare for fresh resistance.

The general in command of the army deemed it expedient to suspend hostilities temporarily, by entering into an armistice with a view to the opening of negotiations. Commissioners were appointed on the part of Mexico to meet the commissioner on the part of the United States. The result of the conferences which took place between these functionaries of the two governments was a failure to conclude a treaty of peace.

The commissioner of the United States took with him the project of a treaty already prepared, by the terms of which the indemnity required by the United States, was a cession of territory.

It is well known that the only indemnity which it is in the power of Mexico to make in satisfaction of the just and long deferred claims of our citizens against her, and the only means by which she can reimburse the United States for the expenses of the war, is a cession to the United States of a portion of her territory Mexico has no money to pay, and no other means of making the required indemnity. If we refuse this, we can obtain nothing else. To reject indemnity, by refusing to accept a cession of territory, would be to abandon all our just demands, and to wage the war, bearing all its expenses, without a purpose or definite object.

A state of war abrogates treaties previously existing between the belligerents, and a treaty of peace puts an end to all claims for indemnity for tortious acts committed under the authority of one government against the citizens or subjects of another, unless they are provided for in its stipulations. A treaty of peace which would terminate the existing war, without providing for indemnity, would enable Mexico—the acknowledged debtor, and herself the aggressor in the war—to relieve herself from her just liabilities. By such a treaty, our citizens who hold just demands against her, would have no remedy either against Mexico or their own government. Our duty to these citizens must forever prevent such a peace, and no treaty which does not provide ample means of discharging these demands can receive my sanction.

A treaty of peace should settle all existing differences between the two countries. If an adequate cession of territory should be made by such a treaty, the United States should release Mexico from all her liabilities, and assume their payment to our own citizens. If, instead of this, the United States were to consent to a treaty by which Mexico should again engage to pay the heavy amount of indebtedness which a just indemnity to our government and our citizens would impose on her, it is notorious that she does not possess the means to meet such an undertaking. From such a treaty no result could be anticipated, but the same irritating disappointments which have heretofore attended the violation of similar treaty stipulations on the part of Mexico. Such a treaty would be but a temporary cessation of hostilities, without the restoration of the friendship and good understanding which should characterize the future intercourse between the two countries.

That Congress contemplated the acquisition of territorial indemnity, when that body made provision for the prosecution of the war, is obvious. Congress could not have meant—when, in May, 1846, they appropriated ten millions of dollars, and authorised the President to employ the militia and naval and military forces of the United States, and to accept the services of fifty thousand volunteers to enable him to prosecute the war; and when, at their last session, and after our army had invaded Mexico, they made additional appropriations, and authorised the raising of additional troops for the same purpose—that no indemnity was to be obtained from Mexico at the conclusion of the war; and yet, it was certain, that if no Mexican territory was acquired, no indemnity could be obtained.

It is further manifest that Congress contemplated territorial indemnity, from the fact, that at their last session, an act was passed upon the Executive to recommend an appropriation for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the [illegible] with that object. The appropriation was made "to enable the President to conclude a treaty of peace, limits and boundaries with the Republic of Mexico, to be used by him in the event that said treaty, when signed by the authorised agents of the two governments, and duly ratified by Mexico, shall call for the expenditure of the same, or any part thereof." The object of asking this appropriation was distinctly stated in the several messages on the subject which I communicated to Congress. Similar appropriations, made in 1803 and 1806, which were referred to, were intended to be applied in part consideration for the cession of Louisiana and the Floridas. In like manner, it was anticipated, that, in settling the terms of a treaty of "limits and boundaries" with Mexico, a cession of territory, estimated to be of greater value than the amount of our demands against her, might be obtained, and [illegible] in part consideration for the territory ceded, on the conclusion of a treaty, and its ratification on her part—might be an inducement with her to make such a cession of territory as would be satisfactory to the United States. And although the future may not have developed what is rendered it unnecessary to use any part of the three millions of dollars appropriated by that act, and the entire sum remains in the treasury, it is still applicable to that object, should the contingency [illegible] happen.

The doctrine of no territory is the doctrine of no indemnity; and, if sanctioned, would be a public acknowledgement that our country has [illegible] in vain, and [illegible] to Congress and the people, a [illegible] admission unfounded in fact, and degrading to the national character.

The terms of the treaty proposed by the United States, were not only just to Mexico, but, considering the character and amount of our claims, the unparalleled and unprovoked commencement of hostilities by her, the expenses of the war to which we have been subjected, and the successes which attended our arms, were deemed to be of a most liberal character.

The commissioner of the United States was authorized to agree to the establishment of the Rio Grande as the boundary, from its entrance into the Gulf to its intersection with the southern boundary of New Mexico, in north latitude about thirty-two degrees, and to obtain a cession to the United States of the provinces of New Mexico and the Californias, and the privilege of the right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. The boundary of the Rio Grande, and the cession to the United States of New Mexico and Upper California, constituted an ultimatum which our commissioner was, under no circumstances, to yield.

That it might be manifested not only to Mexico, but to all other nations, that the United States were not disposed to take advantage of a hostile power, by insisting upon wresting from her all the other provinces, including many of her principal towns and cities, which we had conquered and held in our military occupation, but were willing to conclude a treaty in a spirit of liberality, our commissioner was authorized to stipulate for the restoration to Mexico of all our other conquests.

As the territory to be acquired by the boundary proposed might be estimated to be of greater value than a fair equivalent for our just demands, our commissioner was authorized to stipulate for the payment of such additional pecuniary consideration as was deemed reasonable.

The terms of a treaty proposed by the Mexican commissioners were wholly inadmissible. They negotiated as if Mexico were the victorious, and not the vanquished party. They must have known that their ultimatum could never be accepted. It required the United States to dismember Texas, by surrendering to Mexico that part of the territory of that State lying between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, included within her limits by her laws when she was an independent republic, and when she was annexed to the United States and admitted by Congress as one of the States of our Union. It contained no provision for the payment by Mexico of the just claims of our citizens. It required indemnity to Mexican citizens for injuries they have sustained by our troops in the prosecution of the war. It demanded the right for Mexico to levy and collect the Mexican tariff of duties on goods imported into her ports while in our military occupation during the war, and the owners of which had paid to officers of the United States the military contributions which had been levied upon them; and it offered to cede to the United States, for a pecuniary consideration, that part of Upper California lying north of latitude thirty-seven degrees. Such were the unreasonable terms proposed by the Mexican commissioners.

The session to the United States by Mexico, of the provinces of New Mexico and the Californias, as proposed by the commissioner of the United States, it was believed, would be more in accordance with the convenience and interests of both nations, than any other [illegible] which Mexico could be induced to make.

It is manifest to all who have observed the actual condition of the Mexican government, for some years past, and at present, that if these provinces should be retained by her, she could not long continue to hold and govern them. Mexico is too feeble a power to govern these provinces, lying as they do at a distance of more than a thousand miles from her capital; and, if attempted to be retained by her, they would constitute but for a short time, even nominally, a part of her dominions.

This would be especially the case with Upper California. The sagacity of powerful European nations has long since directed their attention to the commercial importance of that province, and there can be little doubt that the moment the United States shall relinquish their present occupation of it, and their claim to it as indemnity, an effort will be made by some foreign power to possess it, either by conquest or by purchase. If no foreign government should either by conquest or by purchase. If no foreign government should either by conquest or be in either of these modes, an independent revolutionary government would probably be established by the inhabitants, and such foreigners as may remain in or remove to the country, as soon as it shall be known that the United States have abandoned it. Such a government would be too feeble long to maintain its separate independent existence, and would finally become annexed to, or be a dependent colony of, some more powerful State.

Should any foreign government attempt to possess it as a colony, or otherwise to incorporate it with itself, the principle avowed by President Monroe, in 1824, and reaffirmed in my first annual message, that no foreign power shall, with our consent, be permitted to plant or establish any new colony or dominion on any part of the North American continent, must be maintained. In maintaining this principle, and in resisting its invasion by any foreign power, we might be involved in other wars more expensive and more difficult than that in which we are now engaged.

The provinces of New Mexico and the Californias are contiguous to the territories of the United States, and if brought under the government of our laws, their resources—mineral, agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial—would soon be developed.

Upper California is bounded on the north by our Oregon possessions; and if held by the United States, would soon be settled by an hardy, enterprising, and intelligent portion of our population. The bay of San Francisco, and other harbors along the California coast, would afford shelter for our navy, for our numerous whale ships, and other merchant vessels employed in the Pacific ocean, and would in a short period become the marts of an extensive and profitable commerce with China, and other countries of the East.

These advantages, in which the whole commercial world would participate, would at once be secured to the United States by the cession of this territory; while it is certain that as long as it remains a part of the Mexican dominions, they can be enjoyed neither by Mexico herself nor by any other nation.

New Mexico is a frontier province, and has never been of any considerable value to Mexico. From its locality, it is naturally connected with our western settlements. The territorial limits of the State of Texas, too, as defined by her laws, before her admission into our Union, embrace all that portion of New Mexico lying east of the Rio Grande, while Mexico still claims to hold this territory as a part of her dominions. The adjustment of this question of boundary is important.

There is another consideration which induced the belief that the Mexican government might even desire to place this province under the protection of the government of the United States.—Numerous bands of fierce and warlike savages wander over it, and upon its borders. Mexico has been, and must continue to be, too feeble to restrain them from committing depredations, robberies and murders, not only upon the inhabitants of New Mexico itself, but upon those of the other northern States of Mexico. It would be a blessing to all these northern States to have their citizens protected against them by the power of the United States. At this moment many Mexicans, principally females and children, are in captivity among them. If New Mexico were held and governed by the United States, we could effectually prevent these tribes from committing such outrages, and compel them to release these captives, and restore them to their families and friends.

In proposing to acquire New Mexico and the Californias, it was known that but an inconsiderable portion of the Mexican people would be transferred with them, the country embraced within these provinces being chiefly an uninhabited region.

These were the leading considerations which induced me to authorize the terms of peace which were proposed to Mexico. They were rejected; and, negotiations being at an end, hostilities were renewed. An assault was made by our gallant army upon the strongly fortified places near the city of Mexico and upon the city itself; and after several days of severe conflict, the Mexican forces—vastly superior in numbers to our own—were driven from the city, and it was occupied by our troops.

Immediately after information was received of the unfavorable result of the negotiations, believing that his continued presence with the army could be productive of no good, I determined to recall our commissioner. A despatch to this effect was transmitted to him on the sixth of October last. The Mexican government will be informed of his recall; and that, in the existing state of things, I shall not deem it proper to make any further overtures of peace, but shall be at all times ready to receive and consider any proposals which may be made by Mexico.

Since the liberal proposition of the United States was authorized to be made in April last, large expenditures have been incurred, and the precious blood of many of our patriotic fellow-citizens has been shed in the prosecution of the war. This consideration, and the obstinate perseverance of Mexico in protracting the war, must influence the terms of peace which it may be deemed proper hereafter to accept.

Our arms having been everywhere victorious, having subjected to our military occupation a large portion of the enemy's country, including his capital, and negotiations for peace having failed, the important questions arise, in what manner the war ought to be prosecuted? and what should be our future policy? I cannot doubt that we should secure and render available the conquests which we have already made; and that, with this view, we should hold and occupy, by our naval and military forces, all the ports, towns, cities, and provinces now in our occupation, or which may hereafter fall into our possession; that we should press forward our military operations, and levy such military contributions on the enemy, as may, as far as practicable, defray the future expenses of the war.

Had the government of Mexico acceded to the equitable and liberal terms proposed, that made at adjustment would have been preferred. Mexico having declined to do this, and failed to offer any other terms which could be accepted by the United States, the national honor, no less than the public interests, requires that the war should be prosecuted with increased energy and power, until a just and satisfactory peace can be obtained. In the meantime, as Mexico refuses all indemnity, we should adopt measures to indemnify ourselves, by appropriating permanently a portion of her territory. Early after the commencement of the war, New Mexico and the Californias were taken possession of by our forces. Our military and naval commanders were ordered to conquer and hold them, subject to be disposed of by a treaty of peace.

These provinces are now in our undisputed occupation, and have been so for many months, all resistance on the part of Mexico having ceased within their limits. I am satisfied that they should never be surrendered to Mexico. Should Congress concur with me in this opinion, and they should be retained by the United States as indemnity, I can perceive no good reason why the civil jurisdiction and laws of the United States should not at once be extended over them. To wait for a treaty of peace, such as we are willing to make, by which our relations towards them would not be changed, cannot be good policy; whilst our own interest, and that of the people inhabiting them, require that a stable, responsible and free government, under our authority, should, as soon as possible, be established over them. Should Congress, therefore, determine to hold these provinces permanently, and that they shall hereafter be considered as constituent parts of our country, the early establishment of territorial governments over them will be important for the more perfect protection of persons and property; and I recommend that such territorial governments be established. It will promote peace and tranquility among the inhabitants, by allaying all apprehension that they may still entertain of being again subjected to the jurisdiction of Mexico. I invite the early and favorable consideration of Congress to this important subject.

Besides New Mexico and the Californias, there are other Mexican provinces which have been reduced to our possession by conquest. These other Mexican provinces are now governed by our military and naval commanders, under the general authority which is conferred upon a conqueror by the laws of war. They should continue to be held as a means of coercing Mexico to accede to just terms of peace. Civil as well as military officers are required to conduct such a government. Adequate compensation, to be drawn from contributions levied on the enemy, should be fixed by law for such officers as may be thus employed. What further provision may become necessary, and what final disposition it may be proper to make to them, must depend on the future progress of the war, and the course which Mexico may think property hereafter to pursue.

With the views I entertain, I cannot favor the policy which has been suggested, either to withdraw our army altogether, or to retire to a designated line, and simply hold and defend it. To withdraw our army altogether from the conquests they have made by deeds of unparalleled bravery, and at the expense of so much blood and treasure, in a just war on our part, and one which, by the act of the enemy, we could not honorably have avoided, would be to degrade the nation in its own estimation and in that of the world.

To retire to a line, and simply hold and defend it, would not terminate the war. On the contrary, it would encourage Mexico to persevere, and tend to protract it indefinitely. It is not to be expected that Mexico, after refusing to establish such a line as a permanent boundary, when our victorious army are in possession of her capital, and in the heart of her country, would permit us to hold it without resistance. That she would continue the war, and in the most harrassing and annoying forms, there can be no doubt. A border warfare of the most savage character, extending over a long line, would be unceasingly waged. It would require a large army to be kept constantly in the field, stationed at posts and garrisons along such a line, to protect and defend it. The enemy, relieved from the pressure of our arms on his coasts and in the populous parts of the interior, would direct his attention to this line, and, selecting an isolated post for attack, would concentrate his forces upon it. This would be a condition of affairs which the Mexicans, pursuing their favorite system of guerrilla warfare, would probably prefer to any other. Were we to assume a defensive attitude on such a line, all the advantages of such a state of war would be on the side of the enemy. We could levy no contributions upon him, or in any other way make him feel the pressure of the war, but must remain inactive and await his approach, being in constant uncertainty at what point on the line, or at what time, he might make an assault. He may assemble and organize an overwhelming force in the interior, on his own side of the line, and, concealing his purpose, make a sudden assault upon some one of our posts so distant from any other as to prevent the possibility of timely succor or reinforcements; and in this way our gallant army would be exposed to the dangers of being cut off in detail; or if, by their unequalled bravery and prowess everywhere exhibited during this war, they should repulse the enemy, their numbers stationed at any one post may be too small to pursue him. If the enemy be repulsed in one attack, he would have nothing to do but to retreat to his own side of the line, and, being in no fear of a pursuing army, may reinforce himself at leisure, for another attack on the same or some other post. He may, too, cross the line between our posts, make rapid incursions into the country which we hold, murder the inhabitants, commit depredations on them, and then retreat to the interior before a sufficient force can be concentrated to pursue him. Such would probably be the harrassing character of a mere defensive war on our part. If our forces, when attacked, or threatened with attack, be permitted to cross the line, drive back the enemy, and conquer him, this would be again to invade the enemy's country, after having lost all the advantages of the conquests we have already made by having voluntarily abandoned them. To hold such a line successfully and in security, it is far from being certain that it would not require as large an army as would be necessary to hold all the conquests we have already made, and to continue the prosecution of the war in the heart of the enemy's country. It is also far from being certain that the expenses of the war would be diminished by such a policy.

I am persuaded that the best means of vindicating the national honor and interest, and of bringing the war to an honorable close, will be to prosecute it with increased energy and power in the vital parts of the enemy's country.

In my annual message to Congress of December last, I declared that "the war had not been waged with a view to conquest; but having been commenced by Mexico, it has been carried into the enemy's country, and will be vigorously prosecuted there, with a view to obtain an honorable peace, and thereby secure ample indemnity for the expenses of the war, as well as to our much injured citizens, who hold large pecuniary demands against Mexico." Such, in my judgment, continues to be our true policy—indeed, the only policy which will probably secure a permanent peace.

It has not been contemplated by me, as an object of the war, to make a permanent conquest of the republic of Mexico, or to annihilate her separate existence as an independent nation. On the contrary, it has ever been my desire that she should maintain her nationality, and, under a good government, adapted to her condition, be a free, independent, and prosperous republic. The United States were the first among the nations to recognize her independence, and have always desired to be on terms of amity and good neighborhood with her. This she would not suffer. By her own conduct we have been compelled to engage in the present war. In its prosecution, we seek not to overthrow her as a nation, but, in vindicating our national honor, we seek to obtain redress for the wrongs she has done us, and indemnity for our just demands against her. We demand an honorable peace; and that peace must bring with it indemnity for the past and security for the future. Hitherto Mexico has refused all accommodation by which such a peace could be obtained.

Whilst our armies have advanced from victory to victory, from the commencement of the war, it has always been with the olive branch of peace in their hands; and it has been in the power of Mexico, at every step, to arrest hostilities by accepting it.

One great obstacle to the attainment of peace has, undoubtedly, arisen from the fact, that Mexico has been so long held in subjection by one faction or military usurper after another, and such has been the condition of insecurity in which their successive governments have been placed, that each has been deterred from making peace, lest, for this very cause, a rival faction might expel it from power. Such was the fate of President Herrera's administration in 1845, for being disposed even to listen to the overtures of the United States to prevent the war, as is fully confirmed by an official correspondence which took place in the month of August last, between him and his government, a copy of which is herewith communicated. "For this cause alone, the revolution which displaced him from power was set on foot" by General Paredes. Such may be the condition of insecurity of the present government.

There can be no doubt that the peaceable and well-disposed inhabitants of Mexico are convinced that it is the true interest of their country to conclude an honorable peace with the United States; but the apprehension of becoming the victims of some military faction or usurper may have prevented them from manifesting their feelings in any public act. The removal of any such apprehension would probably cause them to speak their sentiments freely, and to adopt the measures necessary for the restoration of peace. With a people distracted and divided by contending factions, and a government subject to constant changes, by successive revolutions, the continued successes of our arms may fail to secure a satisfactory peace. In such event, it may become proper for our commanding generals in the field to give encouragement and assurances of protection to the friends of peace in Mexico in the establishment and maintenance of a free republican government of their own choice, able and willing to conclude a peace which would be just to them, and secure to us the indemnity we demand. This may become the only mode of obtaining such a peace. Should such be the result, the war which Mexico has forced upon us would thus be converted into an enduring blessing to herself. After finding her torn and distracted by factions, and ruled by military usurpers, we should then leave her with a republican government, in the enjoyment of real independence, and domestic peace and prosperity, performing all her relative duties in the great family of nations, and promoting her own happiness by wise laws and their faithful execution.

If, after affording this encouragement and protection, and after all the persevering and sincere efforts we have made, from the moment Mexico commenced the war, and prior to that time, to adjust our differences with her, we shall ultimately fail, then we shall have exhausted all honorable means in pursuit of peace, and must continue to occupy her country with our troops, taking the full measure of indemnity into our own hands, and must enforce the terms which our honor demands.

To act otherwise, in the existing state of things in Mexico, and to withdraw our army without a peace, would not only leave all the wrongs of which we complain unredressed, but would be the signal for new and fierce civil dissensions and new revolutions—all alike hostile to peaceful relations with the United States.

Besides, there is danger, if our troops were withdrawn before a peace was concluded, that the Mexican people, wearied with successive revolutions, and deprived of protection for their persons and property, might at length be inclined to yield to foreign influences, and to cast themselves into the arms of some European monarch for protection from the anarchy and suffering which would ensue. This, for our own safety, and in pursuance of our established policy, we should be compelled to resist. We could never consent that Mexico should be thus converted into a monarchy governed by a foreign prince.

Mexico is our near neighbor, and her boundaries are coterminous with our own, through the whole extent across the North American continent, from ocean to ocean. Both politically and commercially, we have the deepest interest in her regeneration and prosperity. Indeed, it is impossible that, with any just regard to our own safety, we can ever become indifferent to her fate.

It may be that the Mexican government and people have misconstrued or misunderstood our forbearance, and our objects, in desiring to conclude an amicable adjustment of the existing differences between the two countries. They may have supposed that we would submit to terms degrading to the nation, or they may have drawn false inferences from the supposed division of opinion in the United States on the subject of the war, and may have calculated on some future political event, or change of policy, that we might ultimately abandon it altogether, without insisting on any indemnity, territorial or otherwise. Whatever may be the false impressions under which they have acted, the adoption and prosecution of the energetic policy proposed must soon undeceive them.

In the future prosecution of the war, the enemy must be made to feel its pressure more than they have heretofore done. At its commencement, it was deemed proper to conduct it in a spirit of forbearance and liberality. With this end in view, early measures were adopted to conciliate, as far as a state of war would permit, the mass of the Mexican population; to convince them that the war was waged not against the peaceful inhabitants of Mexico, but against their faithless government, which had commenced hostilities; to remove from their minds the false impressions which their designing and interested rulers had artfully attempted to make, that the war on our part was one of conquest; that it was a war against their religion and their churches, which were to be desecrated and overthrown; and that their rights of person and private property would be violated. To remove these false impressions, our commanders in the field were directed scrupulously to respect their religion, their churches, and their church property, which were in no manner to be violated; they were directed also, to respect the rights of persons and property of all who should not take take up arms against us.

Assurances to this effect were given to the Mexican people by Major General Taylor, in a proclamation issued in pursuance of instructions from the Secretary of War, in the month of June, 1846, and again by Major General Scott, who acted upon his own convictions of the propriety of issuing it, in a proclamation of the 11th of May, 1847.

In this spirit of liberality and conciliation, and with a view to prevent the body of the Mexican population from taking up arms against us, war the war was conducted on our part. Provisions and other supplies furnished to our army by Mexican citizens were paid for at fair and liberal prices agreed upon by the parties. After the lapse of a few months, it became apparent that these assurances, and this mild treatment, had failed to produce the desired effect upon the Mexican population. While the war had been conducted on our part according to the most humane and liberal principles observed by civilized nations, it was waged in a far different spirit on the part of Mexico. Not appreciating our forbearance, the Mexican people generally became hostile to the United States, and availed themselves of every opportunity to commit the most savage excesses upon our troops. Large numbers of the population took up arms, and, engaging in guerilla warfare, robbed and murdered in the most cruel manner, individual soldiers, or small parties, whom accident or other causes had separated from the main body of our army. Bands of guerilleros and robbers infested the roads, harassed our trains, and, whenever it was in their power, cut off our supplies.

The Mexicans having thus shown themselves to be wholly incapable of appreciating our forbearance and liberality, it was deemed proper to change the manner of conducting the war, by making them feel its pressure according to the usages observed under similar circumstances by all other civilized nations.

Accordingly, as early as the twenty-second of September, 1846, instructions were given by the Secretary of War to Major General Taylor to "draw supplies" for our army "from the enemy, without paying for them, and to require contributions for its support, if in that way he was satisfied he could obtain adequate supplies for his forces." In directing the execution of these instructions, much was necessarily left to the discretion of the commanding officer, who was best acquainted with the circumstances by which he was surrounded, the wants of the army, and the practicability of enforcing the measure.

General Taylor, on the twenty-sixth of October, 1846, replied, from Monterey, that "it would have been impossible hitherto, and is so now, to sustain the army to any extent by forced contributions of money or supplies." For the reasons assigned by him, he did not adopt the policy of his instructions, but declared his readiness to do so, "should the army, in its future operations, reach a portion of the country which may be made to supply the troops with advantage." He continued to pay for the articles of supply which were drawn from the enemy's country.

Similar instructions were issued to Major General Scott on the third of April, 1747, who replied from Jalapa, on the twentieth of May, 1847, that if it be expected "that the army is to support itself by forced contributions levied upon the country, we may ruin and exasperate the inhabitants, and starve ourselves." The same discretion was given to him that had been to General Taylor in this respect. General Scott, for the reasons assigned by him, also continued to pay for the articles of supply for the army which were drawn from the enemy.

After the army had reached the heart of the most wealthy portion of Mexico, it was supposed that the obstacles which had before that time prevented it would not be such as to render impracticable the levy of forced contributions for its support; and on the first of September, and again on the sixth of October, 1847, the order was repeated in despatches addressed by the Secretary of War to General Scott, and his attention was again called to the importance of making the enemy bear the burdens of the war by requiring them to furnish the means of supporting our army; and he was directed to adopt this policy, unless, by doing so, there was danger of depriving the army of the necessary supplies. Copies of these despatches were forwarded to General Taylor for his government.

On the thirty-first of March last, I caused an order to be issued to our military and naval commanders to levy and collect a military contribution upon all vessels and merchandize which might enter any of the ports of Mexico in our military occupation, and to apply such contributions towards defraying the expenses of the war. By virtue of the right of conquest and the laws of war, the conqueror, consulting his own safety or convenience, may either exclude foreign commerce altogether from all such ports, or permit it upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe. Before the principal ports of Mexico were blockaded by our navy, the revenue derived from impost duties, under the laws of Mexico, was paid into the Mexican treasury. After these ports had fallen into our military possession, the blockade was raised, and commerce with them permitted upon prescribed terms and conditions. They were opened to the trade of all nations upon the payment of duties more moderate in their amount than those which had been previously levied by Mexico; and the revenue, which was formerly paid into the Mexican treasury, was directed to be collected by our military and naval officers, and applied to the use of our army and navy. Care was taken that the officers soldiers and sailors of our army and navy should be exempted from the operations of the order; and as the merchandize imported upon which the order operated must be consumed by Mexican citizens, the contributions exacted were, in effect, the seizure of the public revenues of Mexico, and the application of them to our own use. In directing this measure, the object was to compel the enemy to contribute, as far as practicable, towards the expenses of the war.

For the amount of contributions which have been levied in this form, I refer you to the accompanying reports of the Secretary of War and of the Secretary of the Navy, by which it appears that a sum exceeding half a million of dollars has been collected.

This amount would undoubtedly have been much larger but for the difficulty of keeping open communications between the coast and the interior, so as to enable the owners of the merchandize imported to transport and vend it to the inhabitants of the country. It is confidently expected that this difficulty will, to a great extent, be soon removed by our increased forces which have been sent to the field.

Measures have recently been adopted by which the internal as well as the external revenues of Mexico, in all places in our military occupation, will be seized and appropriated to the use of our army and navy.

The policy of levying upon the enemy contributions in every form, consistently with the laws of nations, which it may be practicable for our military commanders to adopt, should, in my judgment, be rigidly enforced, and orders to this effect have accordingly been given. By such a policy, at the same time that our own treasury will be relieved from a heavy drain, the Mexican people will be made to feel the burdens of the war, and, consulting their own interests, may be induced the more readily to require their rulers to accede to a just peace.

After the adjournment of the last session of Congress, events transpired in the prosecution of the war which, in my judgment, required a greater number of troops in the field than had been anticipated. The strength of the army was therefore increased by "accepting" the services of all the volunteer forces authorized by the act of the thirteenth of May, 1846, without putting a construction on that act, the correctness of which was seriously questioned. The volunteer forces now in the field, with those which had been "accepted," to "serve for twelve months," and were discharged at the end of their term of service, exhaust the fifty thousand men authorized by that act. Had it been clear that a proper construction of the act warranted it, the services of an additional number would have been called for and accepted; but doubts existing upon this point, the power was not exercised.

It is deemed important that Congress should, at an early period of their session, confer the authority to raise an additional regular force to serve during the war with Mexico, and to be discharged upon the conclusion and ratification of a treaty of peace. I invite the attention of Congress to the views presented by the Secretary of War in his report upon this subject.

I recommend, also, that authority be given by law to call for and accept the services of an additional number of volunteers, to be exercised at such time and to such extent as the emergencies of the service may require.

In prosecuting the war with Mexico, whilst the utmost care has been taken to avoid every just cause of complaint on the part of neutral nations, and none has been given, liberal privileges have been granted to their commerce in the ports of the enemy in our military occupation.

The difficulty with the Brazilian government, which at one time threatened to interrupt the friendly relations between the two countries, will, I trust, be speedily adjusted. I have received information that an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States will shortly be appointed by his Imperial Majesty; and it is hoped he will come instructed and prepared to adjust all remaining differences between the two governments in a manner acceptable and honorable to both. In the mean time, I have every reason to believe that nothing will occur to interrupt our amicable relations with Brazil.

It has been my constant effort to maintain and cultivate the most intimate relations of friendship with all the independent powers of South America; and this policy has been attended with the happiest results. It is true, that the settlement and payment of many just claims of American citizens against these nations have been long delayed. The peculiar position in which they have been placed, and the desire on the part of my predecessors, as well as myself, to grant them the utmost indulgence, have hitherto prevented these claims from being urged in a manner demanded by strict justice. The time has arrived when they ought to be finally adjusted and liquidated, and efforts are now making for that purpose.

It is proper to inform you that the government of Peru has in good faith paid the first two instalments of the indemnity of thirty thousand dollars each, and the greater portion of the interest due thereon, in execution of the convention between that government and the United States, the ratifications of which were exchanged at Lima, on the thirty-first of October, 1846. The Attorney General of the United States, early in August last, completed the adjudication of the claims under this convention, and made his report thereon, in pursuance of the act of the 8th of August, 1846. The sums to which the claimants are respectively entitled will be paid on demand at the treasury.

I invite the early attention of Congress to the present condition of our citizens in China. Under our treaty with that power, American citizens are withdrawn from the jurisdiction, whether civil or criminal, of the Chinese government, and placed under that of our public functionaries in that country. By these alone can our citizens be tried and punished for the commission of any crime; by these alone can questions be decided between them, involving the rights of persons and property; and by these alone can contracts be enforced, into which they may have entered with the citizens or subjects of foreign powers. The merchant vessels of the United States lying in the waters of the five ports of China, open to foreign commerce, are under the exclusive jurisdiction of officers of their own government. Until Congress shall establish competent tribunals to try and punish crimes, and to exercise jurisdiction in civil cases in China, American citizens there are subject to no law whatever. Crimes may be committed with impunity, and debts may be contracted without any means to enforce their payment.—Inconveniences have already resulted from the omission of Congress to legislate upon the subject, and still greater are apprehended. The British authorities in China have already complained that this government has not provided for the punishment of crimes, or the enforcement of contracts against American citizens in that country, whilst their government has established tribunals by which an American citizen can recover debts due from British subjects.

Accustomed as the Chinese are to summary justice, they could not be made to comprehend why criminals who are citizens of the United States should escape with impunity, in violation of treaty obligations, whilst the punishment of a Chinese who had committed any crime again an American citizen, would be rigorously exacted. Indeed, the consequences might be fatal to American citizens in China, if flagrant crime be committed by any one of them upon a Chinese, and should trial and punishment not follow according to the requisitions of the treaty. This might disturb, if not destroy, our friendly relations with that empire, and cause an interruption of our valuable commerce.

Our treaties with the sublime Porte, Tripoli, Tunis, Morocco, and Muscat, also require the legislation of Congress to carry them into execution, though the necessity for immediate action may not be so urgent as in regard to China.

The Secretary of State has submitted an estimate to defray the expenses of opening diplomatic relations with the Papal States. The interesting political events now in progress in these States, as well as a just tregard to our commercial interests, have, in my opinion, rendered such a measure highly expedient.

Estimates have also been submitted for the outfits and salaries of Charges d'Affaires to the republics of Bolivia, Guatema, and Ecuador. The manifest importance of cultivating the most friendly relations with all the independent States upon this continent has induced me to recommend appropriations necessary for the maintenance of these missions.

I recommend to Congress that an appropriation be made, to be paid to the Spanish government for the purpose of distribution among the claimants in "the Amistad case." I entertain the conviction that this is due to Spain under the treaty of the twentieth of October, 1795; and moreover, that, from the earnest manner in which the claim continues to be urged, so long as it shall remain unsettled, it will be a source of irritation and discord between the two countries, which may prove highly prejudicial to the interests of the United States. Good policy, no less than a faithful compliance with our treaty obligations, requires that the inconsiderable appropriation demanded should be made.

A detailed statement of the condition of the finances will be presented in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury.—The imports for the last fiscal year, ending on the thirtieth of June, 1847, were of the value of one hundred and forty-six million five hundred and forty-five thousand six hundred and thirty-eight dollars; of which the amount exported was eight million eleven thousand one hundred and fifty-eight dollars, leaving one hundred and thirty-eight million five hundred and thirty-four thousand four hundred and eighty dollars in the country for domestic use. The value of the exports for the same period was one hundred and fifty-eight million six hundred and forty-eight thousand six hundred and twenty-two dollars; of which one hundred and fifty million six hundred and thirty-seven thousand four hundred and sixty-four dollars consisted of domestic productions, and eight million eleven thousand one hundred and fifty-eight dollars of foreign articles.

The receipts into the treasury for the same period amounted to twenty-six million three hundred and forty-six thousand seven hundred and ninety dollars and thirty-seven cents, of which there was derived from customs twenty-three million seven hundred and forty-seven thousand eight hundred and sixty-four dollars and sixty-six cents; from sales of public lands, two million four hundred and ninety-eight thousand three hundred and thirty-five dollars and twenty cents; and from incidental and miscellaneous sources, one hundred thousand five hundred and seventy dollars and fifty-one cents. The last fiscal year during which this amount was received embraced five months under the operation of the tariff act of '42 and seven moths during which the tariff act of 1846 was in force. During the five months under the act of 1842, the amount received from customs was seven million eight hundred and forty-two thousand three hundred and six dollars and ninety cents, and during the seven months under the act of 1846 the amount received was fifteen million nine hundred and five thousand five hundred and fifty-seven dollars and seventy-six cents.

The nett revenue from customs during the year ending on the first of December, 1846, being the last year under the operation of the tariff act of 1842, was twenty-two million nine hundred and seventy-one thousand four hundred and three dollars and ten cents; and the nett revenue from customs during the year ending on the first of December, 1847, being the first year under the operation of the tariff act of 1846, was about thirty-one million five hundred thousand dollars; being an increase of revenue for the first year under the tariff of 1846 of more than eight million five hundred thousand dollars over that of the last year under the tariff of 1842.

The expenditures during the fiscal year ending on the thirtieth of June last were fifty-nine million four hundred and fifty one thousand one hundred and seventy-seven dollars and sixty-five cents; of which three million five hundred and twenty-two thousand and eighty-two dollars and thirty-seven cents was on account of payment of principal and interest of the public debt, including treasury notes redeemed and not funded. The expenditures, exclusive of payment of public debt, were fifty-five million nine hundred and twenty-nine thousand and ninety-five dollars and twenty-eight cents.

It is estimated that the receipts into the treasury for the fiscal year ending on the thirtieth of June, 1848, including the balance in the treasury on the first of July last, will amount to forty-two million eight hundred and eighty-six thousand five hundred and forty-five dollars and eighty cents, of which thirty one million, it is estimated, will be derived from customs; three million five hundred thousand from the sale of the public lands; four hundred thousand from incidental sources, including sales made by the Solicitor of the Treasury; and six million two hundred and eighty-five thousand two hundred and ninety-four dollars and fifty-five cents from loans already authorized by law, which, together with the balance in the treasury on the first of July last, make the sum estimated.

The expenditures for the same period, if peace with Mexico shall not be concluded, and the army shall be increased as is proposed, will amount, including the necessary payments on account of principal and interest of the public debt and treasury notes, to fifty-eight million six hundred and fifteen thousand six hundred and sixty dollars and seven cents.

On the first of the present month, the amount of the public debt actually incurred, including treasury notes, was forty-five million six hundred and fifty-nine thousand six hundred and fifty-nine dollars and forty cents. The public debt due on the fourth of March, 1845, including treasury notes, was seventeen million seven hundred and eighty-eight thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine hollars and sixty-two cents; and consequently the addition made to the public debt since that time is twenty-seven million eight hundred and seventy thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine dollars and seventy-eight cents.

Of the loan of twenty-three millions, authorized by the act o the twenty-eighth of January, 1847, the sum of five millions was paid out to the public creditors as contemplated at the time of its negotiation, and the remaining eighteen millions was offered for specie to the highest bidder not below par, by an advertisement issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, and published from the ninth of February until the tenth of April, 1847, when it was awarded to the several highest bidders, at premiums varying from one-eighth of one per cent. to two per cent. above par. The premium has been paid into the treasury, and the sums awarded deposited in specie in the treasury as fast as it was required by the wants of the government.

To meet the expenditures for the remainder of the present and for the next fiscal year, ending on the thirtieth of June, 1849, a further loan, in aid of the ordinary revenues of the government will be necessary. Retaining a sufficient surplus in the treasury, the loan required for the remainder of the present fiscal year will be about eighteen million five hundred thousand dollars. If the duty on tea and coffee be imposed, and the graduation of the price of the public lands shall be made at an early period of your session, as recommended, the loan for the present fiscal year may be reduced to seventeen millions of dollars. The loan may be further reduced by whatever amount of expenditures can be saved by military contributions collected in Mexico. The most vigorous means for securing the regular collection of these contributions have been directed, and a very considerable sum is expected from that source. Its amount cannot, however, be calculated with any certainty. It is recommended that the loan to be made be authorized upon the same terms, and for the same time, as that which was authorized under the provisions of the act of the twenty-eighth of January, 1847.

Should the war with Mexico be continued until the thirtieth of June, 1849, it is estimated that a further loan of twenty million five hundred thousand dollars will be required for the fiscal year ending on that day, in case no duty be imposed on tea and coffee, and the public lands be not reduced and graduated in price, and no military contributions shall be collected in Mexico. If the duty on tea and coffee be imposed, and the lands be reduced and graduated in price, as proposed, the loan may be reduced to seventeen millions of dollars, and will be subject to be still further reduced by the amount of the military contributions which may be collected in Mexico. It is not proposed, however, at present, to ask Congress for authority to negotiate this loan for the next fiscal year, as it is hoped that the loan asked for the remainder of the present fiscal year, aided by military contributions which may be collected in Mexico, may be sufficient. If, contrary to my expectation, there should be a necessity for it, the fact will be communicated to Congress in time for their action during the present session. In no event will a sum exceeding six millions of dollars of this amount be needed before the meeting of the session of Congress in December, 1848.

The act of the thirtieth of July, 1846, "reducing the duties on imports," has been in force since the first of December last; and I am gratified to state, that all the beneficial effects which were anticipated from its operation have been fully realized. The public revenue derived from customs during the year ending on the first of December, 1847, exceeds by more than eight millions of dollars the amount received in the preceding year under the operation of the act of 1842, which was superseded and repealed by it. Its effects are visible in the great and almost unexampled prosperity which prevails in every branch of business.

While the repeal of the prohibitory and restrictive duties of the act of 1842, and the substitution in their place of reasonable revenue rates, level to articles imported according to their present value, has increased the revenue and augmented our foreign trade, all the great interests of the country have been advanced and promoted.

The great and important interests of agriculture, which had been not only too much neglected, but actually taxed under the protective policy for the benefit of other interests, have been relieved of the burdens which that policy imposed on their industry, and our farmers and planters, under a more just and liberal commercial policy, are finding new and profitable markets abroad for their augmented products.

Our commerce is rapidly increasing, and is extending more widely the circle of international exchanges. Great as has been the increase of our imports during the past year, our exports of domestic products sold in foreign markets have been still greater.

Our navigating interest is eminently prosperous. The number of vessels built in the United States has been greater than during any preceding period of equal length. Large profits have been derived by those who have constructed, as well as by those who have navigated them. Should the ratio of increase in the number of our vessels and seamen be proportionally as great in the future as during the past year, the time is not distant when our tonnage and commercial marine will be larger than that of any other nation in the world.

Whilst the interests of agriculture, of commerce, and of navigation have been enlarged and invigorated, it is highly gratifying to observe that our manufactures are also in a prosperous condition. None of the ruinous effects upon this interest, which were apprehended by some, as the result of the operation of the revenue system established by the act of 1846, have been experienced. On the contrary, the number of manufactories, and the amount of capital invested in them, is steadily and rapidly increasing, affording gratifying proofs that American enterprise and skill employed in this branch of domestic industry, with no other advantages than those fairly and incidentally accruing from a just system of revenue duties, are abundantly able to meet successfully all competition from abroad, and still derive fair and remunerating profits.

While capital invested in manufactures is yielding adequate and fair profits under the new system, the wages of labor, whether employed in manufactures, agriculture, commerce, or navigation, have been augmented. The toiling millions, whose daily labor furnishes the supply of food and raiment, and all the necessaries and comforts of life, are receiving higher wages, and more steady and permanent employment, than in any other country, or at any previous period of our own history.

So successful have been all branches of our industry, that a foreign war, which generally diminishes the resources of a nation, has in no essential degree retarded our onward progress, or checked our general prosperity.

With such gratifying evidences of prosperity, and of the successful operation of the revenue act of 1846, every consideration of public policy recommends that it shall remain unchanged. It is hoped that the system of impost duties which it established, may be regarded as the permanent policy of the country, and that the great interests affected by it may not again be subject to be injuriously disturbed, as they have heretofore been, by frequent and sometimes sudden changes.

For the purpose of increasing the revenue, and without changing or modifying the rates imposed by the act of 1846, on the dutiable articles embraced by its provisions, I again recommend to your favorable consideration the expediency of levying a revenue duty on tea and coffee. The policy which exempted these articles from duty during peace, and when the revenue to be derived from them was not needed, ceases to exist when the country is engaged in war, and requires the use of all its available resources. It is a tax which would be so generally diffused among the people, that it would be felt oppressively by none, and be complained of by none. It is believed that there are not, in the list of imported articles, any which are more properly the subject of war duties than tea and coffee.

It is estimated that three millions of dollars would be derived annually by a moderate duty imposed on these articles.

Should Congress avail itself of this additional source of revenue, not only would the amount of the public loan, rendered necessary by the war with Mexico, be diminished in extent, but the public credit, and the public confidence in the ability and determination of the government to meet all its engagements promptly, would be more firmly established, and the reduced amount of the loan, which it may be necessary to negotiate, could probably be obtained at cheaper rates.

Congress is, therefore, called upon to determine whether it is wiser to impose the war duties recommended, or, by omitting to do so, increase the public debt annually three millions of dollars so long as loans shall be required to prosecute the war, and afterwards provide, in some other form, to pay the semi-annual interest upon it, and ultimately to extinguish the principal. If, in addition to these duties, Congress should graduate and reduce the price of such public lands as experience has proved will not command the price placed upon them by the government, an additional annual income to the treasury, of between half a million and a million of dollars, it is estimated, would be derived from this source. Should both measures receive the sanction of Congress, the annual amount of public debt necessary to be contracted during the continuance of the war, would be reduced nearly four millions of dollars. The duties recommended to be levied on tea and coffee, it is proposed, shall be limited in their duration to the close of the war, and until the public debt rendered necessary to be contracted by it, shall be discharged. The amount of the public debt to be contracted, should be limited to the lowest practicable sum, and should be extinguished as early after the conclusion of the war as the means of the treasury will permit.

With this view, it is recommended that, as soon as the war shall be over, all the surplus in the treasury, not needed for other indispensable objects, shall constitute a sinking fund, and be applied to the purchase of the funded debt, and that authority be conferred by law for that purpose.

The act of the sixth of August, 1846, "to establish a warehousing system," has been in operation more than a year, and has proved to be an important auxiliary to the tariff act of 1846, in augmenting the revenue and extending the commerce of the country. Whilst it has tended to enlarge commerce, it has been beneficial to our manufactures, by diminishing forced sales at auction of foreign goods at low prices, to raise the duties to be advanced on them, and thereby checking their importation. The system, although sanctioned by the experience of other countries, was entirely new in the United States, and is susceptible of improvement in some of its provisions. The Secretary of the Treasury, upon whom was devolved large discretionary powers in carrying this measure into effect, has collected and is now collecting, the practical results of the system in other countries, where it has long been established, and will report at an early period of your session such further regulations suggested by the investigation as may render it still more effective and beneficial.

By the act "to provide for the better organization of the treasury, and for the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue," all banks were discontinued as fiscal agents of the government, and the paper currency issued by them was no longer permitted to be received in payment of public dues.

The constitutional treasury created by this act went into operation on the first of January last. Under the system established by it, the public moneys have been collected, safely kept, and disbursed by the direct agency of officers of the government in gold and silver; and transfers of large amounts have been made from points of collection to points of disbursement, without loss to the treasury, or injury or inconvenience to the trade of the country.

While the fiscal operations of the government have been conducted with regularity and ease under this system, it has had a salutary effect in checking and preventing an undue inflation of the paper currency issued by the banks which exist under State charters. Requiring, as it does, all dues to the government to be paid in gold and silver, its effect is to restrain excessive issues of bank paper by the banks disproportioned to the specie in their vaults, for the reason that they are at all times liable to be called on by the holders of their notes for their redemption, in order to obtain specie for the payment of duties and other public dues. The banks, therefore, must keep their business within prudent limits, and be always in a condition to meet such calls, or run the hazard of being compelled to suspend specie payments, and be thereby discredited. The amount of specie imported into the United States during the last fiscal year, was twenty-four millions one hundred and twenty-one thousand two hundred and eighty-nine dollars; of which there was retained in the country twenty-two millions one hundred and seventy-six thousand two hundred and seventy dollars. Had the former financial system prevailed, and the public moneys been placed on deposite in the banks, nearly the whole of this amount would have gone into their vaults, not to be thrown into circulation by them, but to be withheld from the hands of the people as a currency, and made the basis of new and enormous issues of bank paper. A large proportion of the specie imported has been paid into the treasury for public dues; and after having been to a great extent, recoined at the mint, has been paid out to the public creditors and gone into circulation as a currency among the people. The amount of gold and silver coin now in circulation in the country is larger than at any former period.

The financial system established by the constitutional treasury has been, thus far, eminently successful in its operations; and I recommend an adherence to all its essential provisions, and especially to that vital provision which wholly separates the government from all connexion with banks, and excludes bank paper from all revenue receipts.

In some of its details, not involving its general principles, the system is defective, and will require modification. These defects, and such amendments as are deemed important, were set forth in the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury. These amendments are again recommended to the early and favorable consideration of Congress.

During the past year, the coinage at the mint and its branches has exceeded twenty millions of dollars. This has consisted chiefly in converting the coins of foreign countries into American coin.

The largest amount of foreign coin imported has been received at New York; and if a branch mint were established at that city, all the foreign coin received at that port could at once be converted into our own coin, without the expense, risk, and delay of transporting it to the mint for that purpose, and the amount received would be much larger.

Experience has proved that foreign coin, and especially foreign gold coin, will not circulate extensively as a currency among the people. The important measure of extending our specie circulation, both of gold and silver, and of diffusing it among the people, can only be effected by converting such foreign coin into American coin. I repeat the recommendation contained in my last annual message for the establishment of a branch of the mint of the United States at the city of New York.

All the public lands which had been surveyed and were ready for market have been proclaimed for sale during the last year.—The quantity offered and to be offered for sale, under proclamations issued since the first of January last, amounts to nine million one hundred and thirty-eight thousand five hundred and thirty-one acres. The prosperity of the western States and Territories in which these lands lie will be advanced by their speedy sale. By withholding them from market, their growth and increase of population would be retarded, while thousands of our enterprising and meritorious frontier population would be deprived of the opportunity of securing freeholds for themselves and families. But in addition to the general considerations which rendered the early sale of these lands proper, it was a leading object at this time to derive as large a sum as possible from this source, and thus diminish, by that amount, the public loan rendered necessary by the existence of a foreign war.

It is estimated that not less than ten millions of acres of the public lands will be surveyed and be in a condition to be proclaimed for sale during the year 1848.

In my last annual message, I presented the reasons which, in my judgment, rendered it proper to graduate and reduce the price of such of the public lands as have remained unsold for long periods after they had been offered for sale at public auction.

Many millions of acres of public lands lying within the limits of several of the Western States have been offered in the market, and been subject to sale at private entry for more than twenty years, and large quantities for more than thirty years, at the lowest price prescribed by the existing laws, and it has been found that they will not command that price. They must remain unsold and uncultivated for an indefinite period, unless the price demanded for them by the government shall be reduced. No satisfactory reason is perceived why they should be longer held at rates above their real value. At the present period an additional reason exists for adopting the measure recommended. When the country is engaged in a foreign war, and we must necessarily resort to loans, it would seem to be the dictate of wisdom that we should avail ourselves of all our resources, and thus limit the amount of the public indebtedness to the lowest possible sum.

I recommend that the existing laws on the subject of pre-emption rights be amended and modified so as to operate prospectively, and to embrace all who may settle upon the public lands and make improvements upon them before they are surveyed, as well as afterwards; in all cases where such settlements may be made after the Indian title shall have been extinguished.

If the right of pre-emption be thus extended, it will embrace a large and meritorious class of our citizens. It will increase the number of freeholders upon our borders, who will be enabled thereby to educate their children and otherwise improve their condition, while they will be found at all times, as they have ever proved themselves to be, in the hour of danger to their country, among our hardiest and best volunteer soldiers, ever ready to tender their services in cases of emergency, and among the last to leave the field as long as an enemy remains to be encountered. Such a policy will also impress these patriotic pioneer emigrants with deeper feelings of gratitude for the parental care of their government, when they find their dearest interests secured to them by the permanent laws of the land, and that they are no longer in danger of losing their homes and hard-earned improvements by being brought into competition with a more wealthy class of purchasers at the land sales.

The attention of Congress was invited, at their last and preceding sessions, to the importance of establishing a Territorial government over our possessions in Oregon; and it is to be regretted that there was no legislation on the subject. Our citizens who inhabit that distant region of country are still left without the protection of our laws, or any regularly organized government. Before the question of limits and boundaries of the territory of Oregon was definitely settled, from the necessity of their condition, the inhabitants had established a temporary government of their own. Besides the want of legal authority for continuing such a government, it is wholly inadequate to protect them in their rights of person and property, or to secure to them the enjoyment of the privileges of other citizens, to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States. They should have the right of suffrage, be represented in a Territorial legislature, and by a delegate in Congress; and possess all the rights and privileges which citizens of other portions of the Territories of the United States have heretofore enjoyed, or may now enjoy.

Our judicial system, revenue laws, laws regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and the protection of our laws generally, should be extended over them.

In addition to the inhabitants in that territory who had previously emigrated to it, large numbers of our citizens have followed them during the present year; and it is not doubted that during the next and subsequent years their numbers will be greatly increased.

Congress, at its last session, established post routes leading to Oregon, and between different points within that territory, and authorized the establishment of post offices at "Astoria and such other places on the coasts of the Pacific, within the territory of the United States, as the public interests may require." Post offices have accordingly been established, deputy postmasters appointed, and provision made for the transportation of the mails.

The preservation of peace with the Indian tribes residing west of the Rocky mountains will render it proper that authority should be given by law for the appointment of an adequate number of Indian agents to reside among them.

I recommend that a surveyor general's office be established in that territory, and that the public lands be surveyed and brought into market at an early period.

I recommend, also, that grants, upon liberal terms, of limited qualities of the public lands be made to all citizens of the United States who have emigrated, or may hereafter within a prescribed period emigrate to Oregon, and settle upon them. These hardy and adventurous citizens, who have encountered the dangers and privations of a long and toilsome journey, and have at length found an abiding-place for themselves and their families upon the utmost verge of our western limits, should be secured in the homes which they have improved by their labor.

I refer you to the accompanying report of the Secretary of War for a detailed account of the operations of the various branches of the public service connected with the department under his charge. The duties devolving on this department have been unusually onerous and responsible during the past year, and have been discharged with ability and success.

Pacific relations continue to exist with the various Indian tribes, and most of them manifest a strong friendship for the United States. Some depredations were committed during the past year upon our trains transporting supplies for the army, on the road between the western border of Missouri and Santa Fe. These depredations, which are supposed to have been committed by bands from the region of New Mexico, have been arrested by the presence of a military force, ordered out for that purpose. Some outrages have been perpetrated by a portion of the northwestern bands upon the weaker and comparatively defenceless neighboring tribes. Prompt measures were taken to prevent such occurrences in future.

Between one or two thousand Indians, belonging to several tribes, have been removed during the past year, from the east of the Mississippi to the country allotted to them west of that river,

Since the treaty of 1846, with the Cherokees, the feuds among [illegible] have been more excited by the agency [illegible] than by any other cause. The [illegible] appointed in pursuance of the act of June 27, 1846, to settle claims arising under the treaty of 1835–'36 with that tribe, have executed their duties; and after patient investigation, [illegible] all the cases brought before them, closed their labors in the month of July last. This is the [illegible] under this treaty. Ample opportunity has been afforded to all those interested to bring forward their claims. No doubt is entertained that the impartial justice has been done by the late board, and that all valid claims embraced by the treaty have been considered and [illegible] to be made with this tribe, under the treaty of 1846, which will be completed and laid before you during your session, will adjust all questions of controversy between [illegible] and produce a state of [illegible] and [illegible].

[illegible] required by the act of the third of March last, the annuities due to the various tribes have been [illegible] instead of [illegible] as heretofore, thus [illegible] and imposition from being practiced upon the great body of [illegible] the [illegible] of all the tribes.

[illegible] has been given to the establishment of [illegible] and making rapid advances in [illegible] support, and in some cases a surplus to dispose of to their neighbors. The comforts by which those who have received even a very limited education, and have engaged in agriculture, are surrounded, tend [illegible] from the [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] civilization.

[illegible] Secretary of the Navy presents [illegible] and operations of that [illegible] the past year. Our commerce has been pursued with increased activity, and with safety and success [illegible] and the [illegible] of our flag [illegible] in every sea.

In the Gulf of Mexico, and in the Pacific, the officers and men of our squadrons have displayed distinguished gallantry, and performed valuable services. In the early stages of the war with Mexico, her ports on both coasts were blockaded, and more recently many of them have been captured and held by the navy. When acting in cooperation with the land forces, the naval officers and men have performed gallant and distinguished services on land as well as [illegible] in the [illegible] of the country.

While other maritime powers are adding to their navies large numbers of war steamers, it was a wise policy on our part to make similar additions to our navy. The four war steamers authorized by the act of the third of March, 1847, are in course of construction.

In addition to the four war steamers authorized by this act, the Secretary of the Navy has, in pursuance of its provisions, entered into contracts for the construction of five steamers, to be employed in the transportation of the United States mail from New York to New Orleans, touching at Charleston, Savannah, and Havana, and from Havana to Chagres;" for three steamers to be employed in like manner from Panama to Oregon, "so as to connect with the mail from Havana to Chagres across the isthmus;" and for five steamers to be employed in like manner from New York to Liverpool. These steamers will be the property of the contractors, but are to be built "under the superintendence and direction of a [illegible] to be so constructed as to render them convertible, at the least possible expense, into war steamers of the first class."

A prescribed number of naval officers, as well as a post office agent, are to be on board of them; and authority is reserved to the Navy Department at all times to "exercise control over said steamships," and "to have the right to take them for the exclusive use and service of the United States, upon making proper compensation to the contractors therefor."

Whilst these steamships will be employed in transporting the mails of the United States coastwise, and to foreign countries, upon an annual compensation to be paid to the owners, they will be always ready, upon an emergency requiring it, to be converted into war steamers; and the right reserved to take them for public use will add greatly to the efficiency and strength of this description of our naval force. To the steamers thus authorized under contracts made by the Secretary of the Navy, should be added five other steamers authorized under contracts made in pursuance of law by the Postmaster General; making an addition, in the whole, of [illegible] to take the place of [illegible]. As further contracts for the transportation of the mail to foreign countries [illegible] the [illegible] may be enlarged indefinitely.

The enlightened [illegible] which [illegible] countries, with the various distant parts of the globe is established, by means of American-built sea steamers, would find an ample reward in the increase of our commerce, and in making our country and its resources more favorably known abroad; but the national advantage is still greater—of having our naval officers made familiar with steam navigation, and of having the privilege of taking the ships already equipped for immediate service at a moment's notice; and will be cheaply purchased by the compensation to be paid for the transportation of the mail in them, over and above the postages received.

A just national pride, no less than our commercial interests, would seem to favor the policy of augmenting the number of this description of vessels. They can be built in our country cheaper, and in greater numbers than in any other in the world.

I refer you to the accompanying report of the Postmaster General for a detailed and satisfactory account of the condition and operations of that department during the past year. It is gratifying to find that, within so short a period after the reduction in the rates of postage, and notwithstanding the great increase of mail service, the revenue received for the year will be sufficient to defray all the expenses, and that no further aid will be required from the treasury for that purpose.

The first of the American mail steamers authorized by the act of the third of March, 1845, was completed and entered upon the service on the first of June last, and is now on her third voyage to Bremen and other intermediate ports. The other vessels authorized under the provisions of that act are in course of construction, and will be put upon the line as soon as completed. Contracts have also been made for the transportation of the mail in a steamer from Charleston to Havana.

A reciprocal and satisfactory postal arrangement has been made by the Postmaster General with the authorities of Bremen, and no difficulty is apprehended in making similar arrangements with all other powers with which we have communications by mail steamers, except with Great Britain.

On the arrival of the first of the American steamers, bound to Bremen, at Southampton, in the month of June last, the British post office directed the collection of discriminating postages on all letters and other mailable matter, which she took out to Great Britain, or which went into the British post office on their way to France and other parts of Europe. The effect of the order of the British post office is to subject all letters and other matter transported by American steamers to double postage, one postage having been previously paid on them to the United States, while letters transported in British steamers are subject to pay but a single postage. This measure was adopted with the avowed object of protecting the British line of mail steamers now running between Boston and Liverpool, and, if permitted to continue, must speedily put an end to the transportation of all letters and other matter by American steamers, and give to British steamers a monopoly of the business. A just and fair reciprocity is all that we desire, and on this we must insist. By our laws, no such discrimination is made against British steamers bringing letters into our ports, but all letters arriving in the United States are subject to the same rate of postage, whether brought in British or American vessels. I refer you to the report of the Postmaster General for a full statement of the facts of the case, and of the steps taken by him to correct this inequality. He has exerted all the power conferred upon him by the existing laws.

The minister of the United States at London has brought the subject to the attention of the British government, and is now engaged in negotiations for the purpose of adjusting reciprocal postal arrangements, which shall be equally just to both countries. Should he fail in concluding such arrangements, and should Great Britain insist on enforcing the unequal and unjust measure she has adopted, it will become necessary to confer additional powers on the Postmaster General, in order to enable him to meet the emergency, and to put our own steamers on an equal footing with British steamers engaged in transporting the mails between the two countries; and I recommend that such powers be conferred.

In view of the existing state of our country, I trust it may not be inappropriate, in closing this communication, to call to mind the words of the first and admonish the last and most illustrious of any predecessors, in his farewell address to his countrymen.

That greatest and best of men, who served his country so long and loved it so much, foresaw, with "serious concern," the danger to our Union "of characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—northern and southern, Atlantic and western—whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views," and warned his countrymen against it.

So deep and solemn was his conviction of the importance of the Union, and of preserving harmony between its different parts, that he declared to his countrymen in that address, "it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national Union to your collective and individual happiness: that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immoveable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and to speak of it as a palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts."

After the lapse of half a century, these admonitions of Washington fall upon us with all the force of truth. It is difficult to estimate the "unmense value" of our glorious Union of confederated States, to which we are so much indebted for our growth in population and wealth, and for all that constitutes us a great and happy nation. How unimportant are all our differences of opinion upon minor questions of public policy, compared with its preservation; and how scrupulously should we avoid all agitating topics which may tend to distract and divide us into contending parties, separated by geographical lines, whereby it may be weakened or endangered.

Invoking the blessing of the Almighty Ruler of the Universe upon your deliberations, it will be my highest duty, no less than my sincere pleasure, to co-operate with you in all measures which may tend to promote the honor and enduring welfare of our common country.

JAMES K. POLK.

WASHINGTON, December 7, 1847.

After the reading of the message had been proceeded with for some time,

Mr. SEVIER remarked that the message was a long one, and that Senators already had it upon their desks. He therefore moved that its further reading be dispensed with; which was agreed to.

PRINTING OF THE MESSAGE.

On motion by Mr. BREESE,

Ordered, That five thousand copies of the Message, and two thousand copies of the message and accompanying documents, in addition to the usual number, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN suggested that a still larger number should be printed. The message of the present session, he said, was one of unusual interest to this country. It was extremely long, too long to be inserted in all the newspapers of the country; and for these reasons he would move, in order that it might receive a large circulation, that twenty thousand additional copies of the message be printed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN inquired how many copies of the documents accompanying the message, it was proposed to print?

Being informed that it was two thousand copies of the message and documents and twenty-five thousand copies of the message alone, Mr. CRITTENDEN acquiesced, and the motion of Mr. ALLEN was agreed to.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1847.

The Hon. JOHN M. CLAYTON, of the State of Delaware, and the Hon. JOHN DAVIS, of the State of Massachusetts, appeared in their seats to-day.

CREDENTIALS OF SENATORS.

Mr. DAVIS ... of the Senators elect by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, to be a Senator of the United States, from the State of Massachusetts, for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1847, were presented at the last session, after having taken the oath of office, which was administered to him at the hands of the VICE PRESIDENT, took his seat.

[illegible]

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letter, which was read:

[illegible] December 7, 1847.

[illegible] Senate:

[illegible] the practice of our predecessors; and a failure on our part to be equally prompt may, [illegible] to well established usage, in advance of its delivery to the two houses of Congress.

[illegible] States, to which we respectfully ask you to communicate it.

With sentiments of great respect, we are, sir, your obedient servants,

[illegible]

REPORT FROM STATE DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, made agreeably to law, accompanied by statements, showing the appropriations and disbursements for the service of the department for the year ending June 30, 1847; which was read.

PETITIONS FROM STATE LEGISLATURES.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Oregon, praying that the settlers in that territory may be confirmed in their titles to the lands occupied by them; and the adoption of measures for the promotion of education; and for facilitating the navigation of the Columbia river.

Ordered, That it lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. DIX presented a preamble and resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of New York, requesting the Senators and Representatives of that State in Congress, to vote for the passage of a law granting public land for the construction of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific, according to the plan proposed by Asa Whitney, a citizen of New York.

Ordered, That they lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. DICKINSON presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of New York, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of that State in Congress, to use their best efforts to procure a repeal of certain provisions of the laws regulating the franking privilege and the postage on letters and newspapers.

Mr. DICKINSON then said: Serious exception has been taken to the clause of the postage law charging postage upon newspapers within thirty miles of the place where they are printed.—That clause has been, it seems, received with great disapprobation by the public; and in moving to refer these resolutions, as I shall, to the Post Office Committee, when appointed, I shall think it proper to call the attention of the Senate especially to this subject. I move at present that these resolutions lie upon the table.

Ordered, That they lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DIX presented the memorial of Sarah Ann Hart, widow of [illegible] late a purser in the Navy, praying a pension.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. DIX presented a petition of Sarah Ann Hart, widow of Monmouth B. Hart, Joel Kelley and William Close, sureties of Benjamin F. Hart, deceased, late a purser in the Navy, praying that a balance standing against him on the books of the Treasury, for certain stores which were lost by the wrecking of a United States vessel, may be cancelled.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. DIX presented the memorial of Francis O. Dorr, and Andrew C. Dorr, in behalf of their brother Gustavus Dorr, late a captain in the army, who, they allege, was unjustly dismissed from the service for acts done while in a state of mental derangement, caused by an injury received while on duty, praying that he may be allowed a pension.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. DIX presented the petition of Phebe Wood and Sylvia Ann Wood, children of Jeti ro Wood, deceased, praying an extension of the patent granted to their father for an improvement in the construction of the plough.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ATHERTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, Thomas Morris, now a member of the Senate, will proceed to the appointment of standing committees, in accordance with the rules.

PRINTING OF THE MESSAGE.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent:

Resolved, That [illegible] additional number of the documents accompanying the President's annual message be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN.—The number is left blank because, upon conversing with a number of gentlemen of this body, I found they were all agreed as to the necessity for printing an additional number, but they disagreed as to the number that was thought to be adequate. I believe it will be generally conceded that there ought to be, of some of these documents, a very large additional number printed, and it has been suggested by some of the intelligent and experienced members of the Senate, that it would be well; probably, to print a very large number of the report from the War Department, and omit the printing of the others, because the events of the war with Mexico are of the highest degree of importance—as interesting not only the public feelings of the country, but interesting in a high degree the private feelings of so many families. I think, sir, that there are circumstances connected with the whole action of this government which make the reports from all the departments peculiarly interesting this year. For instance, the same reason which gives extraordinary importance at this time to the report from the War Department, give almost equal importance to the report of the Secretary of the Navy; so, too, as regards the report from the Treasury Department. The operation of the new system of finance which the country has recently adopted, gives a transcendent importance to that report in connexion with the report proceeding from that department of the Executive government. So, too, of the report from the Post Office Department.—That report will disclose the results which experience has elicited as to the efficacy and the policy of the new system of postage. The same reason too which gives importance to the reports of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, gives equal importance to the report from the State Department, as being the political feature of this war. It is perfectly manifest, therefore, that the reports from all the departments, owing to the peculiar circumstances of the country and the peculiar developements of the recently adopted policy of the government, are of transcendent importance to the country. For these reasons, I have left the number blank, in order that any gentleman may suggest a number with which it shall be filled, which may meet the general approbation of the Senate. I ask the action of the Senate at this time upon the resolution.

Mr. CAMERON.—I move to fill the blank with 10,000, which will be about 200 for each member of the Senate; and I am induced to do this because by the recent act in regard to printing the additional number will add very little to the cost. After the types have once been set, very little cost attends the printing.—Besides, the message will be published in all the newspapers, and the public will have an opportunity to read it, but the documents being so large will not obtain equal publicity unless distributed by order of the Senate.

Mr. NILES.—I do not rise to oppose this motion, sir. I think it is a very important one. If my honorable friend from Ohio will move to reconsider the motion made yesterday, to order the printing of 20,000 copies of the message without the documents, and 5,000 with, making 25,000 in all, I might be inclined to sustain that motion. We are certainly beginning in a pretty liberal spirit in regard to the printing expenses of this body. And I wish to say a word at this time to my worthy friend from Pennsylvania, who, somehow, stuck an additional daily paper upon us. Now, three are more than I can find time to read; and, it a very distinguished gentleman from Georgia some years ago, had been here when that motion was made, we should probably have had a very serious debate before what that gentleman would have denominated a gross abuse, and in fact a violation, of what he thought, of the constitution of the United States, would have received the sanction of this body. However, that is a small matter. I admit, with the honorable Senator from Ohio, that, in the present interesting condition of the public affairs, the documents which are laid before us, are perhaps of something more than ordinary importance; and I would therefore be prepared, sir, to increase the number that we may be disposed to publish of those documents. But in regard to the message standing alone, I consider it altogether idle; for I hardly think I should undertake the drudgery of sending off the number that would fall to my share, particularly after the circulation of the newspapers containing it. Therefore, I see no necessity for increasing the number of copies of the message by itself. If the honorable Senator will make the motion that I have suggested, I would prefer it to the one which he has now made.

Mr. ALLEN.—I will say that as to the form in which the motion is put I have no particular solicitude, but if the reconsideration of the vote which was passed yesterday, to print 20,000 copies, should result in a modification so as to print 10,000 only, and the motion as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Pennsylvania, should pass to print no more than 15,000 copies of the message and 10,000 of the documents, I should have no objection; but if the object be barely to diminish the number of the copies of the message, without increasing the number of the documents, why then, I shall be inclined to oppose it.

Mr. NILES.—I think the number proposed is too large. Fifteen thousand of the message alone, and an additional 10,000 with the documents, are too many. We are advancing pretty rapidly; we are making too much progress. I am the friend of progress, but I do not want to get along too fast. I propose the printing of 5,000 copies, which will be ample.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I would inquire how many 5,000 will give to each Senator? Not more, I believe, than about forty-eight copies. The reports from the officers of the army to the Secretary at War are very much sought for by the public; I have received applications for copies of these documents. Persons having relations in Mexico would like to possess these documents in a suitable form for preservation, instead of the perishable newspaper. I hope the honorable Senator will withdraw his amendment, and that the original motion will be so modified as to reduce the number of the messages and increase the number of the reports. If the copies of the message ordered yesterday had been furnished, I should have been in favor of using the whole number; but we will not receive them until to-morrow probaly, and in the meantime, the message will be diffused throughout the whole country. I do not want to send off a single message unaccompanied by the documents. I am in favor of printing the largest number which has been suggested. It will not be too great for the wants of the country.

Mr. MANGUM asked for the reading of the resolution; and on its being again read, he said: I would inquire what are the documents accompanying the message? From what Departments are the reports?

Mr. ALLEN.—From all the departments, except the Treasury; from the War, the Navy, the State, and the Post Office departments.

The question being put on filling the blank with 10,000, it was, upon a division, decided in the affirmative—ayes 32, noes not counted.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

JOHN PAUL JONES.

Agreeably to notice given yesterday, Mr. HANNEGAN asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of the heirs of John Paul Jones; which was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—It is, I know, a rather unusual proposition. But I trust the extraordinary circumstances which occurred in relation to this bill, at the close of the last session, will induce the Senate to suspend the rules and give it a third reading now. The bill is now in Committee of the Whole; and without detaining the Senate more than a very few moments, I will simply state that it is the identical bill which passed both houses last session, without a division; at all events, without a division in the Senate, for it passed this body by a unanimous vote. I believe that the action of the other House was equally unanimous. It passed the Senate on the last night of the session. On the way from the desk of the Secretary to the room of the Vice President, where the President was appending his signature to bills, it was lost in the lobby, and was not recovered till after the adjournment of Congress, when, of course, it could not be signed by the President. Since that event, the unfortunate and accomplished gentleman then in charge of the bill, and who was no doubt well-remembered by members of the Senate, had died. He had left a widow and child; and I trust there is no indelicacy in remarking that prompt action on this bill is of essential importance to them.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act for the relief of the heirs of John Paul Jones."

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives on this bill.

RECONSIDERATION.

On motion by Mr. NILES, the vote of yesterday ordering twenty thousand copies of the message, without the documents, to be printed for the use of the Senate, was reconsidered, and

The said motion having been amended by striking out "twenty" and inserting "ten," was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That ten thousand copies of the message, wirhout the documents, be printed for the use of the Senate.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. DIX gave notice that on to-morrow, or at some early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce the following bills:

A bill to establish a branch of the Mint of the United States in the city of New York.

A bill for the relief of Mangle M. Quackenboss.

Mr. BREESE gave notice that on to-morrow, or at some early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce the following bills:

A bill to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands.

A bill to grant to the State of Illinois the right of way through the public lands, and for other purposes.

A bill for the relief of Joseph Wilson.

A bill to authorize persons to whom reservations have been made under certain Indian treaties, to alienate the same in fee.

Mr. DICKINSON gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, or at some early day, ask leave of the Senate to introduce the following bill:

A bill to amend the act in relation to seamen navigating waters in vessels of the United States, &c.

Mr GREENE gave notice that on to-morrow, or at some early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce the following bill:

A bill for the relief of Robert Parkis.

Mr. ASHLEY gave notice that on to-morrow, or at some early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce the following bills:

A bill to establish a general pre-emption system.

A bill to divide the Judicial District of Arkansas into two Judicial Districts.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HUNTER asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers relating to the claim of the heirs of John B. Grayson, deceased.

Mr. BREESE asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of Nehemiah Brush.

Mr. SEVIER asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, upon the subject of the removal of the raft of Red river, for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion.

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1846.

REPORTS FROM THE TREASURY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, made agreeably to law, accompanied by copies of the Treasurer's accounts with the United States, for the 3d and 4th quarters of 1846, and 1st and 2d quarters of 1847, which were ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a communication from the Second Auditor of the Treasury, made agreeably to law, containing copies of such accounts as have been rendered by persons charged or entrusted with the disbursement or application of moneys granted by Congress for the service of the Indians, from the 1st October, 1845, to the 30th September, 1846, inclusive, together with a statement containing a list of the names of all persons to whom such moneys or effects have been delivered, within the same period, specifying the amount and object for which they were intended, the amount accounted for, and the balance remaining in the hands of each person, or otherwise disposed of, and by whom.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BREESE presented the petition of Dorothy Payne, widow of Adams Payne, deceased, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, praying that she may be allowed a pension.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. DOUGLAS presented the petition of David B. Sears, of Illinois, praying the right of pre-emption to a certain tract of land.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

LEGISLATIVE RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CLARKE presented resolutions of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations in favor of a rail road from Lake Michigan to the Pacific coast, and the appropriation of public lands on the route for the purpose of effecting that object.

Ordered, That the resolutions be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HALE asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers of William Fuller and Orlando Saltmarsh.

Mr. STURGEON asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the memorial of Titian R. Peale, and accompanying documents.

Mr. NILES asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers of Abel Gay and Walter Loomis, with a view of having them referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. NILES gave notice that he should, at an early day, ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill for the relief of Thomas Rhodes.

Mr. DICKINSON gave notice that he should, at an early day, ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill for the relief of Asa Waldron.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. BLACK moved the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

[illegible]

ADJOURNING OVER.

[illegible]

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next.

DEATH OF MR. HUNTINGTON.

Mr. NILES [illegible] of the Senate, as follows:

Mr. President: It is a painful duty devolved upon me to announce to the Senate that, during its vacation, one of its members has been removed by death.

The Hon. JABEZ W. HUNTINGTON, a Senator from Connecticut, died at his residence in Norwich, in that State, on the second day of November last. His sickness was short, but severe, which he bore with the Christian fortitude becoming a strong mind, and died with calmness and resignation and an abiding hope of a happy immortality.

Of the public services and private character of my late colleague, I deem it necessary to say but a few words on this occasion. Those who knew him best, and were enabled most justly to appreciate his abilities and manly virtues, will take care that justice be done to his memory.

With the advantages of a regular classical education, Mr. Huntington prepared himself for the legal profession, which he entered upon with a high promise of success, which his talents and industry soon realized. At an early age he attained a reputation and standing at the bar, which commanded the respect of his professional brethren, and the confidence of the public.

In connexion with his professional business, he was for several years associated with the late Judge Gould in a law school, where his lectures evinced the extent and accuracy of his legal acquirements.

From this field of labors he was removed, in 1828, to take a part in the public councils of his State and country—first as a member of the State legislature, then as a representative in the twenty-first Congress of the United States, followed by a re-election to the twenty-second, and again to the twenty-third Congress. During his five years' service in the House of Representatives, he was distinguished for his industry and for his zealous and laborious devotion to public duties. In May, 1834, whilst one year of his congressional term remained, he was called to a seat on the bench of the supreme court of judicature of the State; the arduous and responsible duties of which he discharged for the six years with faithfulness and ability, and to the general acceptance of the public. From this exalted station, in 1840, he was transferred to the Senate of the United States, to fill an unexpired term of four years, and was subsequently re-elected for six years from the 4th of March, 1845.

Of his services in this body—his remarkable industry—his habits of research and investigation—his zealous and laborious devotion to public business—it is not necessary for me to speak, as those of you who were associated with him in these high duties can bear testimony to his labors, his researches and his ability.

If he sometimes displayed the ardor of the partisan, all, I think, will accord to him the merit of frankness, sincerity, and honesty in his opinions and purposes. If zealous as a politician, he was a sincere friend to his country, and ardently sought to advance what he believed to be its highest interests, its most enduring fame.

Both in his public career and in his irreproachable character in the walks of private life, it is sufficient to say that he well sustained the honor of the name he bore, distinguished as it has been in the public history of his native State.

In concluding these remarks, I hope to be excused for alluding to the unexampled bereavements which the Senate has sustained the past year in the death of four of its members, all in the prime of life, all endeared to their associates, and all sustaining a high and honorable standing here and before the country. May these dispensations of providence admonish us that public honors and exalted station do not add the least strength to the tenure by which we hold our lives. May they remind us all that the exciting scenes which surround us, and the deep interest in questions which come before us, may concern us individually but for a day or an hour; and, by moderating the intemperance of partisan zeal, may they dispose the minds of all, at this interesting crisis of our public affairs, to act with moderation and justice, and with a single view to the best and highest interests of our common country.

Mr. NILES concluded by offering the following resolutions:

[illegible]

The resolutions having been adopted,

MONDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1847.

The Hon. JOHN BELL, of the State of Tennessee; the Hon. THOMAS H. BENTON, of the State of Missouri; and the Hon. DAVID L. YULEE, of the State of Florida, appeared in the Senate to-day.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. TURNEY presented the credentials of the Hon. JOHN BELL, elected a Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee, for the term of six years, from and after the 4th day of March, 1847; which were read.

Mr. BELL, having taken the oath of office, which was administered to him at the hands of the VICE PRESIDENT, took his seat.

REPORTS FROM DEPARTMENTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the state of finances; which was read.

Mr. ATHERTON moved that the reports be printed, and that 5,000 extra copies be printed.

Mr. BREESE moved to amend the motion of Mr. ATHERTON, by increasing the number of extra copies to 20,000. He said it was a very important document, and ought to be extensively circulated.

The question being first put upon the larger number, it was, upon a division, agreed to.

Yeas,	-	33
Nays,	-	17
Majority for the motion,		16

Thereupon, it was Ordered, That the report be printed; and that 20,000 copies, in addition to the usual number, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the Report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, exhibiting the operations in that branch of the public service during the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1847; which was read.

On motion of Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That it lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the 22d section of the act of 28th January, 1847, a statement showing the amount of Treasury Notes issued under its provisions, the amount of such Notes redeemed, and the manner in which redeemed; none having been purchased or re-issued under said act; which was read and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 15th of January last, a Report of the Colonel of the corps of Topographical Engineers, communicating information upon the several subjects designated therein, as connected with the commerce of the Western Lakes and Rivers; which was read.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, it was Ordered, That the report be printed, together with five hundred extra copies for the use of the Topographical Bureau.

PETITIONS.

Mr. CAMERON presented the memorial of Bernard Henry, late United States naval store-keeper at Gibralter, praying the payment of a balance due him from the government.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. RUSK presented the memorial of George Hervey, in behalf of the owners and consignees of the English merchant ship, James Mitchell, praying the payment of a sum of money due them under an act of Congress, and retained in the Treasury of the United States.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, asked, and obtained leave, to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers of Margaret Carmick, widow of Daniel Carmick, deceased.

Mr. MASON asked, and obtained leave, to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers of William B. Slaughter.

Mr. CASS asked, and obtained leave, to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers of Henry R. Schoolcraft.

Mr. RUSK asked, and obtained leave, to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers of Bryan Callaghan.

Also, the petition and papers of E. P. Calkin, & Co.

Mr. BREESE asked, and obtained leave, to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers of the heirs of James Rumsey, deceased.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE STATE OF MAINE.

Mr. BRADBURY presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Maine in favor of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific coast, upon the plan of Asa Whitney, Esq. of New York; and requesting the Senators and Representatives from that State in Congress by their votes and acts to promote said object; which were ordered to be printed.

INCREASE IN COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEVIER submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That during the present session the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate consist of seven members.

Mr. MANGUM submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That during the present session the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate consist of seven members.

THE RIVER SABINE.

Mr. JOHNSON, of La., submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to remove obstructions to the navigation of the river Sabine, and that the Resolution of the Legislature of Louisiana, the report and papers on file in relation thereto, be referred to the said Committee.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER the Senate proceeded to the election of a Secretary, pursuant to the 49th rule.

On counting the ballots it appeared that 48 votes had been given, of which Mr. Asbury Dickens received 46; Mr. B. B. French, 1; and one blank.

Mr. DICKENS having been declared duly elected attended; and the oaths prescribed by law were administered to him by the VICE PRESIDENT.

The Senate proceeded to the election of a Sergeant-at-Arms and door keeper, pursuant to the 49th rule.

On counting the ballots it appeared that 49 votes had been given, of which Mr. Robert Beale received 37; Mr. Nuttall 6; Mr. Cranston Lowry 1; Mr. C. S. Whitney 2; Mr. J. B. Macy 1; and two blanks.

Mr. BEALE, having been declared duly elected, attended; and the oaths prescribed by law were administered to him by the VICE PRESIDENT.

The Senate proceeded to the election of an assistant door-keeper, pursuant to the 49th rule.

On counting the ballots it appeared that 50 votes had been given, of which Mr. Isaac Holland received 49; and there was one blank.

Mr. HOLLAND having been declared duly elected, attended; and the oaths prescribed by law were administered to him by the VICE PRESIDENT.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message from the House of Representatives, was received by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President.—The House of Representatives have passed a joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee of three members of each House, to direct and superintend the expenditure of all moneys appropriated for the purchase of books for the Library of Congress, and all such other matters pertaining to the said Library not otherwise provided for by law, in which I am directed to request the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Mr. PRESTON, and Mr. MCKEON have been appointed the said committee on the part of the House.

The House of Representatives has also passed a joint resolution that two Chaplains to Congress of different denominations be elected, one by each House, to officiate during the present session, and that they shall interchange weekly; in which I am directed to request the concurrence of the Senate.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution from the House of Representatives, for the election of the two Chaplains of different denominations, one by each House, to officiate during the present session, who shall interchange weekly.

The question being upon agreeing to said resolution, it was

Resolved, That the Senate concur therein.

Mr. ATCHISON moved to proceed to the election of Chaplain.

Mr. WESTCOTT inquired whether it would not be proper first to inform the House of the concurrence of the Senate in the joint resolution for the election of Chaplains. He did not mean to object to the election taking place promptly.

Mr. SEVIER renewed the motion of Mr. ATCHISON, and

The Senate proceeded to the election of a Chaplain on their part.

On counting the ballots it appeared that 49 votes had been given, of which the Rev. Henry Slicer received 31; Rev. Mr. Gurley, 7; Rev. David Smith, 7; Rev. Mr. Matthews, 1.

The Rev. Mr. SLICER was declared duly elected Chaplain on the part of the Senate.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEVIER moved to proceed to the election of standing committees, which was agreed to.

Mr. MANGUM observed that the Chairman of the Committees having been informally agreed upon, it would be useless to go through with the tedious process of balloting for them. He therefore moved that so much of the 34th rule as requires their appointment by ballot be dispensed with; which was agreed to.

On motion, by Mr. MANGUM, the following Chairmen of the several committees were appointed:

Mr. SEVIER—Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.
Mr. ATHERTON—Chairman on the Committee of Finance.
Mr. DIX—Chairman of the Committee on Commerce.
Mr. DICKINSON—Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures.
Mr. STURGEON—Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.
Mr. CASS—Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.
Mr. FAIRFIELD—Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.
Mr. RUSK—Chairman of the Committee on the Militia.
Mr. BREESE—Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands.
Mr. YULEE.—Chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims.
Mr. ATCHISON.—Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.
Mr. MASON.—Chairman of the Committee on Claims.
Mr. BRIGHT.—Chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.
Mr. ASHLEY.—Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.
Mr. NILES.—Chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.
Mr. HANNEGAN.—Chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals.
Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana.—Chairman of the Committee on Pensions.
Mr. CAMERON.—Chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia.
Mr. WESTCOTT.—Chairman of the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.
Mr. TURNEY.—Chairman of the Committee on Retrenchment.
Mr. DOUGLAS—Chairman of the Committee on Territories.
Mr. HUNTER—Chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings.
Mr. FELCH—Chairman of the Committee to audit and control the contingent expenses of the Senate.
Mr. BRADBURY—Chairman of the Committee on Printing.
Mr. DOWNS—Chairman of the Committee on Engrossed Bills.
Mr. PEARCE—Chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library.
Mr. RUSK—Chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

On motion of Mr. MANGUM, it was Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is now ready to proceed to the business for which the two Houses have been convened by the President.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution from the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee of three members of each House to direct and superintend the expenditure of all moneys appropriated for the purchase of books for the Library of Congress, and all such other matters pertaining to said Library not otherwise provided for by law.

The question being upon agreeing to said resolution,

Resolved, That the Senate concur therein.

NOTICE OF BILL.

Mr. DIX gave notice that he should, on to-morrow or at some early day, ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill concerning certain Collection Districts, and for other purposes.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1847.

COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Register of the Treasury, made agreeably to law accompanied by statements of the Commerce and Navigation of the United States.

Mr. DIX moved that it lie on the table and be printed, and that 2,500 extra copies be printed; 250 thereof for the use of the Secretary of the Treasury, and 250 for the use of the Register of the Treasury.

Mr. NILES inquired whether the number that it was now proposed to print, was the largest number which had ever been ordered of this document?

Mr. DIX replied that he did not recollect that a larger number had been ordered; at least, since he became a member of the Senate.

Mr. NILES.—In my opinion, this document appears to be, above all others, entitled to consideration; and if any of the documents which have been presented to us justifies us in incurring an expenditure of the public money in order that it may be diffused throughout the country, the report from the Treasury Department is certainly that document. It is an exposition of facts, not of theories; not of speculations; not of the favorite views of any officer of this government, or of any body else. It discloses what the enterprise of our citizens has accomplished. It shows the actual and existing state of the commerce of the country, the resources of the country, and one very important branch of its vast and growing interests. I propose the printing of five thousand additional numbers.

Mr. DIX.—I concur in what the Senator from Connecticut has said in regard to the value of this document; I cheerfully second his motion.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I would ask the honorable Senator from New York whether the number given to the Treasury Department, indicated by him, is sufficient? I have understood that a large number was needed for distribution in return for similar favors, from the governments of other countries. I am inclined to believe that five hundred copies will be necessary to supply the department.

Mr. DIX.—I find, on reference to the journals of last winter, that seventeen hundred and fifty copies were ordered to be printed in addition to the usual number; two hundred and fifty for the use of the Treasury Department, leaving fifteen hundred for general distribution. The next day, on motion made by myself, two hundred and fifty additional copies of the report were ordered to be printed; and, I believe on a subsequent day, an additional number of copies were ordered for the use of the Register. It therefore appears that last year the Treasury Department had five hundred copies for distribution; and I now move that that number of this year's report be placed at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—I beg leave to ask the Senator from New York what particular distribution of this document the Register or the Treasury proposes to make? I desire to know the reason why he, any more than any other subordinate officer, should be furnished with the document.

Mr. DIX.—The report is made by the Register of the Treasury. It is at his office that the tables are prepared. When the document is distributed it is seen that it emanates from the office of the Register, and applications for copies are frequently made to his office. There is no other reason why that officer should be supplied with copies of the document. But if it be deemed best to do so, the whole of the copies ordered may be placed at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury, who can then supply the Register with as many copies as he may require.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—I take this occasion to say that I concur with the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut in regard to the importance and value of this document. I do not know, however, but that the number usually printed has answered the purpose very well. But the document is, as the Senator correctly describes it, a report of facts, and facts which are extremely interesting to the commercial community, as well as every body else. It contains the results of the commercial operations of the year, and discloses also facts in regard to navigation. I speak now of the foreign commerce of the country. It is exceedingly desirable, and for a great length of time has been a desideratum, that this branch of inquiry should be extended a good deal farther. It is desirable that we should understand something of the statistics of the coasting trade of the country—of internal navigation of that description. A document of that character would, in my judgment greatly surpass the value of the document now before us, great as the value of that paper undoubtedly is. I hope, sir, that before Congress closes its sessions, some measures may be adopted for the purpose of obtaining statistics in regard to the condition and progress of that branch of our commerce, which is so interesting to us all, and is increasing so rapidly. I shall make no objection to the number stated by the member from Connecticut, but I hope that we are not going to run a little too diffusive in printing.

Mr. DIX.—One word in order to correct an inadvertence. I stated that two hundred and fifty copies had been ordered for the use of the Register of the Treasury; but I find on reference to the Journal, that the order was for the use of the Treasury Department in general. I also find, that on motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania on my right, [Mr. CAMERON,] three thousand additional copies were ordered to be printed nearly two months after the report was presented. I, therefore, move that five thousand additional copies be printed, and an additional five hundred for the use of the Treasury Department, making no special provision for the Register, who can obtain the copies which he may need from the Secretary.

The amendment was then put, and was agreed to; and the resolution as thus amended, was adopted.

Ordered, That it be printed; and that 5,500 copies, in addition to the usual number, be printed; 500 copies of which to be for the use of the Treasury Department.

PETITIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented the memorial of Mary L. Keen, widow and administratrix of Elisha L. Keen, deceased, praying the repayment of money advanced by her late husband for the use of the government; which was referred to the Committee on Claims,

Also, the petition of James Womsby, a soldier in the revolutionary war, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, additional documents relating to the memorial of Francis O. Dorr and Andrew C. Dorr; which, with the petition and papers on the table, were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented the petition of William Nation and Rachael Davis, heirs of Christopher Nation, deceased, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, praying to be allowed bounty lands; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. STURGEON presented the memorial of Eveline Porter, widow of Commodore David Porter, deceased, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of Lemuel B. Nicholls, praying compensation for services in assisting in the emigration of the Creek Indians, in 1827 and 1828, and for a horse lost while on that duty; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. PEARCE presented the petition of Thomas P. McBlair, a Purser in the Navy, praying that certain payments made by him to officers holding acting appointments in the Navy, may be allowed in the settlement of his accounts; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted additional documents relating to the claim of John Bruce; which, with his petition on the files of the Senate, were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr RUSK, it was Ordered, That the memorial of George Herrew be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Margaret Carmick, widow of Daniel Carmick, deceased, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Nehemiah Brush be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. FAIRFIELD, it was Ordered, That the petition of Stephen Snow be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. FAIRFIELD, it was Ordered, That the petition of Walter R. Johnson be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was Ordered, That the petition of Calvin Emmons, and the petition of the heirs of Uri Emmons, deceased, on the files of the Senate, be severally referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion by Mr. UPHAM, it was Ordered, That the petition of James Smalley, agent for certain companies of Vermont Militia, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. UPHAM, it was Ordered, That the petition of Nahum Haskell, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. GREENE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Robert Purkis, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. GREENE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Mary MacRae, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, it was Ordered, That the petition of David Currier, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. ASHLEY, it was Ordered, That the documents on the files of the Senate, relating to the claim of Peter Engles, senior, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. ASHLEY, it was

CLERK TO COMMITTEE OF CLAIMS.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims, be and they are hereby authorized to employ a Clerk during the present session of Congress.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR.

Mr. NILES submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Auditors of the Treasury, the Chiefs of the Bureaus of the Navy Department, and the Assistant Postmasters-General, be entitled to seats on the floor of the Senate.

The consideration of the resolution being asked for at this time, objection was made, and it was laid over one day, under the rule.

ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY.

Mr. DICKINSON submitted the following resolutions for consideration; which were read and ordered to be printed.

Resolved, That true policy requires the government of the United States to strengthen its political and commercial relations upon this continent by the annexation of such contiguous territory as may conduce to that end and can be justly obtained, and that neither in such acquisition nor in the territorial organization thereof can any conditions be constitutionally imposed or institutions be provided for or established inconsistent with the right of the people thereof to form a free sovereign State, with the powers and privileges of the original members of the confederacy.

Resolved, That in organizing a territorial government for territory belonging to the United States, the principles of self-government upon which our federative system rests will be best promoted—the true spirit and meaning of the constitution be observed, and the confederacy strengthened by leaving all questions concerning the domestic policy therein to the Legislatures chosen by the people thereof.

THE RIVER SABINE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to remove the obstructions to the navigation of the river Sabine, and that the resolution of the Legislature of Louisiana, the report and papers on file in relation thereto, be referred to the said committee.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

The Senate proceeded to the election of the remaining members of the standing committees.

Mr. SEVIER then presented a list of the members of the various committees; which was read and adopted.

Mr. HALE remarked, that he noticed his name on one or more of the committees just announced; he must throw himself on the indulgence of the Senate, and ask if it was consistent with the usages of the Senate, that he might be excused from serving on any of the standing committees of the Senate at the present session. He made this request from motives personal to himself, with which he would not trouble the Senate; but he had an additional inducement in the statement first made by the honorable Senator from Arkansas, that those committees had been agreed upon by an arrangement between the two parties which divide this body. As the political party with which the journals of the day had classed him, and he supposed that was the only means of ascertaining where he belonged, had had no meeting, and had not been consulted in this arrangement, he thought that that furnished an additional reason for excusing him.

Mr. WESTCOTT moved that the Senator from New Hampshire be excused from serving on the committees on which he had been named, and then observed, that other members had been excused at their request, from serving on any of the committees—he referred to the Senators from South Carolina, Ohio, and Alabama, [Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. ALLEN, and Mr. BAGBY,] the last of whom was now absent.

Mr. BADGER.—I beg leave to say one word on this subject. I cannot conceive that any reason has been offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, why he should be personally excused from taking his proper share in the discharge of the business duties of any member of this body. He is a gentleman of known and acknowledged talents. He is capable of rendering efficient services to the Senate in the discharge of any of the duties which belong to any of the committees of this body. He has been named upon several committees on which he may be useful to the country, and to the Senate. The peculiar position, which he represents himself as occupying in regard to the political parties which divide this body, can certainly have no influence in support of the application which he has made to the Senate; because, if my memory serve me right, he has not been placed on any committee, the action of which can be supposed to be influenced directly or indirectly by political considerations. It, therefore, appears to me, sir, that the application of the honorable gentleman amounts simply to a request that he, a member of this body, competent to render services in the transaction of business, should be relieved from assuming the due burden which belongs to the high and responsible station which he occupies. I am sure, that in that point of view, the gentleman from New Hampshire would not be willing to accept of an immunity not possessed by his brethren on this floor. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman will withdraw his application, or that the Senate will not accede to it.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I made the motion at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire; and it appears to me, that the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] has lost sight of the reason assigned by that gentleman for the application which he had made, apart from the political consideration to which he had adverted. The Senator, it will be recollected, rested the application upon personal grounds, and I presume it will not be deemed necessary that that reason should be stated more explicitly than it had been.

Mr. BADGER.—I am certain that I also could assign personal reasons for being excused from serving on committees. I confess, I am just as willing as any other gentleman of this body, to be confined to a particular hour for particular business; but, when I came here, I did not expect to come for the purpose of enjoying my ease, and leaving to others the performance of the laborious duties which belong to this station. And allow me to add, sir, that the personal appearance of the gentleman from New Hampshire, as I am happy to be able to say, does not present any evidence of physical inability to discharge those duties, for which we all know him to possess, in a high degree, the mental qualifications.

The question was then put, and appeared to be decided in the negative.

A division was then called for, and the result was as follows: ayes 17, noes 16.

So the motion was adopted, and the Senator from New Hampshire was excused from serving on the committees.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That the Vice President be authorized to fill the vacancies.

The following is a list of the committees, in full, as they now stand:

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BREESE asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to reduce and graduate the price of public lands; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

JOSEPH WILSON.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BREESE asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Joseph Wilson; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SURETIES OF SWARTWOUT.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. DIX asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make an arrangement or compromise with Mangle M. Quackenboss, and his co-obligors, or any of them, for claims or bonds given by them as cureties to the United States, which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COLLECTION DISTRICT, ETC.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. DIX asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill concerning certain collection districts, and for other purposes; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BRANCH MINT AT NEW YORK.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. DIX asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to establish a branch of the mint of the United States in the city of New York; which was read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

REGULATION OF SEAMEN.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. DICKINSON asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the act entitled "An act for the regulation of seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States," passed the 3d of March, 1813.

Mr. DICKINSON.—Under the somewhat far-fetched title, we have the act under which foreigners become citizens of the United States. The twelfth section of that act, however, enables them to become citizens only after declaring their intentions without leave at the time being five years, and in the territory of the United States. It has been decided, and undoubtedly the decision is correct, that involuntarily setting foot on a foreign shore, prevents the person from receiving the benefit of the act. The object of this bill is to strike out the words "without being at any time," &c. so that if the person to whom the act appears remain bona fide residents of the United States, although it may happen that by accident, and involuntarily they set foot on foreign territory, they shall be entitled to all the benefits of the law. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ask its early consideration, in the hope that the benefits which it is proposed to extend to the many persons who have declared, or may declare their intentions to become entitled to the privileges of citizenship, may be extended as speedily as possible.

By unanimous consent of the Senate, the bill then had a first and second reading, and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FLORIDA TREATY.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. WESTCOTT asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill further to carry into effect the provisions and stipulations of the 9th article of the Florida treaty with respect to certain losses of Spanish subjects, in West Florida; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, together with the papers on file relating thereto.

DAVID SHAW, ET AL.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BRADBURY asked and obtained leave to bring in a joint resolution in favor of David Shaw and Solomon T. Corser; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, together with the papers on file.

NOTICE OF BILLS, ETC.

Mr. MILLER gave notice that on to-morrow, or at some early day, he should ask leave of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution, authorizing the erection on the public grounds, in the city of Washington, of a monument to George Washington.

Mr. GREENE gave notice that on to-morrow, or at some early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill for the relief of Mary McRae.

Mr. BREESE gave notice that on to-morrow, or at some early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill to compensate John M. Moore.

Mr. UPHAM gave notice that he should, on to-morrow, or at some early day, ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill changing the places, and fixing the times, for holding the circuit and district courts in the District of Vermont.

Mr. UNDERWOOD gave notice, that on to-morrow, or at some early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill to allow further time for satisfying certain land warrants, etc.

Mr. DOUGLAS gave notice, that on to-morrow, or at some early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill to divide the District of Illinois into two judicial districts.

On motion by Mr. ASHLEY, it was Ordered, That so much of the message of the President of the United States as relates to the establishment of competent tribunals to try and punish crimes, and exercise jurisdiction in civil cases in China, where American citizens are concerned, by virtue of our treaty with that power, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DISTRIBUTION OF BOOKS.

Mr. CAMERON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish each member of the present Congress a set of the works severally from the same number of copies of the congressional and other books ordered to be distributed to the Senators by the resolutions of February 19, 1845.

Mr. SEVIER moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken. He observed that there had been a battle about these books every year for the last seventeen or eighteen years; and he hoped that the Senator from Pennsylvania would permit the vote to be reconsidered, and not press the adoption of the resolution at this time.

Mr. CAMERON.—The Senator from Arkansas has received, I believe, all these books, and I only ask that the new Senators may receive as many as he has received.

Mr. SEVIER.—I suppose that the Senator when he made a motion of this kind would have some data to go upon, that we might be informed as to the cost. It will be, I venture to say, voting seven or eight hundred dollars in addition to the pay of each Senator, if these books are to be furnished—and where is it to end? There seems to be a particular anxiety upon this subject, and so eagerly has it been pursued, that we have frequently nearly lost the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill in consequence of it. Why, I have seen the two Houses of Congress at daggers-points in regard to it. Now, where is all this to end? How much is it going to cost the government? At the last session we passed a resolution to put upon our tables some twelve or fourteen copies of the proceedings of this body; and to this expense you are going to add the expense of furnishing these books. This is a very important matter, and it is now pushed forward without anybody knowing anything of the matter; it was only by accident that I noticed the resolution. But the Senator says I have received my portion of the books. I have taken mine, it is true, but they are no manner of use to me; and now, forsooth, because they have been heretofore distributed to Senators, every new Senator who comes in here must be supplied. There will be no end to it. And I will also remark, as my friend from Missouri stated at the last session, these books are often drawn and sold to booksellers in this city, and again purchased by order of Congress for distribution There should be a stop put to this practice, especially at such a time as this, when we are pressed for money to carry on a foreign war in which the country is engaged. I think it is time to put a stop to these expenditures, and I think that these books which can be found in the library, and referred to at any time, and which any Senator may take to his room, and have the use of for the whole of the session; books which are merely valuable for occasional reference while engaged in our congressional duties, need not be again procured for distribution to Senators. I hope the vote will be reconsidered with the view of postponing the matter, at least, till we know the amount of the expense which will be necessarily incurred. I trust the Senator will agree to its postponement for a few days, that the honorable Senator from Missouri may be present when the vote is taken upon it.

Mr. CAMERON.—I believe, sir, this debate is out of order, the resolution having been adopted.

Mr. SEVIER.—I have moved a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. CAMERON —I was perfectly willing that my friend, the Senator from Arkansas, should make his speech upon the subject; but I would be better satisfied, if there are objections to the resolution on the part of the new Senators, to hear those objections stated by them. It appears to me rather extraordinary, that a Senator who has been here so long, almost, that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, and who has always received his due proportion in the distribution of these books, should be so averse, as the Senator from Arkansas says, that the distinguished Senator is, to the extension of the same privileges to other Senators. The Senator from Missouri is certainly very high authority; I am always happy to see him here, but the business of this body, I apprehend, should not be delayed by reason of his absence. I only rose, however, to reply to the remarks made by the Senator from Arkansas, that members of this body had received these books and sold them to the booksellers in this city. I have unlimited confidence certainly in the Senator from Arkansas, and am ready to attach much weight to any statement made by him; but I do not believe that any man who ever had the honor of a seat upon this floor would be guilty of so base an act as to receive these books and sell them. I would not make an assertion of that kind unless I were able to produce the names of those who were guilty of such discreditable and ungentlemanly conduct.

Mr. SEVIER.—I merely referred to what was stated by the Senator from Missouri, in his place in the Senate at the last session, that such things had occurred. The Senator assured us that books had been drawn by members of Congress, whether of this House or the other, he did not expressly state, and that those books had been disposed of in this city to booksellers, and the same books purchased again, and placed upon our tables; and I will add, that I have additional reason to believe that such things have been done. I have reason to believe that the books thus drawn have been sold by members of Congress; and, sir, in regard to these books all I have to say is, that I have voted against their distribution from the time that I first became a member of this body. They are of some little value certainly for reference, and nothing more; and for this purpose members of Congress have every facility afforded them—they have access to the library where these books are to be found, and they may take them to their rooms, and keep them throughout the whole session; there is, therefore, no necessity for distributing them. But I do not propose further to debate a matter of this kind. I shall content myself with asking for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NILES.—It seems to me that the resolution is a very extraordinary one. Hitherto resolutions of this kind have been confined to a certain class of books which have been assumed to be necessary for Senators to possess. But it seems that this resolution embraces other books—books for distribution. If I understand the reading of the resolution, it is confined to those books which were ordered to be distributed among Senators at the last session. Now, in regard to this subject, generally, I can say with the Senator from Arkansas, that I have always regarded the practice of distributing books among Senators as not very creditable to the Senate. I have always believed that providing ourselves with political libraries at the public expense was not a very honorable proceeding. I admit, as everybody must, that these publications are of considerable value, yet, I can say for myself, that however valuable that source of information may be, I have derived very little benefit from it. I have received no books since I have been a member of this body, except what are called the State papers, and these I have found of very little use to me. In regard to the books which were voted to Senators at the last session consisting of thirty odd volums of the proceedings of Congress, going back to a very early period, I have received them, but they will be of no use for the short time I shall remain here, inasmuch as they were sent to me at my residence, though they might have been of some little use if they had been allowed to remain here. I have continued to get along without any such aid in the discharge of my duties here, and I have not perceived that the light to be thus derived is very essential to guide us in the discharge of those duties. I have, therefore, not felt authorized to vote for any resolution for distributing books, nor can I vote for this proposition.

Mr. MANGUM.—I hope that the vote will be reconsidered. This is a subject which has attracted the attention of Congress for the last fifteen years. My position in this body has imposed upon me almost the necessity of inquiring into this subject as early as the session of 1833–'34. Very large and improvident contracts have been made involving the means in the Treasury to the amount of several hundred thousand dollars, and Congress felt constrained to lay violent hands on these contracts and agree to compromises, perhaps, exceeding the bounds of moderation. Notwithstanding efforts made ten or fifteen years ago, which in this body seemed entirely successful, to put an end these expenditures, yet we are called upon from time to time to make appropriations to meet them. My impression is, that under any action of this body it will be impossible entirely to arrest, what I regard as a discreditable and pernicious system. I hope that the vote will be reconsidered, and that some action will be had that will lead to a diminution of the evil. My impression is, however, that it will be found impossible to prevent this Congress from making appropriations in some form for these objects. At the very heel of the last session a resolution was passed making an appropriation of these books almost unanimously, though it had not my concurrence. I am perfectly willing, however, that Senators should receive these books now for the last time, though I shall not vote for the resolution. I hope it will be reconsidered, and that it will go to the Joint Committee on the Library, or some other committee and that a bill will be reported to put an end to this system of expenditure so unbecoming in a legislative body. I have no objections, sir, that in some form or other an appropriation should be made by which the new Senators shall be supplied with these books. I shall be content if this be done, though I cannot vote for it; but this being done, I should, before other new claimants come, claiming to be placed upon the same footing with those to whom books have been already distributed, put an end to the system. I would not press the immediate adoption of what might be considered an invidious distinction, but I do hope that after the distribution shall be made to those who are now Senators, that we shall put an end to this evil forever.

Mr. FOOTE.—I think it due to myself that I should not be misunderstood in regard to this question. I happen to be one of that class which is spoken of as new Senators, and the interesting question seems to be whether we should receive these books, the titles of which I scarcely know, the value of which I cannot estimate, and in relation to which I am altogether misinformed. I am, therefore, entirely indifferent upon the subject, but, as I find that there is opposition existing to the proposition, I shall undoubtedly unite with that opposition. If there be any doubt as to the propriety of the measure, it should be voted down at once; it should not be tolerated for a moment. I will not undertake to say, new as I am to the station I hold, that it would be improper to distribute these books according to the proposition, but I do undertake to say, that if the act be improper, I should scorn to receive the benefit of it. If I doubt the power of the donor, I should scorn to be the donee. If I doubt the right of the distributor, I should scorn to be the distributee. If books are distributed to me, I should certainly not receive them unless I felt conscientiously authorized to do so. I trust I shall never be found indulging in that sort of peddling of small wares; and I agree most fully with the Senator from Arkansas, that if they to whom the books have been heretofore distributed, have disposed of them in the manner he states, such persons should be exposed and held up to public infamy.

Mr. SEVIER.—I perceive that the resolution refers to a previous one. I should like to know what books were embraced in that resolution?

The Secretary then read the resolutions as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to procure for the use of the Senate 2,000 copies of the authentic copy of the constitution, with an analytical index and compilation of other public documents, recently printed and placed in the hands of the members, provided the price shall not exceed the sum of one dollar and twenty five cents per copy.

Resolved, That he obtain additional copies of the authentic copy of the constitution, with an analytical index, &c., as printed for the use of the Senate, provided, they will be furnished at a reduction of twenty per cent. on the price above stated.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to furnish each member of the present Senate who has not already received them, such books as were furnished to the members of the House of Representatives of the 30th and 31st Congress—including the 14th volume of Register of Debates, the Congressional Globe and Appendix, published by Blair & Rives, and Ethan A. Brown's Edition of the United States Statutes at large.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I have been a good many years in this body, and I believe I have voted steadily against all these propositions to distribute these books, and yet I have felt a good deal of embarrassment upon the subject. When the books have been offered to me I have hesitated whether I should take them, but knowing they must go to somebody, I concluded in my own mind I ought to take them. I have always believed that among the smaller abuses of the government expenditures this is the greatest; and I am willing to give up to any new member that may desire them, that portion of the books which have fallen to my share. I have never derived five dollars advantage from them since the first day they encumbered the shelves of my library. I was not a little surprised when I received a letter from one of the messengers of the body, informing me that there were two boxes of books for me, for I knew not a word about the resolution which passed at the last session. The books were by my direction sent to my rooms in this city. I found them packed in two large boxes, which I have not opened, and whom I should believe I could ascertaining the contents. I appeal to the new members of this body whether this thing ought to go on forever, and if not, when can there be a more favorable time for putting a stop to it. It is a very great abuse. These books have accumulated from year to year, and if the system be allowed to go on for ten years longer, as it has done for the last ten, a whole library will be voted to each new Senator. I shall vote for the reconsideration.

The question being put upon the reconsideration of the vote, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. MANGUM then moved that the resolution be referred to the Joint Committee on the Library.

Mr. CAMERON said it was supposed that it should be referred to that committee. My object in proposing the adoption of the resolution, was only to act courteously to the new Senators. I thought it better that the question should be determined at the early part of the session, than to defer it to the end—for I have heard complaints in every session of the introduction of resolutions of this description near the end of a session, when they are necessarily hurried through without much examination. I am glad that my friend from North Carolina has made this motion; I shall willingly support.

Mr. MANGUM. I am sure that the Senator will feel that no reproach was intended to be cast upon him by me in the early introduction of the subject, for we all know that these things sometimes passed through at the heel of the session and pass undetected. Last winter this resolution, I recollect, was passed by a thin Senate, after the lighting of candles on the last day of the session; and I will repeat, that as this practice has been so uniform, and has grown to be so inveterate, I really think some means ought to be taken to put an end to it. It cannot certainly be considered discourteous or unjust, if, after the distribution be made to those Senators who have taken their seats during this session, the door should be closed upon any future appropriation of this character.

Mr. HALE.—As one of the new members of this body, permit me for myself individually to say, that I hope the matter will be disposed of without any reference to what may be considered the personal claims of new Senators to be furnished with these books. It appears to me that it is not the true policy to say that we will do wrong this once. I think the true way is to begin to do right now. If the plea of "just this once" be allowed to prevail, that plea will be just as good at the next session as now. The true course will be to begin to do right now, and let me hope that such a course will be taken as will forever put a stop to the abuse which has so long existed. Senators may recollect, that at the 28th Congress an appropriation was made out of the contingent fund of the House. I hope it will now be effectually stopped, so that even indirectly it cannot be continued; and, as one of the new Senators, to whom reference has been made, I am, for myself, perfectly willing to be made an example of in this instance—to have its first operation applied to myself.

Mr. MANGUM.—The Senator from New Hampshire entirely misconceives my meaning, if he understands me to say I would favor the doing wrong "this once." I said distinctly I would vote against it, as I have uniformly done heretofore; but I also said I would be content that the distribution should take place to those who are new Senators; and I said, also, that I apprehended that in some form or other it would unquestionably pass during this Congress.

Mr. SEVIER.—"This once" has been the cry since this system commenced, and I believe with the Senator from North Carolina, that it will pass in some form or other before we adjourn.

The question being put on the reference to the Committee on the Library, the motion was agreed to.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1847.

REPORT OF THE COAST SURVEY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report made to the Treasury Department, by the superintendent of the Coast Survey, showing the progress of that work during the year ending October, 1847; which was read.

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was Ordered, That it be printed, and that 1,250 copies in addition to the usual number be printed for the use of the Senate, 250 of which to be sent to the superintendent.

Ordered, That the petition of Bryan Callaghan, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the [illegible] Petition [illegible] have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That William Saunders and William B. Porter, [illegible] of William Estis, have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. FAIRFIELD, it was Ordered, That Samuel A. Morse, have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Messrs. MANGUM, JOHNSON, of Louisiana, FELCH, and MASON, gave notice that on to-morrow, or at some early day, they would ask leave of the Senate to introduce [illegible] and joint resolutions.

PAYMENT FOR HORSES LOST IN THE MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. ATCHISON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

[illegible] That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of [illegible] Act, entitled "An Act making appropriations for the payment of certain Rangers therein mentioned," approved August 4, 1842, [illegible] applying the provisions of the same to the volunteers who have been engaged in the [illegible] Mexico, and [illegible] Act, entitled "An Act to authorize the payment for horses lost in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1847, [illegible] and [illegible] of other [illegible] and [illegible] Mexico.

THE WAR WITH MEXICO.

Mr. CALHOUN submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

[illegible] That the Government of Mexico, [illegible] with the character and genius, and in the end, subversive of our free and popular institutions.

[illegible] That the [illegible] Mexico [illegible]

On motion by Mr. CALHOUN, it was Ordered, That the resolutions be printed.

[illegible]

Mr. DOWNS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire whether [illegible] provided at New Orleans, for the better accommodation of wounded, invalid, and [illegible] Mexico; [illegible] and [illegible] return [illegible]

The [illegible]

Mr. DOWNS rose and said: I will remark in reference to the resolution, that there is an urgent necessity that some provision should be made for the sick and disabled soldiers returning from Mexico. All, or a large portion of them, embark at New Orleans; and a still larger portion of them return by that route, entirely destitute, and although there are means to a limited extent in the barracks and institutions of the city, yet so great is the number of the sick and disabled, that those means are altogether inadequate. It is therefore highly important—in fact it is essentially necessary—that some permanent provision should be made for the relief of these men. I believe, I may say, that the Secretary of War, and General Brooke, who are both in possession of a knowledge of these facts, will fully concur in the measures contemplated by this resolution. I have not thought it necessary to make any specific suggestions myself, in regard to carrying into effect the objects of the resolution, as I think it will be much better left in charge of the able Committee on Military Affairs; and I desire to call the attention of the committee to the subject at this time, as General Brooke is now in this city, and will be willing to furnish the committee with any information they may require upon this subject.

The resolution, having been considered by unanimous consent, was agreed to.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. NILES:

Resolved, That the Auditor of the Treasury for Claims of the Bureau of the Navy be allowed on the Accounts and Pensions Bureau, [illegible] on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. NILES having submitted a modification of the resolution, said: I will merely observe that I am not disposed unnecessarily to increase the number of those who shall be admitted to the privilege of the floor of the Senate chamber; but, I think that, in regard to the persons named in this resolution, there is a manifest propriety in admitting them; for, if there be any persons admitted, it should be those who, it may be supposed, from the nature of their official duties, may have some occasion, in connection with those duties to enter the chamber in order to see chairmen of committees; and I believe that the officers named in this resolution are in that situation. This privilege is extended to many as an act of courtesy and respect, such as members of State Legislatures, and others; but Senators must all be aware that the men who are connected with the details of public service are the men who should enjoy this privilege, in order that they may suffer no inconvenience in the discharge of their public duties.

The resolution as modified was then agreed to, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the Auditor of the Bureau of the Treasury, War, Navy, and Post Office Department be entitled to the floor of the Senate.

PROTECTION OF PASSENGERS ON STEAM VESSELS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire whether any [illegible] are necessary in regard to navigation by steam, for the preservation and protection of passengers.

U. S. COURTS OF VERMONT.

Agreeably to notice Mr. UPHAM asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill changing the places and fixing the times for holding the Circuit and District Courts in the district of Vermont; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. MILLER asked and obtained leave to bring in a joint resolution, authorizing the erection, on the public grounds, in the city of Washington, of a monument to George Washington: which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolutions, submitted yesterday by Mr. DICKINSON:

Resolved, That the policy to be [illegible] the Government of the United States to [illegible] on its political and commercial relations upon this continent by the annexation of such contiguous territory as may conduce to that end, and can be justly obtained; and that neither in such acquisition nor in the territorial organization thereof, can any conditions be constitutionally imposed, or institutions be provided for or established, incon[illegible] with the principles hereof, to impair the [illegible] States, or any of them, to [illegible] powers and privileges of the original members of the confederacy.

Resolved, That in organizing a territorial government for territory belonging to the United States, the principles of self-government, upon which our federative system rests, will be best promoted—the true spirit and meaning of the constitution be observed, and the [illegible] be [illegible] by leaving all questions concerning its domestic policy thereon to the Legislatures chosen by the people thereof.

Mr. DICKINSON remarked that he would not press the consideration of these resolutions at this time, but that he would call them up after the holidays, when the Senate should be full. He therefore moved that they be passed over for the present, which was agreed to.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1847.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. MANGUM presented the credentials of the honorable JOHN MACPHERSON BERRIEN, elected a Senator of the United States from the State of Georgia, for the term of six years from and after the 4th day of March, 1847, which were read.

Mr. BERRIEN, having taken the oath of office, which was administered to him by the VICE PRESIDENT, took his seat in the Senate.

ROUTE TO CALIFORNIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 9th instant, a report from the Colonel of the Corps of Topographical Engineers, with a copy of notes of the military reconnoissance of the route from Fort Leavenworth, in Missouri, to San Diego, in California, by Lieutenant William H. Emory, of the Topographical Engineers, with the map of the said route, and of the Arkansas, Del Norte and Gila rivers; as also the report of Colonel Philip St. George Cooke's route to California, after diverging from the track of General Kearney.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That they be printed.

Mr. PEARCE remarked that as these reports contained information that was interesting and valuable, he would submit a resolution to print an extra number of copies; but he would not ask for its consideration to-day, as the Senator from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) was desirous of examining the map before it should be lithographed or engraved.

Mr. PEARCE then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That one thousand additional copies of the notes of a military reconnoissance from Fort Leavenworth to San Diego, by Lieutenant William H. Emory, and of Colonel Cooke's report, be printed for the use of the Senate; and that the Secretary of the Senate be directed hereafter to be engraved or lithographed, and to make another of the map accompanying Lieutenant Emory's report, and each of the last one of geological, and other illustrations as the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate may approve and direct.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE SENATE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Senate, made in pursuance of the 20th section of the act of the 26th of August, 1842, showing the disbursements from the contingent fund of the Senate, for the year ending December 4, 1847.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That it be printed.

WAR MEETING IN PHILADELPHIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the proceedings of a town meeting held in the city of Philadelphia, on the 11th December, 1847, in reference to the existing war with Mexico.

On motion, it was

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

On motion, it was

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, it was Ordered, That the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the Finances, be referred to the Committee on Finance; except so much thereof as relates to the reduction and graduation in the price of the public lands, and the extension of the pre-emption privilege, and to the mineral lands; which is hereby referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and except so much thereof as relates to military land warrants and certificates; which is hereby referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and except so much thereof as relates to the donation of farms in Oregon, to actual settlers and emigrants, and the grant of school sections; which is hereby referred to the Committee on Territories; and except so much thereof as relates to the light-house system, and the ware-housing system, and to the establishment of ports of entry in Oregon; which is hereby referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. HUNTER gave notice, that at an early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill to authorize the payment of equitable commissions to the agents or attorneys of persons in whose favor awards have been made, under three several treaties between the United States and foreign powers, which awards have been retained in the treasury in payment of debts due to the United States.

THE LATE SENATOR SPEIGHT.

Mr. FOOTE rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: A few days since we were called upon to assume the customary badges of mournful respect in honor of a deceased Senator from Connecticut; and now, whilst the sentiment of fraternal grief is yet warm in our bosoms, and the tokens of sorrowing affection are still visible upon our persons, it has become necessary that I should give renewed pain to the sensibilities of Senators by passing in review before them another dispensation of Divine Providence, which, since the last annual assemblage in this hall, has deprived the national legislature of an upright and efficient member—the State of Mississippi of a faithful and approved political agent, and myself of a most worthy and esteemed colleague. The Hon. JESSE SPEIGHT, died at his own residence, in the State of Mississippi, on Saturday the first day of May last, after a long and painful illness, which came upon him here, whilst arduously engaged in the extraordinary labors of the last Congress, and which continued to oppress him sorely for several months, until at last he sunk into that grave, where now quietly repose all that was mortal of the patriot, the philanthropist, and the statesman. I shall not attempt, on this occasion, to deliver a formal and elaborate eulogy upon my lamented friend, feeling that I shall best display the real respect which I entertain for the well-known republican simplicity of his own tastes, by confining myself to a concise and unostentatious delineation of his life and character.

JESSE SPEIGHT was born in the county of Greene, and State of North Carolina, a few years anterior to the close of the last century, where he continued uninterruptedly to reside, until his removal to the State of Mississippi, in the year 1837. Prior to his migration from the State of his nativity, he had officiated as a member of her legislature, and had likewise supplied material aid in the reformation of her organic law, as a prominent member of the convention which assembled for that purpose in the year 1837. Before leaving North Carolina, he had represented one of the congressional districts of that ancient Commonwealth in the other wing of this Capitol, for four consecutive terms, closing on the third of March, 1837; and I am assured that his whole political conduct at that critical period of our national history was eminently creditable to himself, and satisfactory to his constituents. After his removal to the west, he successively represented a most intelligent and patriotic constituency, first, in one branch of our State legislature, and then in the other, and presiding over both, at different times, with such distinguished success as greatly to elevate his character as a public man, and multiply the number of his admirers. From the presidency of the Mississippi Senate, he was elected to a seat upon this floor, where he acted under the daily and hourly inspection of those in whose presence I now speak; and, I trust, that I shall not be deemed by any Senator who hears me at all extravagant, when I assert that my lamented colleague, whilst connected with this body, gave constant evidence of his possessing a sound, acute, and practical intellect—habits of persevering industry, seldom surpassed—inflexible honesty of purpose—a magnanimity of soul, which held him ever in readiness for the performance of generous and noble deeds, and which equally saved him, at all times, from the least participancy in aught that could be recognised as little, or sordid, or illiberal. He was blessed with unusual sweetness, and uniformity of temper; and the unceremonious cordiality of his manners rendered his society particularly agreeable and attractive. In domestic life he was strikingly amiable and exemplary; and his untimely decease has brought sorrow and disappointment to kind and innocent hearts, which his living presence never failed to inspire with sentiments of buoyant hope, and elastic gladness of spirit.

Mr. FOOTE concluded by offering the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, unanimously, That the Senate, from a desire to exhibit a profound respect for the memory of the Hon. JESSE SPEIGHT, late a member thereof, will go into mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm, for thirty days.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the Hon. JESSE SPEIGHT, the Senate do now adjourn.

Ordered That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives thereof.

Whereupon,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1847.

The Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER, of the State of Massachusetts, appeared in the Senate to-day.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States, was received by the hands of J. Knox Walker, Esq., his private secretary.

CASE OF JOHN PICKETT AND OTHERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report from the Solicitor of the Treasury, in the case of John Pickett and others, owners of the brig Abeel, made in pursuance of the directions of the act of 3d March, 1847; which was read.

PUBLIC MEETING IN PHILADELPHIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the proceedings of a meeting of citizens in Philadelphia, approving the act of the government transferring the emigrant Mormons to rest on certain unoccupied lands, which were laid upon the table.

PETITIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the petition of Charles S. Jackson, an officer of customs in the port of Philadelphia, praying to be allowed certain items rejected by the accounting officer in the settlement of his accounts, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FELCH presented the petition of Elvira F. Smith, widow of Henry Smith, deceased, an officer in the army, who died of disease contracted in the service, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEVIER presented the memorial of the survivors of the crew of the United States' brig Somers, praying indemnity for the loss of their clothing and personal effects, occasioned by the capsizing of that vessel in the harbor of Vera Cruz; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CALHOUN submitted additional documents relating to the claim of Hugh Wallace Wormeley to a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER presented the petition of Susan T. E. Williamson, widow of Charles L. Williamson, deceased, late an officer in the navy, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the memorial of Joshua Shaw, praying that a balance of an appropriation due him, under an act of Congress, and retained in the treasury, may be paid; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the memorial of the Vestry of Washington Parish, in the city of Washington, praying permission to purchase part of a public reservation in that city, for the purpose of enlarging their burial ground; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HANNEGAN presented the memorial of Timothy Upham, John Laighton, Thomas Hayes, Michael W. Ash, Samuel McClelland, Robert C. Wetmore, James H. Suydam and Allen Thomas, legal representative of John Thomas, deceased, praying compensation for performing the duties of Navy Pension Agent; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. YULEE presented the petition of Jessee Turner, praying the confirmation of his title to a tract of land held under a Spanish grant, in Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of Leslie Combs, praying the payment of certain bonds issued to him by the late Republic of Texas; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented the memorial of William M. Glendy, an officer of the Navy, praying compensation for performing duties belonging to a higher grade than that held by him in the service; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the memorial of Sarah Hebard, widow of Andrew Hebard deceased, late a Chief Engineer in the Navy, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the memorial of the seamen of the United States squadron in the Pacific ocean, praying the restoration of the spirit ration; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the memorial of Mrs. Ann Chase, praying indemnity for losses at Tampico, in Mexico, in consequence of an outbreak of the populace on the commencement of hostilities; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DIX presented the memorial of officers of the army, now serving in Mexico, praying the passage of an act granting pensions to the widows and orphans of such as may die in service.

Also, a memorial of officers of the army, now serving in Mexico, praying the passage of a law authorizing the retirement of officers of the army from active service on certain conditions.

In presenting these petitions, Mr. DIX said:

I rise to present two petitions to which I desire to invoke the attention of the Senate. It was not until yesterday that I was apprised of their contents, or I should have brought them here at an earlier day. They were left on my table in this city, a week or ten days ago, when I was absent, sealed and addressed to an honorable Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) not now in his place, who served for many years as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, with distinguished honor to himself and advantage to the country, and I greatly regret that he is not here to take charge of them. I am not in the habit, sir, as you know, of accompanying the presentation of papers with introductory remarks. In ordinary cases it is doubtless more proper to await the action of appropriate committees on the subjects to which they refer. But I trust the nature of these may be deemed by the Senate to justify a departure from the usual practice.

They are petitions signed by the officers of the Army at Puebla, on the first day of August last, just before it commenced its march towards the city of Mexico. The first is styled "a petition for a retiring list." It contains two hundred and thirty-three signatures, and praying for certain legislative provisions in respect to aged and disabled officers, which, without casting any new burden on the public treasury, would in the opinion of the petitioners, add greatly to the efficiency of the army, and at the same time do justice to those, who perform the drudgery, and encounter the perils of military service in the field. I will only say further in reference to this petition, that the plan suggested corresponds, to some extent, though not fully, with one proposed by a late commander of the army, (General Macomb,) and I believe recently recommended by the present Adjutant General with a view to the same object.

The second is styled "a petition for widows and orphans." It is signed by two hundred and twenty-two officers, and I believe the names, as far as they go, are identical with those borne on the first. It is also dated at Puebla, on the first day of August last, almost at the moment the army took up its march for the valley of Mexico; and when considered in connexion with the surrounding circumstances and the brilliant events, which followed each other with a rapidity of succession scarcely exceeded by those which signalized the first entrance of Bonaparte into Italy, it addresses itself with great force to the feelings, as well as the justice of Congress and the country.

I will not detain the Senate by entering into any detailed review of these events with a view to enforce the appeal contained in the petition. I hope, however, I may be indulged in saying, in justice to those who bore a part in them, that the first conquest of Mexico cannot, as it appears to me, be compared with the second, either as to the obstacles overcome, or as to the relative strength of the invaders. The triumphs of Cortez were achieved by policy and by superiority in discipline, and in the implements of warfare. The use of fire-arms, until then unknown to the inhabitants of Mexico, was sufficient in itself to make his force, small as it was, irresistible. In the eyes of that simple and superstitious people he seemed armed with super-human power. Other circumstances combined to facilitate his success. The native tribes, by which the country was possessed, were distinct communities, not always acknowledging the same head, and often divided among themselves by implacable hostility and resentments. Cortez, by his consummate prudence and art, turned these dissensions to his own account; he lured the parties to them into his own service, and when he presented himself at the gates of the city of Mexico, he was at the head of four thousand of the most warlike of the natives, as auxiliaries to the band of Spaniards, with which he commenced his march from Vera Cruz. Thus, his early successes were as much the triumph of policy as of arms. General Scott, and the gallant band he led, had no such advantages. The whole population of the country from Vera Cruz to Mexico, was united as one man against him, and animated by the fiercest animosity. He was opposed by military forces armed like his own, often better disciplined, occupying positions chosen by themselves, strong by nature, and fortified according to the strictest rules of art. These obstacles were overcome by his skill as a tactician, aided by a corps of officers unsurpassed for their knowledge of the art of attack and defence, and by the indomitable courage of their followers. With half his force left on the battle-field or in the hospital, and with less than six thousand men, after a series of desperate contests, he took possession of the city of Mexico, containing nearly two hundred thousand inhabitants, and defended by the remnant of an army of more than thirty thousand soldiers. I confess I know nothing in modern warfare which exceeds in brilliancy the movements of the American army from the gulf to the city of Mexico. I shall not attempt to speak of them in the language of eulogium. They are not a fit theme for such comment. Like the achievements of General Taylor and his brave men on the Rio Grande, at Monterey, and Buena Vista, the highest and most appropriate praise is contained in the simplest statement of facts.

Mr. President, the gallant achievements in the valley of Mexico, to which I have briefly referred, were due to the chivalrous men, whose names are signed to this petition, and to their gallant associates in the field. The names of the volunteer officers, who so nobly distinguished themselves, are not borne on the petition. The subject concerns the regular army only, and the petitioners belong exclusively to that arm of the service. At the head of the first I find Winfield Scott, William J. Worth, John A. Quitman, Gideon J. Pillow, David E. Twiggs, James Shields, George Cadwallader, and Persifor F. Smith, all general officers; Harney, Clark, Riley, and Garland among the colonels; and among the field and staff, and lower commissioned grades other names, too numerous to mention, which those who bear them have, by their gallantry, made familiar to their countrymen. I have already said, that this petition was signed at Puebla, almost at the moment the army commenced its march from that city for the valley of Mexico. Sir, it is more than probable, that the last time many of these gallant men held a pen was to inscribe their names upon this petition; and when this appeal to their countrymen was made, in full confidence, doubtless, that their prayer would be heard, their hands thenceforth, dealt only with the weapons with which they were vindicating their country's honor in the field, and which none but death, the conqueror of us all, could wrest from their grasp.

Mr. President, I will not undertake to give a summary of the contents of this petition. It is very brief; preparing, as the petitioners were, for the unequal contest which awaited them, and of which, perhaps, they alone did not doubt the issue, they had no words to waste, even on the subject nearest to their hearts. I will read it, with the Senate's permission, in their own language:

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

"We, the undersigned officers of the United States Army, beg leave most respectfully to represent to your honorable bodies, that many of us are married, and have left wives and children at home, dependent upon us; that we are constantly exposed to dangers and the ills of health, and, on the field of battle, but by exposure to unhealthy and deadly climates; and that in going to the field, many of us have our hearts depressed by the melancholy conviction that, if we fall, our wives and children will be helplessly thrown on the cold charities of the world.

"We most respectfully ask our country to give us the assurance, if we offer up our lives in her service, that she will provide for our destitute widows and orphans; and that she may do so we most humbly petition your honorable bodies to pass such a law as will, in case widows shall become destitute, secure to the wife and children of officers and soldiers dying in the service of their country, pensions during the natural lives or widowhood of the wife, and during the minority of the children, and your petitioners as in duty bound, will ever gratefully pray.

"Puebla, Mexico, August 1st, 1847."

It is due to General Scott to say, that in signing the petition, he added these words:

"Without any desire of procuring for my own family any contingent benefit from the proposed change in the pension laws of the army, I cordially concur in the responsibleness of the foregoing petition, and can see no military or other objection to its being signed and presented."

General Quitman also signs with the following addition:

"I approve the measure of placing the regular army on the same footing with the navy and volunteers."

This remark of General Quitman explains all. The army is not on an equally favorable footing, in respect to widows and orphans, with the navy or volunteers. Without complaining of the inequality, the petitioners respectfully ask that it may be rectified.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that in reading and signing this petition, the recollection of wives and children, thousands of miles away, many of whom were to become widows and orphans before this last missive could reach the capitol, was to the signers far more trying than the scenes of danger and death on which they were about to enter. If it was to them a moment of weakness—the only weakness pardonable to gallant men—the memory of a dozen battle-fields attests that it was the last. Some of them sleep in honorable graves; some are lying on beds of sickness in Mexico; many are still in the field, ready, as ever, to peril all in their country's cause; and others—I am sorry to say not a few—restored to their homes, are dragging about their scarred and mangled limbs, in the face of their friends and kindred, with lives held by the frailest tenure.

But, sir, I have said enough. It would be to distrust the right feeling of the Senate, to say more. Less I could not say, in justice to myself, with this paper before me, on which I recognize the names of numerous friends and former associates, many of whom we shall see no more. It gives me pleasure, not unmingled with pain, to present their petition; and if the presentation has been accompanied with the manifestation of more feeling than becomes the performance of a public duty on this floor, I am sure it will be ascribed to the right cause. I will conclude, sir, by reading to the Senate, an extract of a letter enclosed with the petition, with the single remark, that it was written, in behalf of the army, by Major Harvey Brown, a gallant officer, with whom I had the pleasure of being acquainted many years ago, in the staff of a former commanding general of the army. It is dated at the National Palace, in the city of Mexico, on the 1st of October, two months after the petition was signed.

"I would also call to your notice the melancholy fact, that many of the officers, who have signed this petition, have since gloriously fallen in the service of their country, leaving destitute widows and helpless orphans. And, being dead, they now emphatically speak, saying: 'We have offered up our lives to our country, and we now call upon her to provide a decent competence for our bereaved widows and fatherless children.'"

Is it too much, Mr. President, to ask that these petitions, with the names attached to them, may be printed? I know it is not the practice of the Senate to print petitions. But these are something more. As far as they go, they are lists of the gallant living and the honored dead in Mexico. I make the motion to print.

The memorials were then referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. YULEE presented the petion of Isaac Varnes, senior, praying indemnity for losses sustained in consequence of the occupation of his property as a military post, by troops of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the memorial of Joseph Knox Boyd, praying compensation for his services in the recapture of the United States frigate Philadelphia, in the harbor of Tripoli, in the year 1804; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the memorial of William A. Christian, a Purser in the Navy, praying the allowance of certain items, suspended by the accounting officers in the settlement of his accounts, for payments made to the acting forward officers on board of the United States steamer Princeton; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the memorial of John Crosby, in behalf of the children of Andrew D. Crosby, deceased, late a Purser in the Navy, praying that they may be allowed a five years' pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the memorial of John Crosby, administrator of Andrew D. Crosby, deceased, late a Purser in the Navy, praying to be allowed a credit on his accounts for payments made to certain acting forward officers on board the United States ship Ontario; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CASS submitted documents relating to the claims of A. Kearsley, receiver of public lands at Detroit, to compensation for extra clerk hire in his office; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DIX presented a memorial of citizens of Oswego, praying that a drawback of duties may be allowed on wheat imported from Canada into the United States, when manufactured into flour and exported; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the memorial of Benjamin J. Cahoone, a Purser in the Navy, praying the reimbursement of money advanced by him on public account; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr BADGER presented a memorial of the Religious Society of Friends at New Garden, North Carolina, praying the adoption of measures for the immediate termination of the war with Mexico, which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That the petition of Wm. H. Prentiss, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of La., it was Ordered, That the petition of Bailie Peyton, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by JOHNSON, of La., it was Ordered, That the petition of W. H. Bassett, on the files of the Senate be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of La., it was Ordered, That the petition of Abner L. Duncan, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of La., it was Ordered, That the documents on the files of the Senate, relating to the claim of William De Buys, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered; That the petition of Bettriah Healy, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. UPHAM, it was Ordered, That the petition of Abigail Garland, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the petition of A. H. Cole, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the petition of certain claimants for remuneration for supplies furnished to Florida Militia in the Seminole war, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the petition of John G. Sanchez, administrator of Frances R. Sanchez, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Pearson Cogswell, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Henry M. Shreve, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Messrs. MANGUM, DIX, CRITTENDEN, and FOOTE, severally gave notice, that on to-morrow, or at some early day, they would ask leave to introduce sundry bills.

RESOLUTIONS OF STATE LEGISLATURES.

Mr. BALDWIN presented a preamble and resolutions, passed by the Legislature of Connecticut, in favor of the construction of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific ocean, according to a plan proposed by Asa Whitney, a citizen of New York; which were read and ordered to be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, in presenting a report and resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, requesting the Senators and Representatives of that State in Congress to urge upon that body the importance of passing such laws as will enable the citizens of slaveholding States to recover their slaves when escaping to the non-slaveholding States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; remarked, that during the last summer a case had come to his knowledge under his own observation, which he begged here to present to the notice of the Senate. A gentleman named Duncan had some time previous removed from Kentucky into Missouri; he lost a slave and followed him into Detroit, and there arrested him. The slave was taken from the possession of the owner there, and an action of trespass was instituted against the claimant, on which the owner, in default of bail, at the instance of the slave, was put in jail. The slave was released. The gentleman remained in jail until by correspondence with his friends in Kentucky and elsewhere,—he, (Mr. U.,) amongst the number,—he obtained satisfactory proof that he was the owner of the slave, and that the proceedings which had been commenced against him were altogether unjust. He took that opportunity to say that Mr. Norvell, late a member of that body, and without personal acquaintance with the gentleman thus put in jail at the instance of his slave, took an active part in procuring his release. But in the meantime the slave had escaped into Canada; and there was the end of the matter. He then moved that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, in order that something might be reported which would meet the case.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, it was Ordered, That they be printed.

Mr. HALE presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire in opposition to any legislation by Congress on the subject of slavery; or the extension of slavery in any territory which may hereafter be acquired by the United States; which were read and ordered to be printed.

Also, a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, in favor of the passage of an act for the removal of the terms of the Circuit and District Courts of the United States for the District of New Hampshire from Exeter to Concord, in that State; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NILES, in presenting a preamble and resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, declaring their opposition to the introduction of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, into any territory which may hereafter be acquired by, or annexed to, the United States; which were read, said: I move, sir, that the resolutions which I have now submitted be printed. The preamble to these resolutions has no practical connection with the resolutions themselves. Whether the war proceeded from the act of Mexico or from the act of the President of the United States, is a matter which can have no influence whatever upon the question—as to the disposition of any territory which may be acquired in consequence of it; and I allude to this matter, sir, because I believe it was found embarrassing to the Legislature, and that it placed the minority of that body in a situation somewhat analagous to that in which some of my friends over the way found themselves in relation to the law recognizing the war with Mexico. They did not like the preamble to that act, and there are many in my State who dislike this preamble quite as much. The majority there, like the majority here, were desirous that the act should not only be done, but done in a way in which they saw fit to have it done. The act passed, however, notwithstanding this repugnance to its preamble. However this may be, sir, I feel it my duty to say, as one of the Representatives of that State, that I have no doubt, that these resolutions speak the sentiments of the great body of the people of that State. With regard to the preamble, I think otherwise. The resolutions, I think, sir, speak the public sentiment of the State, and this conclusion I do not form entirely from the action of the General Assembly; still less, do I arrive at it from the tone of the party presses of the State—they will probably lead me and every one to a different conclusion—for I regret to perceive, sir, in the press on both sides in that State, a shuffling course is pursued, and an endeavor is made to keep this question out of the sight of the people. An unwise policy, I think. But however much it is to be regretted that the question should arise here or before the country, I apprehend that it does exist and that it will be impossible to avoid meeting it and looking it full in the face. For one, I could have regretted that the question should have come here—have hoped that in some way it would have been kept out of this body; but we have already resolutions bringing up this question. We have, sir, the message of the Executive one of the co-ordinate branches of the government, informing us that a part of Mexico now belongs to this Union, and calling on us to establish a territorial government over it. Many persons have assumed the position to which I have referred, not I apprehend, for the lasting interests of the country, but for temporary party purposes. Many have assumed this position; that the question would not arise because they were opposed to acquisition. Well, sir, that time has gone by; we are told that we have this territory and are called on to recognize it as a part of the territory of the United States, and to establish the jurisdiction of our civil government over it. In regard, sir, to this position which has been assumed by the Executive, I have nothing to say. I was somewhat startled at it, sir. As to how far it can be maintained, we shall see hereafter; for it will be brought up for consideration in the course of the session. But sir, the other question is brought forward here, and we shall, I suppose, have it discussed. For one, sir, having felt it my duty at the last session to express my views in regard to it, it will be unnecessary for me to explain my course until the question actually comes up again. I certainly, sir, shall pursue such a course as I believe to be moderate and conciliatory and kind towards that section of the Union, with which I shall probably differ on this subject. But I cannot consent to misrepresent my constituents. I cannot mistake their sentiments. I cannot mistake what I believe to be their interests. I think the public sentiment of my State, and the public sentiment of the whole north, is that they will adhere fully and with the utmost fidelity, in guarding the rights of all the States on this question, so far as the constitution and public treaties have secured those rights—or in other words, that they will support the institution of slavery as an American institution, so far as the constitution and public treaties have carried it, and given it a common ground. So far, sir, I believe the public sentiment of the north is well settled, and I believe it is equally well settled that they are not desirous by any action on their part to be instrumental in "enlarging the area of slavery" as it is sometimes called. I believe the sentiment is that there is no power in this government to do that, and if there were, it would be unwise and unjust to exercise it. This question will probably lead to some debate, and I hope it will be discussed as temperately as any other question which can come before this body. I hope it will be discussed with a proper regard to the rights of the States under the constitution which binds them together, and with a proper regard to the interests and honor of the whole country. For one, sir, I do not believe that there is any power in this government which can institute or originate or sustain slavery beyond the limits where the constitution has carried it; and if we are to go beyond the constitution, I am, as I have ever been, ready here and elsewhere, to defend the positions I assumed at the last session. Nor do I believe it would be consistent with the duty of this government, to acquiesce in the existence of slavery in fact, and without law, in any territory we may acquire. Nothing, in my opinion, can be more clearly unjustifiable: but the question presented in these resolutions is entirely distinct. It is a question whether this government shall become an agent in establishing or extending this institution. I will not detain the Senate further at this time.

Ordered, That they be printed.

Mr. ATHERTON presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, in favor of the repeal of so much of the "act to establish post routes, and for other purposes," as enlarges the franking privilege and increases the postage on newspapers not sent from the office of publication; which were read and ordered to be printed.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of New Hampshire, tendering the thanks of that State to Major General Zachary Taylor and Major General Winfield Scott, and to the brave officers and soldiers under their respective commands, for their distinguished and gallant conduct during the several engagements with the enemy; by whose act the war now exists; tendering sympathy to the friends and relatives of the brave men who had fallen; declaring that the course of our government has been marked by a spirit of forbearance and conciliation, until the actual invasion of our territory; and recognizing in the measures of the national Executive a spirit of justice and a desire for peace, but, at the same time, wisdom, statesmanlike forecast, and patriotic energy; which were read and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEVIER hoped that the motion of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire to print would be withdrawn; or if that were not in order now, that a reconsideration of the question might be agreed to, in order that the resolutions might be withdrawn.

A SENATOR.—Why?

Mr. SEVIER.—Because it is entirely an unusual course of procedure. I have never known it to be done in the Senate.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I have certainly no desire to do any thing in the slightest degree in contravention of the established practice of the Senate. But I suppose that according to the practice, resolutions passed on general subjects, as these have been, may be presented to Congress although no express clause to that effect may be contained in them. I have no doubt that it was the design of the members of the Legislature that those resolutions should be presented to Congress. The resolutions were sent to me by them, and I presume, sir, that it was designed that all of them should be presented. I believe that a copy of them were sent to my colleague. Supposing it to be the expectation of the Legislature that these resolutions should be presented, I thought it my duty to present them. If, however, that procedure be contrary to the usual practice of the Senate in presenting resolutions, unless there be an express request that they should be presented, I have certainly no wish to press them. I have supposed that in the course which I have taken, there is nothing in contravention of established order. I am not aware that resolutions have been excluded on account of the absence of a special request that they should be presented. Resolutions, for instance, approving of the votes of Senators and Representatives, or instructing Senators and Representatives to pursue a certain course in regard to the discharge of their duties, have been frequently presented to Congress, although they contained no special request that they should be laid before either House of Congress. These resolutions on general subjects might, I supposed, be presented. I shall be guided entirely, however, by the opinion of older members of the Senate, and if it be thought that these resolutions should not constitute a precedent, I shall withdraw them.

The motion to reconsider the motion, by which the resolutions referred to were laid upon the table, was then put and adopted.

The question recurring on the resolution to print,

Mr. ATHERTON rose and said: I will withdraw the resolutions for the present, for the purpose of examining the subject, and on more mature consideration will determine whether they ought to be presented or not.

JOHN R. BRYAN, ADMINISTRATOR, ETC.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. MANGUM asked, and obtained leave, to bring in a bill for the relief of John R. Bryan, Administrator of Isaac Garretson, deceased, late a Purser in the United States Navy; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CORRECTION OF ERRORS IN SURVEYS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. FELCH asked, and obtained leave, to bring in a joint resolution relating to errors and defective returns in certain surveys, plats, and field notes; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COMPENSATION TO JOHN M. MOORE.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BREESE asked, and obtained leave, to bring in a bill to compensate John M. Moore; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BREESE asked, and obtained leave, to bring in a bill authorizing persons to whom reservations of land have been made under certain Indian treaties to alienate the same in fee; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN VIRGINIA.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. MASON asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to change the time of holding the district courts of the United States for the western district of Virginia, and for other purposes; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RIGHT OF WAY TO ILLINOIS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BREESE asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to grant to the State of Illinois a right of way through the public lands, and for other purposes; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BOUNTY LAND CLAIMS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. UNDERWOOD asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to allow further time for satisfying claims for bounty lands for military services in the late war with Great Britain, and for other purposes; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

GRANT OF LAND TO LOUISIANA.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. JOHNSON of La., asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to grant to the State of Louisiana certain lands for internal improvement; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

OVERFLOWED LANDS.

Mr. ASHLEY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

[illegible]

PRINTING OF MAPS.

Mr BREESE said: A few days since a report was made from the general land office and accompanying that report was [illegible] which it is necessary to have engraved. Upon examination, I have ascertained that the expense of executing will not exceed $400. I therefore move that the Senate order the [illegible] to be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT remarked that there was a report the State of Florida accompanying that report already engraved the plate of which would not cost any little expense. He inquired if that map was embraced in the Senator's motion.

Mr. BREESE replied that it was.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO.

Mr CALHOUN.—I hope that the resolutions which I offered the other day may now be taken up in order to be acted on this consideration.

The resolutions were then taken up and read, as follows:

[illegible]

Mr CALHOUN.—I shall be regulated in having the day by the wishes of the Senate. I have no particular desire in regard to a very early consideration of the resolutions. All I wish is that there should be no unnecessary delay. If it be agreeable to the Senate, I propose that they be taken up on the first Tuesday in January next—two weeks from to-morrow.

Mr ALLEN.—I understand that the Senator from South Carolina has made a motion, and I suppose I am in order in rising to make a remark. I do not know that I have any particular objection to that motion; but as this is a matter of very grave importance, and comes from a source which entitles it to great consideration, and as on the face of the resolution, as I conceive, a little ambiguous, I ask the indulgence of the Senate, and the Senator from South Carolina, whilst I request him to explain the resolution, so far as to tell us whether it means to exclude the idea of any territorial indemnity from Mexico, or any incorporation into the body of the public domain first, and then as states into this Union, of any territory which may come into the conclusion of this war? Or, whether it means barely to negative the idea of annihilating the sovereignty of Mexico, and incorporating the whole mass of territory into this Union? I ask whether it is to be understood in the one or the other of these senses. That is the matter, sir, which I am desirous of knowing before I vote in anywise in reference to it.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I will answer the Senator from Ohio with a great deal of pleasure. It is not my intention to involve any question in reference to territorial indemnity or any other subject apart from that which is presented in the resolution itself. I believe the pressing question at the moment is, whether we shall conquer Mexico and hold her as a subjected province, or incorporate her into our Union. That, of course, would involve the nationality of Mexico, and it was to that point my resolution referred. I think, sir, it is a question which ought to be first decided; because, Mr. President, if I am any judge at all of the operation of existing causes, the certain tendency of all that is doing is to end in the annihilation of the nationality of Mexico, and we shall thus find ourselves—unless the greatest caution is exercised—at the end of another campaign, or at some future time, with eight or nine millions of Mexicans, without a government, on our hands, not knowing what to do with them, and forced to come to one of the alternatives which I have presented. This is a question which I consider as overriding all others at this time. After that is decided we may then consider what compensation we ought to demand, if any we ought to require. I, for one, wish to take my own course, and I offered the resolution for the double purpose of bringing it before this body and before the country, and putting myself in reference to the Mexican question, where I wish to stand.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I believe my resolutions have precedence on the calendar, and were passed over informally—are they included in the motion now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—They are not embraced in it.

Mr CALHOUN.—I perceive that one of the morning papers supposes that my resolutions were introduced with reference to those offered by the Senator from New York. Not at all. My resolutions were written several days before his were introduced. The Senator may fix any day he pleases for the consideration of his resolutions, either before or after the day fixed upon for the consideration of mine.

Mr. ALLEN.—The subject of the Mexican war is one capable of being expanded very largely in the minds of men; and from the importance with which it comes at this forth at this early period of the session, it is more than likely that it will embrace a large portion of the session in its discussion, giving rise to a very large diversity of sentiment in the members of this body. It may, therefore, be a matter well worthy of the consideration of the Senate whether a subject comprehending so many remote consequences, as are suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, and a subject which, at all events, is in the judgment of every man of very great importance, should not be considered with that deliberation which the Senate always bestows on grave national questions; and, therefore, whether it should not, in the first place, pass to one of the committees organized by this body for the due consideration of propositions before they are submitted to the final adjudication of the body itself. Several resolutions have already been presented, and who shall guarantee the Senate against the incoming of a dozen others of a similar character? Who shall say where this subject shall end, when it becomes divided up and adjusted to the different capacities and judgments of this body? This is but the beginning of the session and we have two sets of resolutions. Before the day arrives for the action of the Senate upon this particular matter we may have a dozen other resolutions, and I submit it to the better judgment of the body whether it is not the proper course, under these circumstances, to refer the whole of these resolutions, in the first place, to the Committee on Foreign Relations. If it be in order, I shall make that motion.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I do trust that the course suggested by the Senator will not be pursued. What is the object of the reference? Reference is made to Committees for the purpose of considering and perfecting details; but here there are no details to settle. In fact, it is a simple proposition. The Senate have only to determine whether it is intended or desired that the whole of Mexico shall be conquered—her nationality destroyed—and that we shall be placed in a position in which we shall be compelled either to hold her as a subjected province, or incorporate her into our Union. We have carried this business of reference far beyond the parliamentary rules, and have encroached, in my opinion, in no small degree on the rights of individual Senators here. As to the number of resolutions that may be offered, I have no reason to believe that there will be many. They two have been introduced, and they upon entirely different subjects. One I understand refers to the slave question—mainly, at least—and the other to a question entirely aside from that. Sir, I do not believe that there will be a long discussion. Unless I am very greatly deceived, there will be no great division—at least there is not at present a great division in the country on this point, and I trust there will not be in this body. The end I wish to guard against, is one which heretofore has not been been contemplated. I do not know that it is intended. I trust that it is not intended. But we may find ourselves in a position not intended, and from which we cannot extricate ourselves. My object in introducing the resolutions, is to guard against such a result. I trust they will have that effect, and that the Senate will not agree to refer them to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALLEN.—I certainly did not desire to deprive any Senator of any of his just rights in this body, nor of any opportunity for the exercise of those rights; but I believe it would be difficult to find, on reference to the journal, an instance of any one question being introduced in the form of a resolution, of such grave importance as this, which was not referred to one of the committees of this body. It would be very difficult to find an exception to the general rule—every difficult. This is a question affecting our foreign relations—clearly and emphatically so. It is not so merely in its meaning and effect, but it is so on the face of the resolution, and in so many words. Well, sir, it will not limit the range of discussion to send it in the first place to the committee. It will abridge the rights of no man—neither of the mover of the resolution, nor of any other gentleman on this floor. The only effect it will have, will be that which, by the standing rules of this body, is designed—the effect of subjecting the proposition to deliberation, first, the scrutiny of the committee, to whose especial business it is made by the Senate to examine it; and secondly, the scrutiny of the Senate itself, revising the judgment of its committee. It is only a precaution taken to guard against precipitate and hasty conclusions. It is a sort of second trial which is granted in favor of all questions whose magnitude entitles them to that consideration—that second review of the human understanding. It is upon that ground, sir, that the rules by which all our business is first submitted to committees are predicated. If we were at the end of the session, or near the end, when a reference of this subject to a committee would be to entomb it for the balance of the session, then the objection coming from the Senator from South Carolina would be an available one, because he would have a right to obtain the adjudication of the Senate upon his resolution. But we are at the commencement of the session, we are on this side of the holidays—we are in anticipation of our usual session in the transaction of the heavier part of the public business, which is not taken up till after the holidays. There is, therefore, abundance of time. Sir, this resolution is no trifling affair. It presents a grave question, and in answer to the inquiry which I addressed to the Senator from South Carolina, he seems to consider—if I rightly interpreted his explanation—that there is no difference between territorial indemnity and the conquest and retention of the whole of Mexico—that the consequences, though not immediate, would be in their result precisely the same. That is the reading of the explanation as I understand it. Well, sir, what can be a graver question than that? Can the human imagination draw up for review a question graver, more solemn, more calculated to affect and agitate the public heart of this great country than such a question as this—presented too at time when our armies are occupying the territories of that nation? I am one who does not believe that to take territorial indemnity is to take the whole of Mexico. I am one who does not believe that these two questions are the same, either in point of fact or of remote effect. The Senator from South Carolina, who has more reason to be satisfied with his own judgment than I have to be satisfied with mine, thinks differently. Well, sir, his thoughts are entitled to consideration. They are matured thoughts. They will receive the consideration of the country. They will have their effect upon the public mind of a large portion of this people; and it is for that reason that I desire all his thoughts should assume a shape not to be mistaken. When I am told that to obtain from Mexico territorial indemnity to any extent, is equivalent in its remote consequences to an utter annihilation of the sovereignty of Mexico, and the incorporation of its entire mass of territory within this Union, with its ten millions of population, I desire time to inquire whether, why, and wherefore, these propositions are the same—whether these remote and comprehensive effects are to follow from all acquisition of a portion of Mexico, as an indemnity to this government, for the wrongs which it has sustained at the hands of Mexico. I desire that the committee to whom this subject should be referred, should have an opportunity of investigating that question, and ascertaining whether these two propositions are identical or not; because it is very manifest that the identity of these two propositions will make a very material difference in the estimation which the American people shall put upon them. I do not think that they are identical, sir, by any means. The subject then being one of such obvious and acknowledged importance—so much time being before us—so few inconveniences being at all likely to result from the reference to a committee, I cannot, sir, for my life, discover any grave reason why the reference should not take place. But I shall not only acquiesce, as I am bound to do, in the judgment of the Senate; but I shall acquiesce in that judgment, whatever it may be, without the least feeling of disappointment. And I assure the Senator from South Carolina, that it is in no spirit of cavilling—from no disposition to disagree with him unnecessarily, or get up discussion, that I make this suggestion. I act simply upon the same principle upon which the Senate itself acted when it established those rules under which its business is submitted to the various committees.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I rise principally to correct an error into which the Senator from Ohio has fallen, doubtless from having misunderstood my remarks. I by no means said that I considered the annihilation of the nationality of Mexico, and the acquisition of a portion of it territory as identical; on the contrary, I said expressly that I did not understand the resolution as involving the question of territory at all. I agree with him that we may take a part—very large parts of Mexico without touching her nationality. My object is very different; and to satisfy the Senator, I will tell him that I have changed not a single opinion, which I have ever expressed, in relation to this Mexican war. I hope that this will satisfy him. Now, sir, if I understand the drift of the Senator's remarks, and of his motion, it is this—that he wishes these resolutions of mine to go the Committee of Foreign Relations in order that they may make a report upon them before I myself have an opportunity of being heard upon them. I ask, is that fair? I introduced a general subject here, and the Senator proposes to take it out of my hands before I am heard—sending it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, where it is to be discussed and reported on in advance of my own explanation of it. Is there any precedent to be found in this or any other parliamentary body for a procedure of that kind? As he believes, there is no instance of such resolutions being introduced and not referred to a Committee before discussion. I do not know an instance in which any such reference has been made. I myself at the last session introduced important resolutions on the subject of slavery. They were discussed here and every where.

Mr. ALLEN.—[In his seat.]—There is no Committee of the Senate on Slavery.

Mr. CALHOUN.—You have a Committee on Territories, and that involved a territorial question. You may raise a special committee. There is no difference, in that view, between a special and regular committee. The whole drift of his motion—on which I shall say no more—is to take my own resolutions out of my own hand, so that the committee may make the first speech on them, to which I will be called upon to reply, instead of explaining my own resolutions. I submit whether that be fair.

Mr. SEVIER.—I hope my friend from Ohio will withdraw his motion. I will only say, as one member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that I have made up no opinion with regard to the resolutions of the honorable Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. ALLEN.—Certainly, I have no disposition to force, even if I had the power, such a motion, if the committee are averse to the reference; and therefore, at the request of the honorable chairman of the committee, I beg to withdraw the motion I have made. Allow me, sir, however, to take this occasion to remark, that I am gratified with the explanation which the Senator from South Carolina has made, and in relation to which he conceives that I was mistaken in supposing that he meant that the taking any territorial indemnity was identical with the annihilation of Mexico. I did certainly understand him to say that that was to be the ulterior consequence; and it was the identity of consequences that he had reference to, and not the identity of the particular measures, at the moment. It was my purpose to negative the idea that the same consequences would flow, however remotely; that is to say, that the taking of territorial indemnity involved an ulterior necessity of annihilating Mexico altogether. But if that be not the view of the Senator, I am glad to hear it, because I presumed, on the first form of the proposition, there would be few opininions antagonistic to his, and I hope upon the second—that is as to territorial indemnity—I shall find the Senator aiding those who go for indemnifying the country for its losses, in the way of lands.

The resolutions were then postponed until Tuesday, the 4th day of January next, and made the special order of that day.

ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolutions, heretofore submitted by Mr. DICKINSON:

Resolved, That the public interest requires the government of the United States to treat for the acquisition of such territory as may be necessary to be the acquisition of such territory as may be necessary to the future peace and safety of the United States, and that the President be requested to open negotiations for the purpose, and that no treaty for the acquisition of territory be ratified by the Senate, which does not provide for the admission of such territory into the Union as a territory, or as a State, with the consent of the people thereof, to form a free and republican State, with the powers and rights of the original members of the confederacy.

Resolved, That in engrafting a territorial government for future Indiana, into the United States, the same local self-government upon which our independence was founded, should be preserved, the time, place and manner of the first organization be directed, and the conditions of the compact declared, by the act upon which the consent of the people of the acquired country depends, the people thereof.

Mr. DICKINSON then rose and moved that the resolutions offered by him be made the special order for two weeks from to-day at one o'clock.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I beg to ask the Senator from New York if it is his purpose to anticipate a discussion on the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DICKINSON.—I do not fully hear the Senator.

Mr. BERRIEN.—Is it the purpose of the Senator from New York in the motion just submitted to anticipate the discussion on the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DICKINSON.—I do not know how the discussion of the resolutions offered by the honorable Senator from South Carolina can be anticipated in the consideration of what he himself considered an independent proposition.

Mr. SEVIER.—I hope, Mr. President, that before we get into this sea of discussion we may dispose of some public measures which now press upon our consideration. I would suggest that as the resolutions offered by the Senators from South Carolina and New York are antagonistical to a very great extent, they may with propriety be considered together. I hope, therefore, that the Senator from New York will allow his to be considered with the others. In the meantime I hope that we may be able to dispose of the bill for recruiting the ranks of the army, and also of the measures necessary to provide the means of feeding and clothing the soldiers engaged in fighting the battles of their country in Mexico.

Mr. DICKINSON begged to insist on his motion.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped that the Senator would fix an earlier day for the consideration of these resolutions than that fixed for those which he (Mr. C.) had offered.

Mr. DICKINSON was desirous only of an opportunity of explaining his resolutions before the entrance of any other subject, which, by giving rise to discussion, might prevent him from doing so.

Mr. CALHOUN suggested that the Senator could have the opportunity which he sought on the morning of the day after that fixed for the consideration of his (Mr. C.'s) resolutions.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I am not so sure of that; and I prefer that my resolutions retain the priority to which they are entitled in the order in which they were offered. I may not trespass long on the attention of the Senate in addressing it on the resolutions, but what little I have to say, I desire to offer before discussion arises on other subjects.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I must make a remark here. The Senate has already fixed a day for the consideration of my resolutions; and the Senator now proposes the day immediately preceding for the consideration of his—thus anticipating mine. That his resolutions shall pass without discussion, is impossible. There will be, as I take it, great diversity of opinion on the subject, at least as the resolution now stands. It may lead to a long discussion. Now I do not think that it would be treating my resolutions lightly, if, after having fixed a day for their consideration, the day immediately preceding should be set apart for the consideration of others which must give rise to discussion, in consequence of which mine may be cut off. If the Senator wishes to be heard, he can be heard on any intermediate day, or on the morning immediately after the day set apart for the consideration of my resolutions.

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not intend to supersede the Senator in any other sense than I indicate. I was without the bar when I learned that the Senator's resolution was under consideration, and I inquired whether the motion made by the honorable Senator included the resolutions which I had the honor to submit. The reply was that they had been passed over informally, and were not embraced in the motion of the Senator. It was then remarked by the Senator that the propositions were independent, and that mine could be set down for an earlier or later day. I therefore, in accordance with his suggestion, moved an earlier day, which was, I think, treating his resolutions with fairness and courtesy; whilst, according to his own rule, mine were treated rather unfairly, for I postponed their consideration till after the holidays, in order to meet the convenience of the Senate. I am willing that they should be set down for an earlier day, but the holidays are approaching, and I desire an opportunity to explain the resolutions, before I shall be superseded by any other discussion. I do not know that any other Senators wish to speak on the resolutions. If they do, the further consideration of the resolutions can be postponed till the others shall have been discussed. I am quite willing to consent to such an arrangement. I desire only, as I have said, an opportunity to state my views in explanation of the resolutions before the question is embarrassed and superseded by other questions supposed in the public mind to have a similar bearing. At the suggestion of the Senator himself, I moved that the consideration of my resolutions should be fixed for a certain day, and under that impression I voted for making his the order for Monday, not imagining of course that I was to be foreclosed and superseded.

Mr. CASS.—The suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas is entitled to consideration. We are all aware that the President has submitted to Congress the necessity of additional military forces, and the Military Committee has had no opportunity to examine the subject, but will soon meet and take it up. I hope, whatever time may be fixed for the consideration of these resolutions, it may be distinctly understood that they are not to stand in the way of public business of a more pressing nature, demanding the immediate attention of Congress. I do trust that it may be distinctly understood before an order is made on this subject, that it will not be superseded by any other matters. I must be allowed to say, with regard to the resolution of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, with the greatest deference to his opinions, that I myself do not see its practical importance. I am perfectly willing to hear the views of the Senator. I know that they will be intelligent, striking, and that they will go to the public with the great weight of his character; but I must say that there is no man in this nation in favor of the extinction of the nationality of Mexico. The Executive has indicated his views, and they are totally inconsistent with the the extinction of the nationality of Mexico. With respect to the resolution I have nothing to say. But I must remark that I do think that it is exceedingly unwise, at this stage of the prosecution of the war in either branch of Congress to say what we will do, or what we will not do. We may be driven from Mexico to-morrow—it is not a very likely event—but how would we look in the eyes of the world in that case, after having declared that we did not mean to seize the whole of Mexico. If the resolution be intended as a vehicle of the opinions of the Senator from South Carolina, I shall hear him with a great deal of pleasure; and his views will, I doubt not, have great weight in the country; but I shall oppose any vote on the subject, as that would be in my judgment unnecessary and impolitic.

Mr. CALHOUN. I should be very glad indeed to think with the honorable gentleman from Michigan, that there is no person in the country who thinks of the extinction of the nationality of Mexico. Why, you can hardly read a newspaper without finding it filled with speculation upon this subject. The proceedings that took place in Ohio, at a dinner given to one of the volunteer officers of the Army, returned from Mexico, show conclusively that the impression entertained by the persons present, was, that our troops would never leave Mexico, until they had conquered the whole country. This was the sentiment advanced by the officer, and endorsed by the official paper of that state. But this is not the point. I [illegible] are willing to go, whether such a thing is contemplated. I attribute no such motive to any one. I look at the progress of events. I look at what is proposed and the end of it—those consequences which I propose to avert by this resolution. Sir, let any man look at the progress of this war—let him consider how we got into it, not expecting to get into it at all, for certainly the Executive officers expressed, in the strongest manner, their conviction that there was not the slightest hazard of war at the time when our troops marched to the Rio Grande. What next? After the war was commenced we were told that the government was to conquer a peace, and what have we been told since? That we must carry on the war vigorously. Where is this to end? The whole progress towards the accomplishment of this avowed object of the President, to conquer a peace, has been marked by an earnest desire eagerly to prosecute the war, until we find ourselves where no man expected. Sir, instead of being an abstraction, these resolutions are eminently practical; they are so intended to present to the people of this country a finale, probably not now anticipated, but which will come if proper precautions be not taken. It is while the public mind is yet sound, and while the Senate, as I believe, is prepared almost unanimously to vote against such an end of the war, that I wish this expression of opinion to be made. Sir, we begin now to find the misfortune of entering into a war without a declaration of war—without a declaration setting forth to the people the causes of the war, and one upon which they may hold the government responsible. We have got into a war by a recognition of war, and not a declaration, and hence the necessity for this resolution, to negative a result which we do not contemplate. No, sir, it is as practical as any measure that can be brought forward—for, until the question, which arises upon these resolutions is decided, we shall be at a loss to know what amount of supplies, how many men, and how much money to grant. If it be declared, that it is not intended to conquer Mexico so as to destroy her nationality—this will throw a great deal of light upon our vote; but if it be contemplated to do this, then more men, and more money will be required; and hence the decision upon these resolutions may be a preliminary step to be taken. Sir, it was a good old practice in the early stages of this government, when the President of these United States sent an address to Congress, that an answer to that address was prepared in a Committee of the Whole, and the whole affairs of the nation were discussed before any measures were adopted. That is the course pursued in the British Parliament, and in the French Chamber of Deputies. That practice has been dropped, and the various subjects now come before us piecemeal, and are referred to committees; and we have no opportunity of knowing what the state of the Union is, until we are called on to vote upon the various propositions so submitted. Now, I hope that a discussion will be had, if discussion be necessary, and that a vote will be taken; though, if what I hear from the Senator from Michigan be correct, that no man contemplates the entire conquest of all Mexico, then we need not have a long discussion, and it will be very satisfactory to myself at least, and I believe it will be highly satisfactory to the people generally, to have it declared that such a thing is not contemplated.

Mr. CASS.—I do not see that the Senator from South Carolina has changed the question. He speaks of the objects of the war. If by this is meant the objects to be attained by the prosecution of the war, every man, woman, and child in the country can understand them. They are security and indemnity. All we seek of Mexico, to use a phrase a good deal reprobated, is to conquer a peace. That is the object that we have in view; we seek to prevail upon the Mexican government to consent to an amicable adjustment—that is the object sought by the nation, and I do not see how it is to be attained by such resolutions as these. Now the honorable Senator says, that the decision of these resolutions may guide us in the amount of force to be raised. I take it, sir, that most of us in the Senate, the Executive and a great majority of this nation, intend to go on with the war until Mexico will consent to an honorable peace; and I take it, that a majority of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives will vote the necessary means for this purpose. Now, what we are willing to do at one time, we may not be willing to do at another; we may accept to-day what we would refuse to-morrow; and we might have accepted yesterday perhaps, what we would have refused to-day.

The course of obstinate infatuation on the part of Mexico, if persisted in, may compel us to do hereafter far otherwise than we would do now. I am not for agitating the question. When the time comes that we shall be called on to act constitutionally and lawfully; let us then act, but not by a previous declaration. The honorable Senator says, that at a certain meeting, a proposition was made that Mexico must be altogether annihilated; what, then, is it necessary for us to declare that such is not the intention? Sometime since, a resolution was offered for annexing Cuba to this country, and yet nobody thought of offering a counter resolution that it should not be annexed; and if a proposition were made any where that England or France should be annexed to this country, there would be no necessity to bring forward a resolution in opposition to it. It seems to me, that these resolutions have no practical bearing, or if they have, that this is not the time for their discussion. I leave the question.

Mr. MILES.—I have always been opposed to wasting much time on the discussion of abstract propositions, in which light I regard these resolutions, and especially the one of my honorable friend from New York. The discussion upon that resolution would not shed much light upon the principal question, which can only come up on a Territorial bill or a treaty. I regard the resolution of the honorable and distinguished Senator from South Carolina, as pretty near an abstraction. That honorable Senator is rather fond of abstractions, and probably he has introduced a good many of them in the form of resolutions here. There does appear to me, sir, to be intimate connexion between the two great questions presented in these resolutions, and the whole legislation upon these subjects in regard to our peculiar, extraordinary, unexampled relations with a neighboring power. We are called on by the Executive, in the discharge of his high functions, to provide additional means for the prosecution of this war—and with the view, as he tells us, of securing an honorable peace. Well, sir, in regard to the general proposition, I apprehend that there will be very little diversity of opinion here—I should hope so, sir, at least, for even these honorable gentlemen who, some of them, I believe, think that this war originated unnecessarily and somewhat aggressively on our part, must nevertheless see the condition the country is in, and that whatever may have been the origin of the war, cannot now very materially bear upon the question. We must sustain the national character—we must in some way bring this war to a conclusion. Well, sir, if the proposition of the honorable Senator have a direct and practical bearing upon the bill which may come before us in pursuance of the recommendation of the President, then, sir, perhaps we may as well meet this great question in this form as in any other. I should think that the decision of the Senate upon the two questions which these resolutions present, would be matter of some importance to the Committee on Military Affairs, and would give some degree of direction to the course of action devolving on them, and in regard to the additional propositions which it may be their duty to bring before us in the prosecution of this war. As I have already observed, all parties will agree that this war should be brought to an honorable conclusion. What is an honorable conclusion of the war? Some may think that we have acquired honor enough already in its prosecution, and that we should be prosecuted it as far as is justifiable. There are but few, however, who think so. We want a treaty of peace; the war must be prosecuted for that object, and it is a legitimate object; but at the same time we who represent the interests of this great nation have, or ought to have, some little sagacity. We must look at this actual condition of things and see what will be the result of pursuing this matter—and this question is distinctly presented in the second resolution; that is, what line of policy in the prosecution of this war may lead to a result which will be much more important—much more solemn in its consequences than the attainment of an honorable peace. May not such a result follow? Is there not reason to fear it and if so it may not be amiss to look at it in advance, and as preceding the preparations which it may be necessary to make for the prosecution of the war. I believe it to be the general sentiment of this body, that the conquest of this extensive country is not desired. The next question is, whether we may or not be thrown into a position in which such a result will become almost inevitable. The Senator from Michigan tells us we cannot see the end of the war—that we cannot now say what the terms of peace should be, because, what might be suitable at this time, might be very unsuitable at another time. Well, then, would it not be well to examine and see how we are best to secure the object we are all aiming at, that we may not be drawn into the necessity of taking possession of the whole of Mexico? - Now, both of these questions are presented in these resolutions, and the last one I regard as being of the great importance, and there may be difficulty in acting upon it, because there is nothing deficient in the terms of the resolution itself by which we are to reach the end desired. I believe I may say that we all wish to avoid the probable contingency whereby we shall be under the necessity of taking care of the whole population of that country and extending our jurisdiction over it. Now these are great questions, which cannot be too carefully considered. I am not for abandoning this war, but at the same time. I cannot but see that every step we take in the conquest of this country but increases our difficulty and renders the adjustment which I have alluded to a subject of greater difficulty. Sir, no one can mistake that it is the sentiment of the army, and the army of this country is now of sufficient importance to speak, and to be heard and felt; it is evidently, I say, their sentiment that this war is only to end with the entire conquest of Mexico. I have read the proceedings of the meeting to which the honorable Senator alluded; I read them with the most profound regret.—Sir, we hear from our countrymen abroad in the service of their country, (and we hear the same from several quarters,) that we cannot make peace without the subjugation of the whole country. When we see that these things are so, and that this is likely to become the prevailing sentiment, is it not time to view matters carefully, and to proceed with caution? I think so, for one. It is not necessary to go farther into this subject; it is not necessary to look at the consequences that will result to our institutions; it is not difficult to see the unhappy condition in which this country will be placed, and the alarming results which will follow from a change so great, so momentous, in our political condition, and in the extent of our territorial possessions. Sir, I think there is some propriety in acting upon these propositions in advance of acting upon measures connected with this war. I certainly should not have proposed anything of the kind myself, but being here, I cannot see, looking at the signs of the times, but that there is a manifest propriety in examining these questions. I am one who think that we ought to have indemnity from Mexico; that we ought to prosecute the war with the end of obtaining indemnity if there be any reasonable prospect of getting it by a farther extension of our conquests. But if there is not such a prospect—if we have already proceeded far enough to be convinced that peace is not to be obtained by extending our dominion, then comes the grave question, whether we shall fall back upon some such proposition as that which was offered by the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina at the last session, and content ourselves with the occupation of a portion of their territory, or whether we will make the calamities of war fall with increased force upon the enemy, and then induce them to make peace. But will they be induced to do this by breaking up the fragments of the government they have, and resolving that country into the primitive condition of a population without a government? I think it involves a serious doubt, whether, after we have done that, we shall not be further from the end than we are at present. I will yield my objections against diverting the attention of the Senate to the discussion of abstract propositions, so far as these propositions have a bearing upon the subject that may come before us for our consideration. Believing this to be the case in regard to one of these propositions, I shall not offer any opposition to its discussion. I hope it will come up at an early day. I know there are important matters of business, important bills, one of them in relation to our foreign mail service, which I hope will be considered at an early day, and I greatly fear that if these two propositions are taken up, the discussion will consume a month, at least, of our time, before we can do anything in regard to these important matters of business.

Mr. DICKINSON.—Anxious as I am to obtain discussion upon the resolutions I offered, I do not wish them to interfere with matters of legislation; nor shall I discuss them as some others seem inclined to do, before they are under consideration. The Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES,] thinks they are abstractions. I believe, sir, I can call that Senator as a witness, and disprove his allegation. That Senator is at all times severely practical, and yet, on presenting resolutions of his State this morning, he proceeded to discuss the subject embraced in my resolutions at great length, and with his usual ability. Now, sir, had these resolutions been abstractions I am sure they would not have thus received the Senator's notice, for the reason that he does not gratuitously discuss abstractions. I do not complain of this departure from the usual course, for it was doubtless agreeable to the Senate to listen to the learned Senator, as it certainly was to me; but I adduce it as the highest evidence that my resolutions are not abstractions. The resolutions are eminently practical; they relate to subjects of legislation which have agitated the country for two years past, and upon which we must act. I did not bring the slavery question here. It is here from every State in the Union, in some form. I bring a proposition to transfer it from here, with all its disturbing consequences, to the local communities where it belongs. If it could be thus disposed of, a greater good would be accomplished than if we were to pass all the bills which can be brought before this body. I will add, sir, that, in conversing with the honorable Senator from South Carolina an arrangement, which is entirely satisfactory, has been agreed upon, and, therefore, I withdraw my motion to make the resolutions which I have offered the order of the day.

ROUTE TO CALIFORNIA.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolutions submitted on Thursday last by Mr. PEARCE, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That on those principles upon which the right of military occupation over Upper California was acquired by the United States, it is the opinion of the Senate that the Executive ought to cause the Territory of the State of California to be considered as a part of the United States, and to cause the laws of the United States, regulating the Executive Government and conducting the intercourse with the Indian tribes, to be extended over the same, and to make such appointments as may be necessary to carry the same into effect.

THE LATE GEORGE C. DROMGOOLE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: I have the honor to announce to the Senate the death of the Hon. GEORGE C. DROMGOOLE, late a Representative from the State of Virginia.

The resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives on the occasion having been read, Mr. MASON rose and addressed the Senate, as follows:

I discharge a melancholy duty, Mr. President, in asking the Senate to extend the customary evidences of respect to the memory of the very distinguished gentleman whose name has just been announced to us. GEORGE COKE DROMGOOLE, a representative elected from the State of Virginia to the present Congress, died at his residence in the county of Brunswick, in that State, on the 27th day of April, in the present year. He had just closed the fifth term of his service in the House of Representatives, and had been re-elected by a constituency amongst whom he was born, when the irrevocable mandate was issued which now numbers him with the dead. Nature had formed him for a statesman of the highest order, and soon distinguished by popular favor, his inclinations and habits of mind at once directed him to the paths of public life. A clear head and sound heart, assured alike unshaken loyalty to his country, and inviolable faith to his friends. When just entering upon manhood he was chosen a delegate to the General Assembly of Virginia, (and with an interval of but two years during which he declined a re-election,) from that time forth, continued a representative of the people, until his career was close by death. In the year 1829 he was chosen a member of the convention called to revise the constitution of that State—a body selected with great care by the people of Virginia, composed of our wisest statesmen, and numbering among its members, men who adorned and left their impress upon the age in which they lived. From the House of Delegates he was transferred to the Virginia Senate, and whilst presiding officer [illegible] in [illegible] House of Representatives of the [illegible] time to be associated with [illegible] honored State [illegible] early development in youth, to the maturity of riper years, that [illegible] accompanies the quick wit and ready thought that distinguished the career of this gifted man. With ardent temperament and decided opinions, General DROMGOOLE always stood allied with party. But he made no enemies. Ever more ready in the stern conflicts of party, to disarm than to wound; or with ready and playful remark, to turn aside acerbity. In social life he enjoyed and deserved the [illegible] signally shown than in the incidents connected with the election which but a few days preceded his death, when his constituents by a diminished vote, evinced, that although they could chasten, they would not dismiss their representative. Of his infirmities, sir, it may become him to speak, who himself has none; let their memory be buried in the tomb, where now reposes all that was mortal of the statesman, the patriot, and the friend. I move, sir, the following resolutions:

[illegible] Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility of the decease of the Honorable GEORGE C. DROMGOOLE, a Representative elect from the State of Virginia, which has been communicated to the House of Representatives.

[illegible] Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the House of Representatives.

[illegible] As a further mark of respect, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions having been unanimously adopted,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1847.

NOTICE OF BILL.

Messrs BRADBURY, BREESE and BRIGHT, gave notice that on to-morrow, or at some early day, they would ask leave to introduce certain bills, which they named.

SUPERINTENDENT OF THE ANTE-CHAMBER.

On motion by Mr. MANGUM, it was Ordered, That the Vice President be authorized and requested to appoint a Superintendent of the Senate's ante-chamber.

EXTRADITION TREATIES.

Mr. DAYTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to enquire whether any legislation is necessary, to carry into effect the [illegible] between this country and France, of the 9th November, 1843, for the mutual extradition, to other charge, the same from justice, and the 10th article of the treaty with Great Britain, of August 9, 1842, upon the same subject, and that said Committee report to the Senate whether any, and what, additional legislation is necessary.

FORT ARMSTRONG.

Mr. BREESE submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate if Fort Armstrong, on Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, is now occupied as a military post, and, if not, how long the same has been abandoned as such; the value and quantity of the public property now [illegible] and whether the interests of the government require that said site should be reserved from sale, for military purposes.

EXTENSION OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

Mr. ASHLEY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the Act entitled "An Act to regulate the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved February 22, 1847, to all cases which have arisen before the territorial courts of Iowa, or which may hereafter arise in the State of Iowa.

CONICAL VENTILATOR.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. MANGUM asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to direct the Secretary of the Navy to purchase the patent right of the Conical Ventilator; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPEAL OF THE PILOT LAWS.

Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Caleb Green; and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1847.

PETITIONS.

Mr. GREENE presented the petition of Elizabeth Hamilton, widow of Alexander Hamilton, deceased, praying the patronage of the government in the publication of the writings of her late husband; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. ATCHISON presented the memorial of Henry M. Shreve, praying compensation for the use, by the government, of a snag boat of which he is the inventor and patentee, and the purchase of his patent right by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE presented the memorial of the yearly meeting of Anti-Slavery Friends of Indiana, praying for the adoption of measures for the immediate termination of the war with Mexico, and for the immediate termination of slavery.

On presenting this petition, Mr. HALE said: I suppose, Mr. President, as this petition prays for the exertion of all the powers of government so far as they extend in relation to this subject, it includes within its perview slavery within the District of Columbia; and I am informed that the practice has obtained in the Senate, when petitions of this character are presented, to raise the question of reception, and that such a motion is laid upon the table and there the matter drops. As this course does not accord with my own conviction of duty, I must urge a different disposition of this petition; and, I hope that if exception be taken, it will be taken without this side-blow of a motion to lay on the table. With this view, if the question of reception be raised, I ask that it may be taken by yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—Those in favor of taking the question by yeas and nays will rise.

Mr. HALE.—Was the motion made to lay the motion upon the table?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The question is to be put as a matter of course.

Mr. HALE.—I was not aware of the existence of such a rule; but that being the case, I would like to say a single word on the main question, as the motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I trust that the established usage of the Senate will not be departed from on this occasion. When a petition of this sort is presented, the question of reception is raised by a motion to lay a petition on the table. I raise that question; I move to lay the motion upon the table.

Mr. HALE.—Upon that question I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, inquired whether it would be in order to move a postponement of the question of reception till to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The question to lay on the table has precedence.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, then said that his only object was, that the Senate might be full before the question was taken.

Mr. CALHOUN.—What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—It is to lay the motion to receive the petition on the table.

Mr. CALHOUN.—What is the subject matter of the petition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HALE.—If it be in order, I will state the subject matter of the petition. The petition comes from the yearly meeting of Friends at Newport, Wayne county, Indiana, praying the termination of the war in Mexico; and also, praying that all the powers vested in Congress upon the subject, shall be exerted for the termination of slavery.

Mr. BUTLER.—That does not say anything about slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HALE.—I remarked that that was included in the petition.

The question was then taken on the call for the yeas and nays. A sufficient number of members rising, the yeas and nays were ordered, and were taken as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Benton, Breese, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Cass, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dix, Downs, Fairfield, Felch, Hunter, Jarnagin, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Mason, Niles, Rusk, Sevier, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Clarke, Corwin, Greene, Hale, Miller, Phelps, Upham, Wentworth, and Winthrop—10.

So the motion to receive the petition was laid upon the table.

Mr. HALE presented the memorial of David T. Burr, and sixty-nine others, citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for such an alteration of the constitution and laws as shall abolish slavery throughout the Union.

Mr. HALE said: I do not understand that there is a standing rule or order of the Senate that raises the question whether this petition shall be received, or the motion to receive it laid on the table. I ask whether the motion to receive the petition is debatable? Am I correct, sir, in supposing it is debatable?

PRESIDING OFFICER.—It is debatable.

Mr. HALE.—So understanding it, sir, I wish to say a single word in vindication of the course which I deem it my duty to take on this occasion. It is with no desire to produce angry feelings, or excited discussion, but it is in discharge of my duty, under the deep and earnest convictions of my understanding, that I attempt to discharge that duty. What is the refusal of the Senate to receive these petitions? It is saying that there are some subjects on which the people shall not approach this tribunal. In this day, speculation is adventurous. We venture to inquire into all the secrets of the material and the spiritual world. The researches of geological science have penetrated the bowels of the earth, and have found there the materials by which it is essayed to prove that

[illegible]

Nay, inquiry goes with adventurous flight to the very throne of Eternity, and undertakes to scan the laws by which He that sits thereon governs His own actions and the world He has created.—And, sir, if speculation is thus adventurous, have we, in the United States of America, an institution which exalts itself above God—defying examination or inquiry, or petition even? Most emphatically, sir, do I conceive that, at the present day, the people of the United States have a peculiar right to come and ask of this body a respectful hearing of their petitions, and a respectful hearing on this very subject. Sir, it is no mere abstraction. It is an element of political power in the formation of our constitution; it is an element on which the constitution of the other House is regulatedt; and it is an element in the political discussion and action of the present day, which is involving the nation in a foreign and aggressive war, at the expense of forty or fifty millions of dollars annually. And if the people of the United States are to be thus taxed for a war, growing immediately and directly out of an institution of this character, are they to be told that they shall not come and respectfully present their petitions upon this subject? I have thus discharged my duty to those who sent me here; without any expectation of influencing the action of this body, without any desire to excite angry feeling or discussion. I ask that the petition be received.

Mr. BERRIEN.—The practice which has been adopted by the Senate has been the result of calm and deliberate consideration. It has protected us from those exciting discussions which, in another branch of the national legislature, have too often occurred. I do not apprehend that anything which has fallen from the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, who presents this petition, is calculated to change the well-settled conviction of the Senate on this subject. I therefore, sir, the question of reception being before the Senate, move to lay that question on the table.

The motion to receive the petition was then laid on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented the petition of D. A. Waterston, praying compensation for services as clerk in the office of the Surveyor General of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MASON presented the memorial of William B. Slaughter, late Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin, praying the re-payment of money expended by him in the public service; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That Joseph H. Waring have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. GREENE, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Elizabeth Hamilton, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Library.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the petition of Joseph M. Sheppard, administrator of Richard Harris, deceased, and John Scott, administrator of Nimrod Farrow, deceased, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. MILLER, it was Ordered, That the memorials and petitions against the repeal of the pilot act, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, it was Ordered, That the petition of William W. Hall, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. CASS, it was Ordered, That the petition of Thomas C. Sheldon, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. DICKINSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Lorimer Graham, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was Ordered, That the memorials and petitions on the files of the Senate in favor of the repeal of the Pilot act, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, gave notice that on to-morrow he should ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill confirming the pensions of certain widows.

THE PATENT LAWS.

Mr. WESTCOTT submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office be instructed to enquire whether any, and what amendments of the present laws relative to Patents and the Patent Office be necessary.

ADDITIONAL TROOPS.

Mr. CASS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. CASS gave notice that he would call this bill up on the first opportunity, after it should have been printed.

COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

Mr. DIX, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill concerning certain collection districts, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act to regulate the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, in certain cases, and for other purposes;" on which he asked for speedy action of the Senate, as the bill was applicable to cases now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States. It was intended to remedy a defect in existing laws on the subject.

The bill having had its first reading, was then read a second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed, and read a third time.

The bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill do pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

FORT ARMSTRONG.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. BREESE, and it was agreed to.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform the Senate if Fort Armstrong, on Rock Island in the State of Illinois, is now occupied as a military post and if not, how long the same has been abandoned, in what state is the same, and on what terms the use thereof be obtained by the United States, if the interests of the government require that the same should be reserved from the public sales.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after a short time spent therein, the doors were opened, and

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1847.

The Hon. ARTHUR P. BAGBY, of the State of Alabama, appeared in the Senate to-day.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of Mr. WALKER, his private Secretary, transmitting a report from the Secretary of the Navy, in relation to the construction of floating dry-docks at Pensacola, Philadelphia, and Kittery; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DICKINSON presented the memorial of John Black, late Consul of the United States at the city of Mexico, praying compensation for diplomatic services; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, presented the memorial of the Adjutant of the United States Military Academy at West Point, praying that he may be placed on the same footing with respect to pay and allowances as Adjutants of regiments; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented the memorial of the Secretary and Executive Committee of the American Colonization Society, praying that in the removal of colored people to Liberia they be exempted from the provisions of the acts of 22d February and 2d March, 1847, and left to the act of 2d March, 1819, or be allowed to carry two passengers to every five tons of measurement; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CASS in presenting the memorial of Mary W. Thompson, widow of the late Lieut. Col. Alexander R. Thompson, of the United States Army, deceased, in behalf of widows and orphans of the army of the United States, praying that the present pension laws may be so amended as to make their pensions equal to those of the widows of Revolutionary officers, and to continue them during life or widowhood, instead of five years only, and to include those families whose husbands and fathers have died in the military service from exposure and disease from the fate of an inhospitable climate, said: I hold in my hands, Mr. President, the memorial of the widow of an American officer who has fallen in battle; and after the very eloquent eulogium pronounced upon those officers by the honorable Senator from New York—an eulogium not less true in its sentiments than eloquently expressed—I consider it perfectly unnecessary for me to do anything more than to present the memorial, and move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs. I therefore move its reference to that committee.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CASS presented the memorial of J. Kearsley, receiver of public monies at Detroit, Michigan, praying remuneration for monies expended by him for clerk hire; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. BAGBY, it was Ordered, That the documents relating to the claim of George S. Gaines, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion by Mr. BAGBY, it was Ordered, That the petition of Stephen Steele and James Daniel, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. DICKINSON, it was Ordered, That Lyon and Howard have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

MILITARY STATISTICS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War inform the Senate

First.—What has been the whole number of volunteer troops called into the service of the United States since the 13th May, 1846?

Second.—Of the troops so called, what has been the whole number discharged from such service before their term of service had expired? and what the number mustered out of the service of the United States?

Third.—What has been the whole number of troops in Mexico belonging to the regular army of the United States since the 13th May, 1846?

Fourth.—What was the number of troops now in Mexico?

Fifth.—What has been the whole number of officers and men belonging either to the regular army or the volunteers who have been killed or died of wounds received in battle since the 13th May, 1846?

Sixth.—What has been the whole number of officers and men of the regular army or volunteers wounded in battle since the 7th May, 1846, who have not died of their wounds?

EXTENSION OF NAVY PENSIONS.

Mr. BALDWIN submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to enquire into the expediency and propriety of extending the benefit of the provision of the act of 3d March, 1845, entitled "An act renewing certain naval pensions for the term of five years," to all pensions of a similar kind which have expired since the passage of the act of 3d March, 1845.

DAVID SHAW, ET. AL.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom had been referred the joint resolution in favor of David Shaw, and Solomon T. Corser, reported it without amendment.

THOMAS RHODES.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom had been referred the documents relating to the claim of Thomas Rhodes, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas Rhodes; which was read and passed to a second reading.

COMMODORE F. A. PARKER.

Mr. BADGER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Commodore Foxall A. Parker, of the United States navy; which was read and passed to a second reading.

ASSISTANT PURSERS.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to provide for the appointment of assistant pursers in the navy; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and the further consideration thereof postponed until Monday.

PENSIONS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to continue the pensions of certain widows; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Campbell, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill making an appropriation to supply in part, a deficiency in the appropriation for subsistence in kind, of the army and volunteers during the year ending the 30th June, 1847.

The said bill having been read a first and second times, by unanimous consent, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

THE MADISON PAPERS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. CRITTENDEN asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for the purchase of the manuscript papers of the late James Madison, former President of the United States.

The bill having been read a first time,

Mr. CRITTENDEN desired that it might have a second reading, with a view to reference.

The bill having been read a second time,

Mr. CRITTENDEN remarked that he did not know which would be the most appropriate committee to which to refer the bill; he supposed the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BERRIEN.—If the honorable Senator will permit me, I will observe, that this bill, at the last session, passed this body by a considerable majority. There was a very decided expression of the will of the Senate to make the purchase of these papers for the benefit of the venerable and estimable lady to whom they belong, and I do really hope that the feeling of the Senate will prompt them to dispense with the ordinary formal mode of reference to a committee; and with their permission I will move that the bill be now put upon its passage.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I should be most happy if such a course should be taken, and perhaps there will be no objection on the part of the Senate. The bill is, in principle, exactly the same as that which passed at the last session. According to the arrangement with Mrs. Madison and some of her friends, and reduced to the form of a special contract, placed in my possession, it was agreed that if the purchase of these papers should be made by Congress, only $5,000 of the purchase money was to be paid in her hands at present; the residue of $40,000 to be placed in the hands of Mr. Buchanan, Secretary of State, Mr. Mason, Secretary of the Navy, and Richard Smith, Esq., a respectable citizen of the District, to [illegible] best discretion for her interests; to be inalienable during her life-

[illegible] ject to be disposed of only by her last will and testament. These [illegible] time of the Senate farther than to remark, that I hold in my hand an able report made by a committee of the House of Representatives, of which a distinguished member of that body—now no more—the late Mr. Dromgoole—was the chairman, in which the papers are classified and described in such a manner as to convince every [illegible] wisdom, of their great value and importance to this country. No- [illegible] would not be a precious relic in the eyes of the people of the United States. No statesman more judicious, more pure, more temperate than he, has ever appeared in the political annals of this country. These are writings and memorials which will acquire additional value by the lapse of time; they are not of that trifling and ephemeral character that will pass away, or whose value will be exhausted and forgotten in a moment. They are "for [illegible] important period in the history of this country, and a man who was himself one of the architects—the principal architects in erecting the mighty structure of this republic. It is to some extent to be attributed to the influence of his mighty work and most comprehensive mind that we hold our seats this day, and that this government exists. Every thing said and done by such a man must be calculated to reflect light upon our institutions; must be [illegible] and labored [illegible] example [illegible] the printed volumes, but the manuscript in his own writing, to which we may point and lay up forever in the repositories of our public records. I am one of those who believe, sir, that a letter of Mr. Madison's in manuscript, one hundred and fifty years hence, will be worth more than whole volumes of ordinary printed works. The cost will be nothing in comparison with their value. There are other considerations applicable to this subject that are better understood than they can be expressed, by every member of this body. I shall say no more in reference to them; but when I consider the character of these works—their importance to the people of the [illegible] the estimable [illegible] and to secure the same which we [illegible] of their we will [illegible] and one, we [illegible] the [illegible] relics of one who contributed so largely to make this mighty country what it is. I hope, therefore, that the motion made against [illegible] the Senate will now at once proceed to act finally upon this bill. If there be gentlemen, as there may be, who are opposed upon principle to the passage of such a law, I hope that they will be satisfied to discharge what [illegible] and I [illegible] sent, if they vote at all—but that they will allow the friends of the measure to bring it to a final vote, by permitting the bill now to be put on its passage.

Mr. NILES.—I hope the bill will have it usual reference.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I will withdraw the motion for the passage of the bill, if the Senator from Connecticut means to oppose it.

Mr. NILES.—I have the floor, I believe, sir. I hope this bill will be referred to the committee. I think that this is not a subject to be acted upon without due consideration. This thing seems to be increasing upon us, and it is difficult to say where it will end. If this bill is intended to authorize the purchase of valuable manuscripts, connected with the history of this country, it certainly requires consideration, and more than almost any other subject, demands the action of a committee. We do not know what these manuscripts are. We know something certainly of the [illegible] but we know not what these papers are—whether they consist of correspondence; whether they are his private journals, or what they are. We know nothing at all about them. And I beg leave to remind the Senate that we have already purchased what was supposed to be the most valuable part of the papers of Mr. Madison. We purchased them, sir, at an expense of thirty-five thousand dollars. I happened to be here at that time, and supposed we had purchased every thing of value connected with the history [illegible] But it now appears that every thing valuable has been kept back; and after we have made this second purchase we may be called [illegible] course of proceeding is to end, it is certainly difficult to foresee. I hope the reference will be made.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—If it would be proper for me, I would [illegible] They are these:

[illegible] Volume 3d.—The letters to foreign ministers and diplomatic functionaries, heads of [illegible] drew Stevenson, John Adams, J. Q. Adams, W. C. Rives, &c., to the close of either [illegible] tonical, natural history, &c., may make out this volume—may include also printed essays in French, political observations in 1795, and examination of British doctrine, &c.; [illegible] volumes, and leave the miscellanies for the 7th.

This will give an adequate idea of the deep interest of these papers. I know perfectly well that it is the honest conviction of my friend from Connecticut which produces his opposition. It is an opposition, I am sure, contrary to his own feelings. A sense of duty alone impels him, for which I have the greatest possible respect; but I hope, that upon consideration of this matter and this information as to the character of the papers, the honorable gentleman will be satistied with such opposition as he may feel constrained to make by his vote, and allow us to act upon the bill.

Mr. NILES.—If it be the wish of the Senate to act upon the bill at this time, I will withdraw my motion for reference.

Mr. CRITTENDEN asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SEVIER.—I hope the honorable Senator will postpone this bill for a day or two, until we look into it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Certainly, if the Senator insists.

Mr. SEVIER.—I move its postponement until Monday.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—And let it be made the order of the day for that day?

The further consideration of the bill was accordingly postponed, and it was made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Will the bill be printed as a matter of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—Certainly.

Mr. SEVIER.—The Senator from Kentucky referred to a report containing a description of the papers. I wish to have that report printed also. I hope it will be printed with the bill.

The question was taken on printing the report, and it was agreed to.

[illegible]

On motion, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns, it be to Monday [illegible]

[illegible]

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

[illegible] Thomas L. Hamer [illegible] [illegible] of the House of Representatives.

The resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives having been read,

Mr. ALLEN rose and addressed the Senate, as follows:

Mr. President: On the first day of July, of the past year, this body confirmed the nomination of THOMAS L. HAMER, of Ohio, to the rank of Brigadier General, in the army of the United States. The announcement just made by the House, to the Senate, informs us officially, that that eminent citizen has ceased to live. The event of his death occurred at Monterey, in Mexico, on the 2d of December last, and was, therefore, known to us individually long ago; but, by the rules observed on these mournful occasions, it could not be officially noticed until now, he having been a member elect to the present, not a member of the then sitting Congress. But a short time previously to his death, Gen. HAMER had passed along the line of battle, amidst all its dangers, exerting his intellect, his courage, and address in aiding to achieve the third victory of our arms over the public enemy. He came out of that conflict unhurt, and with a vigor of constitution which justified the hope, that he might be able yet again to exert his genius and valor, in upholding the rights of his country, and the honor of its flag. But, otherwise was it ordered, and he retired from the battle-ground—the common resort of death—only to find it in one of those diseases ever incident to the multitudinous life of the camp, and which are known, in military annals, to be but little more sparing of the lives of men than the unsparing sword itself.

To say that his death was a public loss, would be to speak truly, but to speak less than the truth. The death of that man, at any time, and in any state of public affairs, would have been a loss to his country, and a great one. But his death at that time, and in the then exigencies of the public service, was a national privation not to be appreciated, save by those who knew the peculiar character of the man, and its happy adaptation to such exigencies.

We were at the beginning of a war, in which, by the necessities imposed by free institutions, we were obliged to employ a mixed force of regulars and volunteers. To unite these forces under a common discipline—to fuse their various energies into one harmonious whole, and to direct them with full efficiency, has ever been, and will forever be, among the most serious difficulties of those placed in the command of armies. In the attainment of this object, there are required not only the talents to command the muscles of men, in virtue of commissioned authority, but that address, also, which moves the hearts of the soldiery because it springs from the heart of the General.

I would not sir, willingly, do injustice to the living, even to do justice to the dead, could that be possibly necessary. Especially, would I not do injustice to any one of those officers, whose conduct, and the conduct of whose troops in this war, have taught the world, that neither the genius nor the courage are wanting to make this the first nation in it. Nor can I think that I do injustice to any in uttering the opinion, that, perhaps, no one of them possessed in a higher degree, than did General HAMER, that inscrutable power which is expressed by the word—address, and by which a single individual is often seen to sway the discordant wills of thousands, and to bind the whole as by a spell to his person and his purposes more closely than mere official authority can ever bind men of various tempers to a common object. It is for this reason that I esteem his death to have been a peculiar misfortune to the army, and, therefore, to the nation.

In reviewing the lives of the eminent men of our country who have already passed away, no remark will be found more common than, that such a one was a self-made man. There are now in this Senate and elsewhere around us, men whose great abilities and public services will entitle them to be ranked with their illustrious predecessors, and of almost every one of whom it will with equal truth be said, he too, was a self-made man. Not one of them, however, will fall more emphatically within this description than THOMAS L. HAMER.

Inheriting nothing from his parents, but the right truly to say they were respected and honorable people, he went alone from his native State of Pennsylvania, when but a boy, and settled in the county of Clermont, in the State of Ohio.

He began life as the instructor of a country school, devoting the hours otherwise unemployed to study, and especially to the reading of the law. In due time he was admitted to that learned profession, and removing to the adjoining county of Brown, commenced and continued its practice with distinguished success. He had been at the bar, however, but a very short time when political events began to excite an extraordinary interest in the public mind. So deep and general did that interest soon become, and so strong were the passions which it called up from the repose of the eight preceding years, that it was scarcely possible for a young man, such as Mr. HAMER was, of admitted genius and eloquence, of an ardent nature, of a blameless character, and of decided political sentiments, to resist the importunities of his fellow citizens, who sought to make him the representative of their wishes and opinions. He was accordingly elected and re-elected to the lower branch of the State Legislature, and, by that body, elected its presiding officer. From this post he retired, intending to resume his place at the bar. But the same causes which had drawn him from it before still acting, and with accumulated force, he again yielded, and was, by the same constituency, three times elected to the Nation's House of Representatives, from which we have just received this melancholy message. At the expiration of his third term, he again voluntarily retired, and once more resumed the practice of the law. It was in this situation, with abilities and legal learning, which, in that region of the State, admitted of no rivalry, and in the enjoyment of a corresponding practice and emolument, that he heard the call of his country upon her sons to arm. He obeyed, and was among the first to set an example, by himself volunteering as a common soldier. His friends and constituents followed his lead, and speedily, an organized body stood ready for the march.

Mr. HAMER was known personally and well to the President, with whom he had served in the House of Representatives, amid scenes no less trying to the firmness and fortitude of men, than the field of battle itself. The President was, therefore, under no necessity to ask who should be placed in command of the Ohio Brigade. Mr. HAMER was appointed, and that, too, without his solicitation; and, I believe, without his knowledge of such an event being in contemplation.

He accepted the commission, proceeded on duty, and lost his life in its performance; having been elected in his absence, again to Congress.

When the intelligence of this sad event came to the west, the Legislature of Ohio, being in session, immediately adopted appropriate measures to express, in behalf of the whole people, their high appreciation of his virtues, abilities, and services, and the profound sense felt by all, of the loss sustained in his death. The State stretched forth her hands and drew the dead body of her adopted son to her bosom. There it now reposes, amid the family, the neighbors, the constituency, who received it with sighs and with tears, for the same reason they had always before greeted his return among them with exultation and joy.

It would be but a common-place and an insufficient eulogy upon Mr. HAMER, to say, that in all the relations he bore to the community, he exhibited the qualities appropriate to those relations. Society has a right to expect such a result even from a man of mere mediocrity. But from one in the powers of whose mind the discriminating partiality of nature was so manifest as in his, society has a right to demand such an exertion of intellect and exhibition of virtues as may tend to the advancement of its lasting welfare, and afford an example to the incoming generation. To this demand, the whole life of Mr. HAMER—his private and public manners, habits and sympathies; his benevolence, integrity and honor; his intelligence, industry, courage, genius and patriotism—all responded in a manner to entitle him to demand in his turn, the lasting gratitude of society. This he enjoyed when he lived, and when called to pass that boundary which nature has drawn between the living and the dead, he did so with the consciousness that he laid down a life that might be reviewed by the intelligent and the just, with the approbation of every mind and of every heart which, like his own, was sound, and strong, and pure.

Long will his memory be cherished by the State. Long will his old constituents of Clermont, of Brown, of Adams and Highland, remember their affectionate friend, their faithful counsellor, their able representative. And many are the aged fathers among them who, to stimulate the emulation of their sons, will recount to them in the winter's evenings, the scenes, the events, the sayings and the anecdotes, of his brilliant and blameless life. Long will the widow and the children remember, fondly remember, the husband and the parent, in whose affections they were happy, in whose character they are honored, and in the imitation of whose virtues his sons will find the only reward which can bear any proportion to the magnitude of their loss.

Mr. ALLEN concluded by offering the following resolutions:

Resolved, unanimously, That the Senate has received with deep sensibility, the message from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of the Hon. THOMAS L. HAMER, a Representative elect from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn

The resolutions having been unanimously adopted,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1847.

THE LATE SENATOR FAIRFIELD.

Mr. BRADBURY rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President—I rise to the performance of a duty too painful for language to describe. One who was with us in this chamber, at the last meeting of the Senate, attending to his official duties, assisting in our deliberations, and as confidently looking forward to the future as those who are now present, has suddenly fallen in our midst. He is now numbered with the dead. Four times has the Senate already been called during the few days of its session, to manifest the last tokens of respect for the honored dead, who have been prevented from entering upon the field of their labors in the present Congress. Now, the destroyer has entered these halls, and struck down his victim before our eyes.

The Hon. JOHN FAIRFIELD is no more. He died at his lodgings in this city on Friday last. The sudden and startling announcement of his death preceded the intelligence of danger. On the morning of that day he was in his usual health, and met his friends with his accustomed cheerfulness and cordiality. At noon he submitted to a surgical operation, to which, with undoubting confidence, he had looked forward for relief from an infirmity under which he had labored. His physical energies were not equal to his fortitude and courage. His system sank under the unabated anguish which followed, and at twenty minutes before eight o'clock in the evening, in the full possession of his mind, he breathed his last. Scarcely had the friends that were with him anticipated danger, when his pure spirit took its flight.

From an affliction so appaling it is difficult to divert attention, even to contemplate for a moment the life and character of the deceased. Gov. FAIRFIELD was born at Saco, in the county of York, Maine, January 30, 1797. In that place he has ever resided. Distinguished by an ardent love of knowledge, an active mind, and great strength of purpose, on arriving at manhood he devoted himself to the study of the law, and entered a profession which has contributed its full share in the establishment and defence of constitutional liberty. At the bar he soon acquired such reputation that he received from the Executive of the State the appointment of reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court.

While in the successful performance of the duties of this office, he was called by the people of the first Congressional district, without solicitation or desire on his part, to take his place in the councils of the nation as a Representative in Congress. He received a re-election, and it is well known that he discharged the responsible duties devolved upon him on trying occasions in a manner alike honorable to himself and to his constituents.

His services were now demanded in a different sphere. He was elected Governor of his native State; and so strong was his hold upon the confidence and regard of the people, that he was thrice re-elected to the same exalted station. It was during this period of his public life, when great and unusual responsibilities were thrown upon him as the Chief Executive of the State, growing out of collisions with a foreign power, that he displayed a decision and firmness of character which commanded the respect, and fixed upon him the attention of the whole country. He became, emphatically, the favorite of his State; and he was now transferred from its Executive chair to a seat upon this floor, to fill a vacancy created by the resignation of his predecessor. In 1845 he received a re-election to the Senate, for the term of six years. It may be remarked, as a singular fact, that in all the offices he has held, he has never served out the regular term, but has been transferred, by promotion, to a higher place.

To you, Mr. President, who knew him well, and to the Senators long associated with him, and united by the ties of respect and friendship, I need not speak of his honorable career in this body. You will bear witness to the sound judgment and ready zeal which he brought to the discharge of his varied duties—to that honesty of purpose which knows no guile—to that frankness and sincerity incapable of concealment—to that firmness of resolution which no difficulties could shake nor dangers overcome—and to that purity of life, and conscientious regard to his convictions of right, which distinguished him as a man and a Christian.

How happily these qualities were blended in his character, is known to you; how justly they were appreciated by the people of his native State is seen in the confidence they yielded, and the honors they bestowed. As a friend, he was devoted and sincere; and few there are who have secured the attachment of a wider circle, or bound them by stronger ties of affection. His loss to the public, to his friends, and above all, to his deeply afflicted family, what words can express! I cannot attempt it. He has left behind his example, his character, and the influence of his actions; and, in his sudden death, the admonition is again repeated, that "public honors and exalted station add no strength to the tenure by which life is held."

Mr. NILES then addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: On this melancholy occasion—as probably no other member of the Senate has had so long and intimate acquaintance with him whose decease has just been announced—I hope to be pardoned for adding a few words to what has so appropriately been said by his colleague. In closing the remarks which but a few days ago it became my duty to make in announcing the death of my late colleague, I took occasion to remind Senators of the little and brief interest which we have, individually, in the exciting questions that may be agitated here. I then little thought that the first example of that obvious truth would come so soon, or so near home to myself—that it would be found in one of my oldest and most intimate associates here. We came into the public councils together, twelve years ago, and although our associations were interrupted for a few years, they were renewed on my returning to the Senate at the commencement of my present term. I then came, not at the commencement of the session, but in the spring, and under circumstances which may be fresh in the memories of some Senators present. I was then but the broken fragment of the man I was when I left the Senate a few years before.

Learning that two of my old friends and associates were together in the house where I now am, I joined them there. Those friends were SILAS WRIGHT and JOHN FAIRFIELD—both much younger than myself—and then both in full health, and with a fair prospect of a long career of public usefulness. But how inscrutable are the ways of Providence! They have both been removed in the midst of their days and usefulness from this world of conflict and trouble, whilst I, who had seemingly but a frail hold upon the mere selvage of life, have been spared to witness their departure.

The death of the first was a severe stroke to me, as it was to the whole country. Perhaps in our whole history no man has fallen in private life whose death produced so deep, so universal a sensation in the public mind. And the death of the second has been to me a blow equally severe, and in some respects more trying to my feelings, as I was with him at the time, and witnessed the last lingering pulsations of departing life. The circumstances of his death, too—so sudden, so unexpected, and apparently so causeless, adding a crushing weight to the severity of the shock. He died without a struggle, and I might almost say, with a smile on his countenance, as his soul took its departure from its earthly tabernacle. A long and intimate acquaintance with Governor Fairfield has enabled me, justly, I think, to appreciate his character, both in his public and private relations; but this is not the time or the place to attempt to delineate it, as any hasty efforts of mine would evidently do great injustice to his memory.

If he was not a brilliant star in our political galaxy, he was all he claimed to be—a plain unassuming man, never attempting to shine or to attract attention to himself; but with his strong sense, sound judgment and practical views, was content with an honest and faithful discharge of his public duties.

The strong points in his character, were sincerity and fidelity. If ever occasions have occurred in his time which tried the souls of men, he was one who was found "faithful among the faithless;" true to his constituents; true to his country; faithful to his party; faithful to his friends; and ever true to his principles.

His nature was gentle, kind, peaceful, and benevolent; apparently but little fitted for the fierce struggles and conflicts of political life. But with these qualities were united great energy of character, great steadiness of purpose, and no ordinary share of physical and moral courage. He combined, also, many of the higher and more substantial elements of popularity; and hence it was, as we have just been told, that he for many years, possessed that strong hold upon the confidence and affections of his constituents, and of his friends, whether in or out of the State.

I could enlarge upon this theme with the warmth and ardor with which we all delight to dwell on the virtues of deceased friends, which, like the setting sun, seem to shine brighter as they take their departure, but I will say no more. He is gone; another star has fallen. He is removed from among us, at the very time when men like him, of matured judgment, of subdued passions, of peaceful wisdom, are most wanted in our public councils. The places that once knew him here and elsewhere—in the councils of the nations, in the councils of his State, in the circles of his friends, and in the family circle—but that is a spot too sacred for me to intrude—will know him no more forever. But may we not hope that his virtues and examples will long, long be cherished and remembered as the last legacy he has left his country?

Mr. NILES concluded by offering the following resolutions:

Resolved, unanimously, That a committee be appointed by the VICE PRESIDENT to take order for superintending the funeral of the Honorable JOHN FAIRFIELD, which will take place to-morrow at twelve o'clock, meridian, and that the Senate will attend the same.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon JOHN FAIRFIELD, deceased, late a member thereof, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual method of wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved, unanimously, That as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the Hon JOHN FAIRFIELD, the Senate do now adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1847.

THE LATE SENATOR FAIRFIELD.

Mr. NILES, chairman of the committee appointed to make arrangements for the funeral of the late Honorable Mr. FAIRFIELD, made the following report.

The committee appointed to make arrangements for the Honorable Mr. FAIRFIELD, report: That in compliance with the wishes of the family and friends of the deceased, his remains will be removed to his late residence in Maine, and delivered to his family —to be there interred.

The body will be taken from Mrs. Scott's—where it now lies—to the depot, this day at half past four o'clock, P. M., where it will be delivered into the charge of the Hon. Mr. CLARK, a member of the House of Representatives from that State, who will accompany it to Saco, in that State, to be consigned to the charge of his family.

The committee further report the following resolutions, and recommend their adoption:

Resolved, unanimously, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the Honorable JOHN FAIRFIELD, late a Senator from the State of Maine, the Vice President, members of the Senate and officers, will, at half past four o'clock in the afternoon of this day, accompany, in procession, his mortal remains from his late residence, to the depot, where they will be delivered to the Hon. Mr CLARK, a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Maine, to be accompanied by him to the family of the deceased in said State; and that the Speaker and members of the House of Representatives be respectfully invited to attend.

Resolved, That the Chaplain of the Senate be requested to deliver the funeral sermon of the Hon. JOHN FAIRFIELD, at the capitol, on the next Sabbath.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolutions be communicated to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate, and place at the disposal of the Hon. FRANKLIN CLARK, for the funeral expenses of the Hon. JOHN FAIRFIELD, a sum equal to that usually expended in such cases, to be ascertained and drawn for by the committee of arrangements.

The report and accompanying resolutions having been read,

The question on the adoption of the resolutions was put, and they were unanimously adopted.

On motion by Mr. PHELPS,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1847.

REPORTS FROM DEPARTMENTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, made agreeably to law, accompanied by an abstract of expenditures, under the head of contingent expenses, as settled and allowed at the office of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, from the 1st day of October, 1846, to the 30th day of September, 1847.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill from the House, making an appropriation to supply in part a deficiency in the appropriations for subsistence in kind, of the army and volunteers during the year ending the 30th June, 1848, reported it without amendment.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of said bill as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ATHERTON.—It will be perceived that this bill only makes an appropriation in part to supply the deficiency which exists in the appropriation for the subsistence in kind, of the army and volunteers for the current year. This bill has passed the House; the remainder of the deficiency, which, in the whole, amounts to near $4,000,000, having been reserved for a more minute and particular examination. To show the necessity for passing this bill, at this time, I ask that the letter accompanying it be read.

The SECRETARY then read the following letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 17, 1847.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before you a letter from the Commissary General showing the passing necessity of an early appropriation for the deficiency in the Commissary Department. It is exceedingly important to the public service that immediate provision should be made to meet the deficiency not only in that department, but also those in the other branches of the War Department, for who estimates have been made and submitted to Congress. Any delay in this respect will be highly detrimental to the public interest.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
WM. L. MARCY, Secretary of War.

Hon. S. F. VINTON, Chairman Committee of Ways and Means House of Reps.

OFFICE OF COMMISSARY GENERAL OF SUBSISTENCE,
Washington, December 17, 1847.

SIR: I have the honor to report that the appropriations applicable to "army subsistence" are nearly exhausted.

The whole sum now remaining to the credit of such appropriations does not exceed seven thousand dollars, and that sum is absolutely necessary to meet the demands of the recruiting service.

Recent information from the principal commissaries of subsistence in Mexico, makes it necessary for me to respectfully ask that the early attention of Congress may be called to my "estimate" of the 9th November, in which the deficiency in the former appropriations is stated, as drafts to the amount of five hundred thousand dollars may be daily expected to reach the United States, and, as above shown, this department has no means of paying them.

Most respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEO. GIBSON, C. G. S.

Hon. W. L. MARCY, Secretary of War.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I rise, sir, not for the purpose of offering any opposition to the passage of this bill, but to ask the chairman of the committee, if he knows what is probably the entire deficiency in the estimates; and if he can also explain to the Senate, why it is that the estimates were not sufficiently large at the last session.

Mr. ATHERTON.—In reply to the honorable Senator from Maryland, I will say that it appears from the estimates which have been furnished, that the entire deficiency is $3,987,939 74.

Mr. JOHNSON.—(In his seat.) Nearly four millions.

Mr. CALHOUN.—(In his seat.) Up to this date?

Mr. ATHERTON.—Nearly four millions for the current year. To show the reason for the deficiency in the estimate for the appropriation for the current fiscal year, I would ask that the letter from the Commissary General of Subsistence, be read.

The Secretary then read the following letter:

OFFICE OF COMMISSARY GENERAL OF SUBSISTENCE,
Washington, November 9, 1847.

SIR: In submitting with this an "estimate of the probable amount that will be required to meet the deficiency in the former appropriation for the subsistence of the regular army and volunteers in the service of the United States from December 1, 1847, to June 30, 1848," I have the honor to make the following report in explanation:

At the time when this department was making heavy purchases for shipment to Vera Cruz, Mexico, and to the mouth of the Rio Grande, Texas, large shipments of breadstuffs, as well as other articles composing the army ration, were being made to Europe.

The shipments to Europe enhanced the price of produce in general nearly one half of its previous value; and this enhanced price was kept up for some months.

My annual estimate of the probable price of the ration made November 10, 1846, was only fifteen cents. That estimate of course was made at the time without any expectation of such a rise in the price of produce, and fell far short of the cost of the ration by purchase.

The appropriation for the ten additional regiments of regular troops (authorized after my estimate of November 10, 1846, was made for only four months—six from March 1, 1847, to June 30, 1847. All the troops composing those regiments are now in service, will probably so remain up to June 30, 1848, and will have to be subsisted to that date.

Here will be seen a deficiency in the appropriation of one year, for this large body of troops.

All the volunteers who entered the service for "one year" were not mustered out at the expiration of their time; but many of them had to be subsisted for a longer period than they were appropriated for.

Since June 30, 1847, nine additional regiments of volunteers have been called into service without any additional appropriation being made to meet the expense of subsisting them. They have been subsisted so far out of the last annual appropriation.

The portion of the army under the command of Major General Scott, since it left Jalapa, has been almost wholly supplied with subsistence from the country in the vicinity of its operations, and at prices varying from twenty-six to thirty-two cents per ration—being an increase from eleven to seventeen cents per ration above the estimated price.

The "recruiting service" has tended greatly to increase the expense of this department, as the complete ration, furnished under special contracts made throughout the country, costs nearly double the estimated price.

Owing to the nature of the climate of Mexico, and the imperfect storehouses, (the articles of subsistence being perishable,) much has been lost from decay and wastage; as also from wrecks during transportation.

All these things combined will, I trust, satisfactorily show the necessity as well as the correctness of the estimated deficiency now asked for.

Most respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEO. GIBSON, C. G. S.

Hon. W. L. MARCY, Secretary of War.

No amendment being offered, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That it pass.

Ordered. That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

THE MADISON PAPERS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN rose for the purpose of inquiring whether the bill for the purchasing of the papers of President Madison was not the order of the day for this day. It had been made the special order for Monday last, and he supposed therefore it was now the first business in order. He inquired if it would not come up for consideration at this time as a matter of course?

The PRESIDING OFFICER replied that it would require a motion to take it up.

Mr. CRITTENDEN then moved to proceed to the consideration of that bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was taken up for consideration as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read a third time by its title.

Mr. BUTLER.—The question is now, I believe, on the passage of the bill; will it be in order to move that it be made the special order for to-morrow? I am not fully prepared to give my vote upon it, and, if I am driven to a vote at this time, I shall be compelled to vote against it. I desire an opportunity to make a few remarks upon the subject, and, perhaps I may propose to modify the bill. Will it be in order now to make a motion for its postponement until to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The Senator is at liberty to make that motion.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I will only suggest to my honorable friend, that the bill, by a vote of the Senate, has passed beyond that stage when it would be subject to amendment, and therefore, if his object be to amend the bill, it cannot well be accomplished without retracing our steps. To allow the honorable Senator an opportunity to express any reasons that he may have against the passage of the bill, is a courtesy which I would be disposed, at all times, to extend; but I hope that the Senator will not press any motion for delay. I should be very much gratified if the bill might be allowed to pass to-day; and I hope the Senator will withdraw his proposition for postponement, unless there be some particular object to be accomplished by it.

Mr. BUTLER.—I have so many difficulties on the subject, that if the vote be forced upon me now, I shall, very probably, be constrained to vote against the bill. I do not desire, however, to prevent its passage, provided it receive a slight modification. I am inclined to think that the papers of Mr. Madison, will, in time to come, be more valuable than they are now, and in regard to the legacy to the widow of that distinguished man, I would not deprive her, in the slightest degree, of the benefit to be derived from that legacy during her life-time, but there is a provision in the bill, I percieve, that gives her the power to dispose of the fund appropriated to her use, by will. Now if I could modify the bill in this way, to give $5,000 down, and $20,000 during her life-time for such papers as a committee might select, I would be entirely willing; but I would be very unwilling to give the benefit of this legacy to a stranger. I am entirely in favor of giving it to Mrs. Madison herself; but how far I would give her the power of disposing of it by will, I am not now prepared to say. I say to the Senator from Kentucky that I would be willing to give $5,000 down, and the remainder of the $20,000 in trust for her during her life-time; and if the papers are worth more than that sum, I would go so far as to select from the papers so much of them as will amount to that value, leaving the rest to rise in value, as I believe they undoubtedly will, and to be purchased hereafter in case it be deemed expedient. I firmly believe that these papers will be looked to in future times with much interest, and with great advantage, both to the politician and the scholar; and I do not wish to deprive the widow of Mr. Madison of the benefit which she may ultimately derive from their increased value; but to give her the right to dispose of the purchase money by will, perhaps to an utter stranger, is a thing to which I am not prepared to consent.

Mr. BERRIEN.—If this money is to be considered as a gratuity to Mrs. Madison, and for which no value is received, I would very readily agree with the suggestion of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, that that which is designed as a gratuity should be personal to her, enjoyed during her life and terminate at her death. But if, as I suppose to be the case, it is a purchase of papers conceded by the honorable Senator, and felt I presume by the great majority of the Senate, to be of great and increasing value as containing the opinions of one of the most enlightened statesmen of the early days of this republic—if it is to be considered as a contract between the government and Mrs. Madison as the possessor and proprietor of these papers, for which value is given, then I submit to my honorable friend that the money which is so given is no longer the money of the government, but becomes the money of the other party to the contract, and subject exclusively to her disposal. Sir, the provisions in this bill are not introduced from any idea that this is a gratuity, but considering the sum which it is proposed to appropriate to be a sum for which we receive a valuable consideration. I suggest, then, whether it would be proper that we should place any restraint upon the disposition of the money after its ownership has thus been changed, and I should hope that the honorable Senator, after witnessing the expression of the disposition on the part of a majority of the Senate, that this bill should be allowed to pass, would not persevere in opposing its passage at this time, in order that it may avoid encountering the fate which it met at the last session in consequence of unnecessary delay.

Mr. BUTLER.—I have not had time to examine the manuscript, nor am I convinced that Congress ought to purchase the whole of them at this time; and I believe also, as has been already suggested, that these manuscripts will become more valuable hereafter, and I desire that Mrs. Madison shall receive the full benefit of her illustrious husband's works. I would be perfectly perfectly willing, as I have said already, to Mrs. Madison all that she desires during her life time for such papers as may be selected by a committee. In this way everything that is necessary will be accomplished, but I must repeat that if the bill be forced upon me as it stands, I shall, very reluctantly—for it is contrary to my disposition to oppose a matter of this kind—be compelled to vote against it; for I am not now prepared to vote for it, and I am not willing to be forced into a vote before I am prepared. I only ask time to examine the matter, and it may be, when I have made that examination, that I will yield up my objections; but I cannot give them up without an opportunity of satisfying myself in regard to them; for I should distrust myself, in such a case as this, lest my feelings should get the better of my judgment.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I certainly had hoped that the Senator would be content to yield his opposition, after witnessing the manifest disposition of the Senate that the bill should pass. If the honorable Senator persists in his desire for the postponement until to-morrow, I will acquiesce.

Mr. BUTLER.—I do desire its postponement, and perhaps I may give up my objections. I have not had time, or if I had, I have not availed myself of it, to examine the subject, so as to enable me to vote intelligently.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—If the gentleman desires the postponement, I shall not resist it, for the bill will, I suppose, come up of necessity to-morrow.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I desire to make an explanation, in order to relieve myself from the imputation of inconsistency in voting as I intend, against this bill, unless it be altered, in view of the vote which I gave at the last session. The bill of last session proposed to give Mrs. Madison the same sum, twenty thousand dollars, to be invested in stocks for her use, and five thousand dollars, to be paid to her immediately. I had no objection to that bill. I regarded that payment not as a gift or a pension, but as a consideration for the papers, which were well worth the money of the American public. My objection to the present bill is, that it creates trustees to take care of the fund for Mrs. Madison, by act of Congress. There is no precedent for the creation of such officers. I doubt the power, and have no doubt of the impropriety of such legislation by Congress. Congress has a right to purchase, but no right to fetter the payment of the consideration money, with the condition that it shall be vested in trustees.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—(In his seat.) It was at the request of Mrs. Madison that such an arrangement was made.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—That does not alter the case with me.—Her consent would no doubt be given to a donation in any form, as a matter of course. I object to the establishment of such a precedent. If it were a mere gratuity, the objection would not apply; but as this is a consideration paid for papers, the objection is with me insuperable. I cannot vote for the bill in its present form, although I have no objection, constitutional or otherwise, to giving the money in consideration for the papers out-and-out to Mrs. Madison.

Mr. BADGER.—If I understood correctly the remarks which have been made by the honorable Senator from Florida, he has said that he voted for the bill of last session, but if pressed to vote on the present bill, he will vote against it for certain reasons which he has assigned. Now, if I recollect the terms of the bill which passed the Senate by a very large majority at the last session, it was liable to the objections stated by the honorable gentleman from Florida in a still higher degree than they can be possibly supposed to apply to the present bill. If I recollect aright the provisions of the bill of last session, it actually went so far as to preclude Mrs. Madison from anticipating any of the coming payments on account of interest before they should fall due. But what are the objections that it is an act of Congress creating trustees, and on which the honorable gentleman calls in question the right of Congress to pass such a bill? With very great respect to the opinion of the honorable gentleman—and certainly as a lawyer, as well as on other grounds, his opinions are entitled to the highest consideration—it does seem to me that he has presented an entirely new phase of constitutional difficulty. Congress proposes to buy from Mrs. Madison certain papers, and the bill assumes that these papers are worth twenty-five thousand dollars, which sum Congress proposes to pay to the proprietor of these papers, to be held for her interest. The proprietor of these papers is willing, and desires that payment should be made to her in the following manner: that of the twenty-five thousand dollars, five thousand should be paid to her immediately, and the remaining twenty thousand should be put in the hands of three gentlemen, to be held by them, by the last survivor, and executors, and administrators of the last survivor upon trust, who will pay to her the interest, with power to her to dispose of the principal sum by her last will and testament. Where is the constitutional objection here? The money, according to this contract, that would be coming to, and be due to Mrs. Madison after the five thousand dollars are paid, and that to be paid into the hands of certain trustees, was the money of the government, and would be the money of Mrs. Madison. Well, if the party who is to give the money, and the party who is to receive it, both agree to a certain disposition of it, how is it possible that there can be any constitutional difficulty? If Congress have the right to buy the papers, and pay away the money, certainly it has a right, with consent of the seller of the papers, to make such disposition of the money as may be agreed upon. Where, I again ask, is the difficulty? Why, Mrs. Madison may dispose of the principal fund by her will, and in consequence of this arrangement, the honorable Senator supposes that the just claims of creditors may be evaded.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—(In his seat.)—It is tying up the fund.

Mr. BADGER.—What principle of constitutional law is opposed to tying up the fund? What principle of common law is opposed to it? However, as the bill is, I believe, to stand over, and I will not detain the Senate. Indeed, I should not have made any remarks at all on the subject, had it not been for the observations of the Senator from Florida; but aware of his distinguished legal reputation, I was afraid, lest it might go out that we were doing some strange things here, and that by our legislation we were about to disregard the obligations of debtors. It seems to me, as the honorable gentleman from Florida knows very well, that where a person has a power to be exercised, according to his best will and discretion, he must exercise it, if he do so at all, for the benefit of creditors. This is, therefore, the most beneficial form in which control over this fund could be exercised. The interest is to be given to the venerable relict of a most distinguished man; and at her death she will have an opportunity of bestowing that fund which has produced the interest on the objects of her regard—on those who have lingered around her dying bed, and ministered to her in her declining years, and to whom she would be, therefore, disposed to leave a memorial of her kindness and testimony of her gratitude. For one, I was sorry that my honorable friend from South Carolina felt it to be his duty—acting, as I know he did, from the purest and most honorable motives—to make the slightest objection to the passage of this bill. A similar bill was passed at the last session by a decided vote. This is one of those cases in which it may be truly said, that in order that this act may be really kind, it ought to be done promptly—early. The subject has been fully considered—the sense of the Senate has been fully declared—and never was there a case, as it appears to me, in which we could with more propriety, as was said by my friend from Kentucky the other day, convert this into a new-year's arrangement, shedding joy and gladness over the declining days of one so much esteemed for her own sake, as well as being the relict of so eminent a citizen of this republic. But under the rule I suppose the subject lies over, and I will not trouble the Senate with any further remarks.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The honorable gentleman from North Carolina has totally misconceived me; but as it is suggested that this bill will come up again to-morrow, I shall defer any further remarks.

On motion by Mr. BUTLER, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CASS submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the justice and propriety of providing for the fulfilment of the contract, entered into by the Secretary of War, on the 12th day of March, 1839, under the authority of the Joint Resolution of Congress of the 13th of February, 1839, to contract with J. B. and P. Femmont, for the purchase of the island at the confluence of the St. Peter's and Mississippi rivers.

Mr. BREESE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the Registers and Receivers of the several land offices, for their services under the ninth section of the act of the 11th February last, the same compensation as is now allowed by law when money is paid on the entry and purchase of land.

Mr. SEVIER submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a reasonable compensation to such receivers of the public money as perform the duties of assistant Treasurers of the United States.

REPORT OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That two thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with the accompanying maps and diagrams, be printed for the use of the Senate; and that two thousand additional copies of the map of surveys in Florida, accompanying said report, be also printed for the use of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have appointed a Committee on Printing, on their part, in pursuance of the joint resolution of the two Houses, consisting of Mr. Conger, of New York, Mr. Henly, of Indiana, and Mr. John B. Thompson, of Kentucky.

I am directed to notify the Senate of the death of the Hon. EDWARD BRADLEY, late a member elect of the present Congress, from the State of Michigan, and of the proceedings of the House of Representatives thereon.

THE LATE HONORABLE EDWARD BRADLEY.

The resolutions from the House of Representatives having been read,

Mr. FELCH rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: The announcement just received from the House of Representatives, arrests the attention of the Senate in the midst of its ordinary business, with the melancholy tidings of death. Again, and again, since the commencement of the present session, similar announcements have called us to mourn, with the country, the decease of distinguished members of the present Congress, and to pay the tribute of respect to the memory of departed associates. If the melancholy expression of our feelings here cannot restore the deceased to life, nor recall to a seat in these halls the trusted agent of a confiding constituency, nor restore to the domestic circle its stay and its support, it may, at least, show that we cherish a high regard for the memory of the departed—that we appreciate his virtues and abilities, and sympathise with those who, united with the deceased by closer ties, have felt even more keenly than we, this sad dispensation of Providence.

EDWARD BRADLEY, whose death is thus announced, was born in the county of Ontario, in the State of New York, in April, 1808. At the age of twenty-six years he was appointed an Associate Judge of the Court of Common Pleas in his native county.

Previous to this appointment he had moved in the humbler walks of private life. Engaged chiefly in agricultural pursuits, with few advantages of early education, there was little in the influences by which he was surrounded to kindle his ambition or to stimulate to those unceasing mental efforts which alone can secure high attainments, and give assurance of future eminence. But his was a mind of no ordinary energies. Availing himself of every opportunity for improvement, he gathered knowledge from every source within his reach, acquiring strength in his struggles with adversity, and accumulating, in his contact with the world, the rich treasures of mental efficiency and practical information.

The appreciation of his merits by his friends, prompted him to still more ardent efforts, and a taste for forensic discussion induced him to become a devoted student of the law. In 1839 he removed to Michigan, and, having been admitted to the bar, he devoted himself to the business of the legal profession, and soon acquired the reputation of an able lawyer, and an eloquent advocate. In 1842 he was called by the suffrages of the district in which he resided, to a seat in the State Senate, and ably and faithfully performed his duties in that station during his term. In 1846 he was elected a member of the House of Representatives of the Thirtieth Congress.

This last evidence of the high esteem in which he was held among those who knew him best, was scarcely received, when disease marked him for a victim. In July he left the place of his residence, intending to seek the restoration of his health, by a protracted journey to the capitol, and a temporary sojourn on the sea coast. The end of this journey he was destined never to reach.—He arrived in the city of New York on the last day of July, and on the morning of the fifth day of August he was numbered with the dead. She who came to minister that aid and consolation which his debility required, returned with the lifeless remains of her husband to her stricken family, the widowed to the fatherless.

I am aware, Mr. President, that in alluding in this place to the virtues of the deceased, I speak to those who have had no opportunity, by personal intercourse, to enjoy his friendship, or to know his worth. He was called to the world of spirits when about to assume his position among the representatives of this people. By his death, his constituents have been deprived of the services of an able representative, and the country a faithful guardian of the public weal.

Himself the architect of his own fortunes, his sympathies were with the struggling, the poor, and the oppressed. Ardent in his feelings, and strong in his attachments, he was nevertheless tolerant to an opponent, and forgiving to an enemy. At the bar, in the legislative hall, and in the popular assembly, his good sense, and strong reasoning faculties always commanded attention and respect; and by his eloquence he carried persuasion and conviction to the hearts of his auditors.

If, in common with his fellow men, he had his faults, they were trivial and easily to be forgiven; while his virtues, prominent and numberless, will long be the theme of praise, and his early death the subject of heartfelt sorrow.

Mr. FELCH, in conclusion, submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, unanimously, That the Senate has received with deep sensibility the message from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of Hon. EDWARD BRADLEY, a Representative elect from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Whereupon,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1847.

PETITIONS.

Mr. UPHAM presented two petitions from citizens of Ohio, praying the establishment of a daily mail between Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and Mansfield, Ohio; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented the petition of John Leroy, praying a pension on account of the loss of an arm, while carrying an express for the army in Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the petition of Henry Hatch, praying indemnity for French spoliations prior to 1800; which was laid upon the table.

Also, the petition of the American Peace Society, praying that the war with Mexico may be brought to a close, without the further effusion of blood; which was laid on the table.

Mr. BREESE presented the petition of citizens of Clay county, Illinois, praying that the right of pre-emption may be granted to the Illinois Central Railroad Company to the lands along the route of their road; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DIX presented the petition of Joseph Burchard, praying that certain duty bonds paid by him as surety for John S. Roulet, may be repaid to him; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BADGER presented the petition of citizens of Johnston county, North Carolina, praying the establishment of a post office at Bagby's store, in that county; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BERRIEN presented additional documents relating to the petition of Milledge Galphin, executor of George Galphin, deceased; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. WEBSTER, it was Ordered, That the memorial of the President and Fellows of Harvard College, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was Ordered, That the petition of Maria Ostrander and the petition of Sarah Overbagh, on the files of the Senate, be severally referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That the petition of Samuel W. Bell, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion by Mr. CRITTENDEN, it was Ordered, That Sarah E. Graham have leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES.

Mr. MANGUM submitted the following motion for consideration:

Ordered, That the Vice President be authorized and requested to have two moveable desks provided for the reporter of the proceedings and debates of the Senate, and his assistants, upon the floor of the Senate chamber, to be used only during the session of the Senate, and to accommodate two persons.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. BADGER offered the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce inquire into the expediency of establishing additional floating or stationary lights, and also additional buoys, below and between the town of Wilmington, North Carolina, and the ocean.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of making appropriations for the following-named Delaware, at Port Penn, Delaware City, New Castle, and in the Christiana and Mahon's river; also for the erection of a light-house on the breakwater opposite to Fort Mifflin, and that the report hereinafore made by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the accompanying documents, on the establishment of a system of lights for the navigation of the Delaware bay, light-vessels, buoys, beacons, and range lights, be referred to the said committee.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of taking measures for the removal of the wrecks of vessels, supposed to be those of the United States, to ports where appearances indicate the navigation of said vessels.

Mr. BAGBY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to communicate to the Senate all the papers on file in his office relating to the two petitions of the mail of January and Williamson, between Montgomery and Tuscaloosa, and between Selma and Maplesville, Alabama.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That three hundred and fifty copies of the map of the coast survey of the Delaware Bay and River be printed for the use of the Senate.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. DICKINSON asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Jeanette C. Huntington, widow and sole executrix of William D. Cheever, deceased; which was read a first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CORWIN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the petition of Cadwallader Wallace, made a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. ATCHISON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which had been referred the petition of Thomas Talbot and others, made a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

THE BARQUE CANTON.

Mr. DIX, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred the petition of William Sayward and others, reported a bill to authorize the issuing of a register to the barque Canton; which was read.

On motion by Mr. DIX, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of said bill.

The bill having been read a second time, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendments being offered, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

NOTICES OF BILLS, ETC.

Mr. YULEE and Mr. BERRIEN severally gave notice that on to-morrow, or at an early day, they would ask the leave of the Senate to introduce certain bills, the titles of which they named.

Mr. DICKINSON gave notice of his intention to ask the Senate to take up the resolutions heretofore submitted by him.

REGENT OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTE.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That a member be appointed by the Vice President, to fill the vacancy in the Board of Regents, occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. LEWIS CASS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi was appointed.

COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, it was Ordered, That a committee on Public Printing on the part of the Senate, in pursuance of the joint resolution of the two Houses, be appointed by the Vice President.

Mr. BRADBURY, Mr. CAMERON, and Mr. GREENE, were appointed.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

On motion, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next.

MILITARY STATISTICS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Md., on the 23d instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War inform the Senate:

First.—What has been the whole number of volunteer troops called into the service of the United States since the 13th May, 1846?

Second.—Of the troops, so called, what has been the whole number discharged from such cause before their term of service had expired? and what the number mustered out of the service of the United States?

Third.—What has been the whole number of troops in Mexico belonging to the regular army of the United States, since the 13th May, 1846?

Fourth.—What is the number of troops now in Mexico?

Fifth.—What has been the whole number of officers and men belonging either to the regular army or the volunteers, who have been killed or died of wounds received in battle since the 7th May, 1846?

Sixth.—What has been the whole number of officers and men of the regular army or volunteers wounded in battle since the 7th May, 1846, who have not died of their wounds?

Mr. CASS remarked that a great deal of the information sought for by the resolutions of the honorable Senator from Maryland was contained in the report of the Adjutant General. That report had not yet been laid upon the desks of Senators, but he had no doubt that it would soon be placed before them; he hoped, therefore, the honorable Senator would permit his resolutions to lie over for a day or two, until that report was printed.

Mr. R. JOHNSON.—I was aware that some of the information called for might be found in the report of the Adjutant General; but my purpose was to have all the information that is called for by these several resolutions together. My object was a double one—that the information which we have, or can have, without some such inquiry as this, will not show the Senate or the country the number of men who have died of disease in Mexico. I propose, and in my opinion, it is the only way in which to get the information—to inquire as to the number mustered in the service under the act of the 13th of May, 1847; the number of these discharged before their period of service expired, and the number mustered out of service. I suppose the difference between the number mustered into service, and the number mustered out of service, not accounted for by the number discharged in the meantime, will show the number of those who have died of disease, less the number of those killed in battle. I have asked, therefore, in addition, for the number killed in battle. The other motive which I had was, (and I am sure it is one in which I shall have the concurrence of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs,) to lay before the Senate and the country information which I think will satisfy them that the regular army is better, in all respects, than any volunteer troops. The committee has reported a bill to raise ten additional regiments of regular troops, and also reported a bill to raise additional volunteers for the war in Mexico. My opinion has always been not that less efficiency is to be found in volunteer forces; that would be contrary to the history of all times; but, as the Senator will readily apprehend, it is impossible that the same degree of discipline can be exerted over the volunteers as over regular troops, and I am perfectly satisfied that a climate like that of Mexico, a climate in the highest degree insalubrious, that it is this want of discipline, to which the great mortality which has prevailed, is owing. Now we all know from information that has been laid before us, that at the commencement of the last session of Congress, there were actually buried on the banks of the Rio Grande of those who had died of disease, twenty-five hundred men. Now, without saying at present what my opinion is in relation to this war, as I may do at some subsequent period of the session, I suppose it is perfectly obvious for some time at least, the war is to be prosecuted, and it is all important I think, that we should be furnished with this information, upon which public opinion, the opinion of the Senate, and the opinion of the country can be formed, which will enable us to determine what is the best description of force to be called into service. Now I have no doubt that some of this information, in fact, a great deal of it, may be found in the report of the Adjutant General; but certainly it can do no harm to have all the information spread before us at once. I hope, therefore, that the honorable Senator will make no opposition to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CASS.—No, certainly not, sir; I have no objection to obtaining information. I merely suggested that a great deal of it would be found in the report to which I alluded.

The question being taken the resolution was adopted.

INCREASE OF THE REGULAR ARMY.

Mr. CASS.—There is a very important bill, which was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, which I am desirous should be taken up and acted upon; I mean the bill for raising ten additional regiments, and I move the postponement of the previous orders, and that the Senate preceed to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I hope the gentleman will allow that motion to remain for a few moments, until the special order from a former day has been disposed of. There is a bill now upon its passage, and which will not occupy, I believe, ten minutes, which I should be glad to have taken up if the Senator will withdraw his motion for the present; and unless he will do so, I shall feel constrained to oppose his motion, which I should not otherwise be disposed to do.

Mr. CASS.—I have no objection.

THE MADISON PAPERS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the purchase of the manuscript papers of the late James Madison, former President of the United States.

The question being upon the passage of the bill, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered, it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Bagby, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Butler, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Douglas, Foote, Greene, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Phelps, Sevier, Sturgeon, Upham, Webster, Yulee—22

NAYS—Atchison, Atherton, Breese, Calhoun, Cass, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Felch, Hale, Turney, Underwood, Westcott—13.

So it was

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act to provide for the purchase of the manuscript papers of the late James Madison, former President of the United States."

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. CASS renewed his motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I hope the honorable Senator does not intend to press the bill to a decision at this time. The Senate is extremely thin, and it is a question of so much importance, as every thing must be which is connected with the war, that I submit to the Senator, inasmuch as what supplies we shall grant must depend on what we shall determine in the next few days is to be done, that it would be proper to allow the consideration of this bill to be postponed. If the Senator is determined to press the question upon us at this early period, and before any one has had time to fix his own mind in regard to the subject, I shall be constrained to oppose the Senator's motion.

Mr. CASS.—It is not with the slightest wish to express my views that I urge this measure; but because I think the good of the country requires it. It is simply a bill for raising ten regiments, the details of which were all arranged by this body at the last session; it is, therefore, simply a question as to whether we will authorize this additional force. The bill is drafted in the same way as former bills for the same purpose; and all the Senate has to do is to say whether ten additional regiments shall be authorized to be raised. This is a matter which is intimately connected with the progress and with the termination of the war; for it is designed to lead to its termination. The bill has been already reported some eight or ten days, and I therefore hope that the honorable Senator will allow the consideration of the bill to be proceeded with now. And the honorable Senator will permit me to observe, that I do not see, in reference to his resolutions, how they are to bring the discussion of this subject before the Senate better than it may be brought by this bill. The object of the gentleman is one of three: it is either to operate upon the Senate, or upon the administration, or upon the country. It is not to operate upon the administration, because the President expressly says that it is the intention of the administration to prosecute this war with the view of extinguishing the nationality of Mexico. The ground the administration takes upon this subject is peculiarly clear; it is to make and secure an honorable peace. To attempt to prevent the American people from taking possession of Mexico, if they demand it, would be as futile in effect as to undertake to stop the rushing of the cataract of Niagara. I myself should think it a very unfortunate thing to extinguish the independence of that country and annex it to our own, but the more the war is prolonged, the longer it is suffered to go on, the greater will be the danger of such an occurrence.—What, then, is the issue? The administration say they do not intend to conquer all of Mexico. That project is disavowed and the fighting line is disavowed, and the only thing that remains is to keep possession of what we have, and extend our operations as the position of the enemy may render necessary, and as our means may enable us. Now, in my view, this bill may be taken up and disposed of without determining at all this matter. That is a subject which is not involved in the present question. Why, then, should we stop with the view of bringing the Senate to a decision upon this point, which decision, with all deference to the honorable Senator, seems to me to have no manner of connexion with the subject before us.

Mr. CALHOUN.—As the Senator has avowed his intention to proceed with this bill, and to press the question upon us now, I shall be compelled to oppose it.

Mr. CASS.—For the personal accommodation of the Senator, I will consent that the bill shall lie over until Monday. Beyond that day I cannot consent that it shall be postponed.

Mr. CALHOUN.—My ideas, sir, extend far beyond that. I am very happy to hear the Senator say that the President is entirely opposed to the conquest of Mexico and the extinguishment of her nationality; and I am very happy also, to hear that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs repeats the same thing. That being admitted as among the greatest calamities that could happen, the important question comes up—how shall we escape it? Sir, we often get into situations which we never intended to get into. We got into this war although we never intended to get into it, for I will venture to say that in this body, if the question had been propounded to them of war or no war, independent of the exigency of the occasion, there would not have been one fourth of the Senate in favor of it. Now, my object is to guard, not against consequences that are contemplated, but against consequences that may follow from the measures proposed—which consequences are not contemplated. That is the object. Now whether this additional force shall be granted, will depend on the fact, whether the mode recommended by the Executive to carry on this war will not, in its practical consequences, end in the extinction of the nationality of Mexico. Now, I submit to the Senator himself, whether there is nothing due to those who differ from him in opinion in regard to this point? He may think that the pro-low recommended by the administration will not end in the extinguishment of the nationality of Mexico, but I differ with him in that opinion, and until I am satisfied that he is correct, I am not prepared to vote in favor of the measure that is now proposed. Sir, though the honorable Senator, himself, is very properly opposed to the extinguishment of the nationality of Mexico, we know that there are many of a totally different opinion; and we know that there are many who believe that such will be the result, whether intended or not, of the measures proposed by the administration. And I am one of those who entertain this belief. Now I do think we ought to postpone action on the bill for some little time, until we shall have determined the course which it will be proper for us to pursue, and with this view of the question. I shall vote against the motion of the honorable Senator.

Mr. CASS.—Will the Senator allow me to read this short extract from the message of the President?

[illegible]

This is exactly the course of policy which the administration intend to pursue. For my own part, I do not see the practical operation of any vote on the subject in this body disconnected from some practical measure. In the discussion of this subject I am aware we must expect animadversion. We must expect the origin, progress, and results of this war to be attacked. But it seems to me, we want that this bill may come to a discussion and a decision without entering upon the general question of the origin and progress of the war. I had intended not to say a word about the administration, or the manner in which this war arose. I thought there was a common ground, where we might all unite in regard to this additional force, and I repeat, I yet hope the Senate will take up the bill and proceed to its consideration.

Mr. CALHOUN.—A word only in reply. I am aware of the views of the President in regard to the war. I have examined with great care the policy which is recommended in the message, and in my opinion, the result of that policy, if carried out, will tend to the precisely opposite course to that professed to be contemplated therein. If such should be the danger, we must guard against it in some way, but if this danger does not exist, then there will be no necessity for any steps on our part to guard against it. But with my present information, I am not prepared to give an intelligent vote upon the subject.

Mr. CLAYTON.—There is not, so far as I know, any disposition on this side of the chamber to delay voting supplies for the army; but I hope that the honorable Senator from Michigan will not press a vote upon this bill, or any measure of this description, until we have had an opportunity of reading the report of the Secretary of War, and the documents accompanying that report. Sir, has any Senator on this floor read that report and the documents? I doubt it. They have not been printed; or, if printed, certainly not yet furnished to the Senate; and it seems to me that action at this time upon a subject of this importance, without affording an opportunity for perusing those documents, would be highly improper. And it will be perceived, also, by the honorable Senator, that the seats on this side of the chamber are not filled, and I trust, therefore, that he will agree to a postponement of the measure, for the present at least, without naming a particular day for its consideration, because we cannot tell on what day the members of this body will be in attendance. Whenever they may be in attendance, and the report be furnished to us for perusal, we shall be ready to act upon the subject. I have not seen a single copy of that important document, the report of the Secretary of War, nor have I seen the documents accompanying the President's message, nor the reports of any of the secretaries.

Mr. CASS.—I am not unwilling that the Senate should have an opportunity to examine those documents, but this is too important a measure to be delayed. I will consent that it shall be delayed until Monday, however, for the accommodation of Senators; but regarding it, as I do, as a measure of great public importance, I cannot consent to its postponement beyond that day. With regard to the report of the Secretary of War, it gives you all the details necessary to form an opinion upon measures of this description. It is entirely unnecessary to refer to the report of the Quartermaster General for details, because the great facts connected with the measure now proposed are spread before you clearly and conclusively in the report from the War Department. I say again, that if the gentleman will be satisfied with a postponement until Monday, I will agree to it; but further than that I cannot go.

Mr. BERRIEN.—Beside the consideration of the thinness of the Senate, there is, in my judgment, ample reason for the postponement of the consideration of this bill, until the Senate shall have discussed the resolutions submitted by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, as well as those which have been submitted by the honorable Senator from New York. Sir, we are called upon by this bill, and others that will succeed it, to add a force of 30,000 men to the army of the United States. We have the recommendation of the President to that effect. We have his approval to one of the plans of the Secretary of War, which discusses three modes of operation in Mexico. Certainly, sir, it seems to be the obvious dictate of common sense, that before we proceed to increase the means of offensive military operations in Mexico we should determine for ourselves, not at the bidding of the President, but for ourselves, as the constitutional war-making power, what are the objects to be accomplished by these measures? There is this, sir, beyond the suggestions which are made by the honorable Senator from Michigan, as to the operation of the resolutions which have been submitted—there is this consideration, that without seeking to operate on the mind of the President, without seeking to influence the judgment of the American people, except as that judgment may be operated upon by the decision of this body, we desire to ascertain what it is that Congress, (the war-making power of this government,) proposes to accomplish by the further prosecution of the war? And that, I suppose, will be developed in the discussion of the resolutions. The Secretary of War submits to us the plans for the future conduct of the war. He passes by as unworthy of consideration the notion of the withdrawal of the troops, and the restoration of peace without further trampling on our trodden down foe. He then suggests three modes of prosecuting the war. Have the Senate considered, are they prepared to decide with the information now-before them, or will they preclude discussion upon these different modes? Will they not enter upon the discussion with a view to ascertain the objects to be accomplished by its further prosecution? and whether in the accomplishment of those objects we should in advance subject the country to this expenditure? Sir, we have, according to the report of the Secretary of War, a force of about 43,000 men in the field, a small majority of them only consisting of regulars. The argument of the honorable Senator from Michigan, is that the situation of our gallant army in Mexico renders it necessary that it should be reinforced without waiting for details of the objects for which the war has been prosecuted. Now, look at the state of facts as disclosed by the report of the Secretary of War. It is evident that the army in Mexico was perfectly safe—flushed with victory, and confident in its strength—upwards of 32,000 strong—while the army of the enemy is scattered, dispersed, and Mexico is without an efficient government, and destitute of resources, and men to resist our arms. There can be nothing, then, in the condition of the American army which should lead us to precipitate the passage of this bill, before we ascertain the objects which it is proposed to accomplish. I desire to stand entirely uncommitted upon the subject of yielding the supplies demanded by the Executive, until I have an opportunity to decide as to the propriety of granting them. But the ground on which I place my opposition to the present consideration of this bill is, that it proposes a great increase of force before we, the war making power, have decided what are the objects to be accomplished; and I see great force in the suggestions of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, which seem to have escaped the observation of the Secretary of War. The Secretary sets forth three modes for the further prosecution of the war; first, by defining a boundary, and holding Mexico to the observance of that boundary; secondly, by overrunning the whole of Mexico, and establishing permanent garrisons in the principal places; and thirdly, by holding what we already possess, and taking such other places as we may deem it prudent to occupy. He overlooks the proposition which is stated by the Senator from South Carolina, that in adopting the latter mode there is the utmost danger that it will run into the second—that it will render indispensable the subjugation of the whole of Mexico. Sir, these are grave questions, and should not be precipitately pressed upon us.

Mr. CASS.—I will merely remark that the proper measures for raising and organizing this force must necessarily, by many months, precede its arrival in Mexico. It will take a long time for the troops to be organized, and still longer to transport them to their several places of destination. It is a measure whose inception it is now necessary to commence, with a view to have the troops in Mexico in proper season; and let me observe to the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from South Carolina, that for my soul I cannot perceive the difficulty which strikes them. The Senator from South Carolina submits a propositon which can have no practical result; here, on the other hand, is a measure which is practical. It proposes to raise ten regiments. If any body deemed the war unnecessary, or believed it should not be further prosecuted, let him so declare by his vote upon the bill. The Senator cannot suppose there is some magic in his resolutions, which is to be drawn out by the discussion upon them. It seems to me that the most proper place in the world for the expression of the views of Senators, is upon the discussion of a practical measure like this. I trust, however, they will not delay the passage of the bill by any general discussion on the origin of the war, but if the Senate deem otherwise, it seems to me that a far better place for that discussion is upon this bill, than upon the abstract declaration which binds us to nothing. I say again that if Senators are content with a postponement until Monday, I will agree to it, but if not, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to this consideration now.

Mr. ALLEN.—I hope, sir, this bill will not be postponed until Monday, but on the contrary be proceeded with by the Senate immediately, and that we will adhere to this part of the public business until it be accomplished. There are two modes, sir, in which opposition to the policy of the administration is made—one is in the form of an abstract proposition, and the other is in the form of a distinct practical measure. Whether this opposition shall assume one of these shapes here or not, is a matter of choice with those who have the right to make that opposition, as far as their power to make a choice is concerned. But whether it shall be allowed to take such a shape, depends upon those against whom the opposition is made. I desire that the diversity of sentiment which exists in this Senate shall be tested in the discussion and decision of practical measures. Therefore I propose that all the sentiments entertained in this chamber, may be made known in the discussion of this bill in reference to its postponement, in preference to the discussion of abstract propositions. Sir, there is much advantage to be gained, as we all know, by the form which an adversary chooses to assume. It is one thing, sir, to denounce the policy of the government in the discussion of abstract propositions, and another to take the responsibility of opposing measures for increasing the army and sustaining this war. I, therefore, sir, as a friend to this administration, and as one determined, as far as I may be able, to stand by its policy in this particular, desire that the opposition should be made to these measures in the face of the measures themselves, and with the responsibility which that opposition will impose. Sir, we are in a state of war, and in that state we must continue until peace puts an end to it. That war has its theatre two thousand miles from this capitol, and the intercouse between the government and the army consumes some two or three months' time. Well, sir, under these circumstances, with that army cut, hacked, and bleeding in the achievement of its glorious victories, shall we leave them there to occupy a country as large as our own, surrounded by ten millions of enemies, and subjected to all the perils to which their precarious situation exposes them, without taking the precaution to sustain them by additional reinforcements? Sir, the vote of this Senate itself is a large part of the power which this government must exert in the prosecution of this war to an honorable peace. It is the moral impression produced by the knowledge in Mexico, as to what is the determination of this government, as evinced in its legislation, whether sustaining the President or not, which is to operate advantageously, or otherwise, in regard to the termination of the war. The vote of the Senate on this very question will have as much influence in bringing about peace, as the additional force which it is proposed to raise. The declaration as to whether we do or do not intend to prosecute the war till peace be the result, is of the utmost importance. If this Senate wavers—if it evinces hesitation—if, instead of increasing the force, it persists in calling upon its own government—what, I ask, will be the effect of such a course upon the mind of the Mexican people? Will it not encourage them to further resistance? It is, therefore, that I say that the vote of this body upon this bill will, in my opinion, have as much influence upon the question of peace, as the marching of the troops themselves. For this reason I think it highly important that an early manifestation by the legislative department of the government as to its intention in this particular should be made; and that it should specially decide whether it will prosecute or abandon the war. And if it is to be abandoned, sir, I say, the quicker the better; if it is to be prosecuted the more vigorously the better. Let us, then, decide the matter at once, not shielding ourselves behind abstract propositions, but as in the contemplation of a great practical issue. I want the contest made upon measures; I desire the decision of the Senate as to whether they intend to adopt the one or the other of the two systems of policy—the prosecution of the war or the abandonment of it. I reiterate, sir, there is but one question at issue, and that it has but two sides. However much the metaphysical ingenuity of some minds may seek to divide this question, there remains but the one—the simple question, either to prosecute this war until it is ended by a satisfactory peace, or to abandon the war, and to withdraw our troops to the left bank of the Rio Grande. If it be the decision of the Senate that the latter policy be carried into effect, the sooner the better. If the decision of the Senate that the former plan be adopted, it ought to be executed immediately. But hesitation, sir, wavering, uncertainty as to what will be the final action of Congress, is nothing but procrastinating a peace? I do not speak of design, because I will not impute motives to honorable Senators; but I speak of the infallible tendency of the course pursued by them. Now, the Senator from South Carolina says that he has a question to be decided first. And what is that question? Why, that although the President and the country may be unanimously of the opinion that the war may be prosecuted with a view to secure an honorable peace, without the final extinction of the nationality of Mexico, yet that the measure before us may tend to that result. Well, what difference could it make, should the Senate unanimously concur in the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina? Why, the very moment this bill is called up, the whole argument would be renewed, because, as the Senator says, this measure might lead to that extinction. Then why need we, while we have this measure before us, go into the discussion of his resolutions? Why discuss a proposition separately, when the Senator himself confesses that the discussion upon this bill will embrace it? It will be for the Senator to show how it is that, sustaining the army now in Mexico by furnishing additional troops to take the place of those gallant men who have lost their lives in battle or disease—I say it will be for him to show how it is that this additional force, which is purely designed to replenish the wasted strength of the army, is to tend to the final subjugation of Mexico and the extinction of her nationality. We want to replace the exhausted strength of the army, to enable it to hold possession of its conquests, and by that possession compel Mexico to put an end to the war. This is what we desire, and what can be more proper and reasonable? I hope, therefore, that the bill will be taken into consideration and kept before the Senate until it is completed; and that our army will not be permitted to suffer for want of this additional force. Without, sir, presuming to say what will be the final decision of this body, I cannot be mistaken in saying, that whatever that decision may be, it will exert a momentous influence for good or for evil upon the interests of our common country.

Mr. CALHOUN.—It appears now, sir, that the object in calling up this bill at present, is not to pass the bill, but to get a parliamentary advantage—to compel the Senate to discuss this bill before an opportunity is afforded for discussing the resolutions which I have offered. It is a mere parliamentary move. The Senator shakes his head. Well, sir, if we follow the advice of the Senator from Ohio, we shall consume just as much time in discussing this bill as if we were first to discuss the resolutions. The Senator from Ohio talks of the necessity of proceeding to act upon this bill now, and tells us in the next breath that we are to have the whole discussion upon the subject of the war upon this bill.

Mr. ALLEN.—The honorable Senator misrepresents what I said. What I said was, that we ought to take up this bill and go on with its consideration at once.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Exactly. We are to go on with the discussion upon this bill instantly, we are told, both by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Michigan, and not let the discussion upon the resolutions have precedence. The Senator from Ohio says that it is a parliamentary advantage to have the discussion upon this bill previous to discussing the resolutions. Well, I acknowledge that it is so. I acknowledge that we should be tied up, in a great measure, in the discussion upon the bill, and prevented from going so freely into all these questions regarding the war, as we would in discussing the resolutions. It will then be, strictly speaking, out of order. Besides this, we will not have, what is most important in the discussion of the bill, an expression of the sense of this body upon the great point as to whether Mexico is to be conquered and held as a subject province, or incorporated into the Union, or not. I know there are many, as staunch friends of the Executive as the Senator from Ohio, who believe that the policy recommended by the President, and now about to be carried out by this bill, will end in her subjugation and the extinguishment of her nationality. Now, it is due to the country that this question should be distinctly presented, that the people of the country may see what is to be the probable result of the war, and determine whether they will meet it or not; for that is to be the end of the whole of the contest, unless the most decisive measures are taken on the part of the Senate to prevent it.—Sir, I cannot be mistaken. I wish to go into the subject. I deem it to be due to my constituents, to the American people, that this, the greatest of all questions, the extinguishment of the nationality of Mexico, should be distinctly voted upon by this body. The Senator from Ohio is unwilling that I should have a vote upon this question, I presume. Sir, it is my object to have a vote upon my resolutions, and to have the response of the country upon the question embraced in them; for the debate will bring forth the response of the country. Now, according to my apprehension, there is no greater calamity that can befall this country, than the subjugation of Mexico, and the extinguishment of her nationality, and the transfer of all her territory to us. From the beginning I had great forebodings about this war, and my forebodings—among others, related to this very thing, the absorption of Mexico. And I reiterate, sir, that if it takes place, we are very near to the end of our political career. The Senator from Ohio made an announcement of dooms-day in the event of any delay in the action of the Senate upon this bill, although necessary information is to be extracted by that delay. The Senator need not suppose that discussion will be avoided by giving precedence to the consideration of this bill. He never can escape from a full and thorough investigation of the designs of the Executive in the prosecution of this war. My object is not opposition to the administration. Whenever I intend to assail the administration, I will do so directly and to their face. My object is to have the sense of the Senate and the country upon a point which I deem of the first magnitude to the safety of the country and its institutions; and I do trust, sir, that the Senate will not deprive me of the opportunity of having a clear vote upon this point, after full discussion.

Mr. HALE.—I regret the necessity of saying a word in relation to this matter at this time: it has been my misfortune not to have read the message of the President as have those Senators who have already addressed you. I suppose, sir, that this message has been drafted with some care, and with some reference to the rules of grammatical construction. If I remember aright, a rule is laid down by Lindley Murray; it is, that the perfect tense not only represents an action as passed and finished, but contains a direct allusion to the present time. What is the language of the President? "It has never been contemplated by me, as an object of the war, to make a permanent conquest of the Republic of Mexico, or to annihilate her separate existence as an independent nation." It seems to me that there is here a most pregnant allusion to the present time. It appears that the administration has begun to entertain a different notion, and I am confirmed in this belief by looking at another passage in the message, where the President says:

"If, after adopting this encouragement and protection, and after all the persevering and vigorous efforts we have made, from the time of Mexico's refusal to make peace to the present time, to adopt our ultimatum, she does not, we shall ultimately find, then we shall have a right to hold ourselves in possession of as much of the country as may be necessary to obtain adequate indemnity, taking the full measure of our just demands into our hands, and must enforce the terms which we have found it necessary to dictate."

He does not tell us how much it will take to fill his hands, or satisfy his honor, but he tells us that we have possession of New Mexico and Calaberna now, but in case to inform ... more territory will be substituted, the ... were ... erous prosecution of the war which he recommends. ... I am the most desirous of saying a word ... of the intimation which has been thrown out that there are some who are opposed to the war, and prefer manifesting that opposition on an abstract resolution, and who yet will not take the responsibility of opposing the measures which the President recommends. Sir, I do not know but that my ... may be peculiar upon this subject, but I believe that the war was commenced in falsehood, and prosecuted in injustice, and that the institutions of the United States are in more danger at this moment, of annihilation, than those of Mexico, and I have no sympathy with those gentlemen who tell us that this invasion has no connexion with the origin of the war: I think it has everything to do with it, and I would like to see gentlemen ... such chimerical ... solve this problem, and inform us how long it will take, in the manner we are going on, to arrive at the end of the war. I would that they would tell us how long must we persevere in a wrong cause before we shall come out right. I would be glad if the world could tell us another thing. I would like to know them demonstrably ... as how much better it is to conquer a peace than to keep a peace. Conquer a peace! that is a ... I suppose phrase, and the ... recommended ... to effect it reminds me of the manner of treating a patient pursued by an old Spanish physician, who fancied that by letting blood and administering warm water he could cure all diseases. In proceeding with this practice it was found that his patients all died; the doctor said that the reason was because he did not take enough blood from them. He took more from his next patients and they continued to die, and upon a consultation as to whether some other mode of treatment might not be attended with better results, he said he would listen to the ... consideration for a change of treatment if he had not written a book upon the subject. Well, sir, the President has written a book, and requires of us that we should follow it. Now, recognizing no such obligation as that, I desire that this measure may be discussed; I desire that this subject should be discussed fully, freely, and fairly, ... in the resolutions proposed by the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from New York, and that those of the Senator from South Carolina should take precedence of those offered by the Senator from New York, for the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina relate to the question how much territory we shall rob Mexico of, and the Senator from New York tells us how to take care of the spoils after we have got them. I therefore think that the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina should take precedence of those of the Senator from New York, and that they should be presented in such a manner that the whole country may understand it; and, sir, it is all involved in this ten regiment bill. It seems to me the question presented by this bill will determine the whole matter, and if we are to go on and follow the course pointed out by the President, and give him ten regiments of regulars and volunteers in addition, then, of course, this bill is to be passed. But if, as I believe, the war was commenced in error, here is the place to stop; and with my consent the first dollar shall not go from the national treasury until the President informs us how much he supposes will be required to bring the army home by the shortest and cheapest route. For this purpose he shall have money; but not with my vote for continuing the war with an indefinite purpose. I think it is time that the country should understand what we are aiming at; and I think that the belief of a great majority of the people already is, that the war was not only a error, but a blunder; and it is this which calls attention to it more forcibly than if it had remained simply a crime, an unfortunate one certainly, when viewed in the best light. And I am willing that if the expression of this view should bring ever so much opprobrium, that it should come now. It seems to me that those who view the policy of the administration as a miserable one should boldly and distinctly say so and vote accordingly. Let us not be guilty of the miserable inconsistency of saying that this war is an error, and of still voting supplies to enable the President to carry it on. Let Congress, on whom the responsibility rests, and to whom the country will look in this matter, take the war into their own hands, and declare distinctly and unequivocally to the country what they intend, and what they desire. I do not know that there is a single member on this floor who sympathizes with me in the view which I take, but I believe that this war marks the age as barbarous, and that we are vastly more in danger of bringing ruin and destruction upon our own institutions, than those of the country with which we are at war. I want the question presented boldly—not by way of problem or mere abstraction. For one, my mind is made up. Not the first dollar shall the President take, by my vote, for either regular or volunteer force, until he comes forward and informs the country ... much he does suppose it will require to secure an honorable peace, and the mode in which he proposes to effect so desirable a result. The other day, the honorable Senator from Michigan told us that every man, woman and child in the country knew what we wanted. I confess I heard this assertion with some astonishment; for if it be true, I could not class myself with either man, woman or child—for I confess I did not know. Nor was I in the least enlightened when the honorable Senator added that it was indemnity and satisfaction.

Mr. CASS.—I beg the honorable Senator's pardon; that was not my expression; indemnity and security were the words I used.

Mr. HALE.—Well, I have not got any light yet.

Mr. CASS.—That is not my fault.

Mr. HALE.—No, sir, it is owing to my opacity probably, but waiving for the present the discussion, whether it is owing to the inability of the honorable Senator to impart, or of myself to receive light, I will proceed. "Indemnity and security." Indemnity for what? Security for what? Here endeth the first lesson. We are as much in the dark as ever. I do not intend at this time, to do more than to make these general remarks. On some future occasion I propose, not with the hope of influencing the action of the Senate, but to place myself aright before those who have sent me here, to express my views more fully in regard to the war. And permit me to say here, that I think the origin of the war lies a little deeper than any of the causes which have been assigned by those who have spoken upon the subject. I believe the origin of the war lies in the avowed object of the American government to perpetuate the institution of American slavery. That I believe to be the true design and purpose of this war; and if it had not been for that cause we never should have had it. Believing this to be the fact, and that any exposition of the origin and cause of this war, which stops short of that, stops short of the truth, I shall endeavor on some subsequent occasion, with the indulgence of the Senate, to satisfy the country by reference to the official documents, that such is the origin and purpose of the war, and to indicate my own views of the true policy to be pursued in reference thereto.

Mr. SEVIER.—What is the motion now pending? I understand it is a motion to take up the bill for the purpose of making it the order of the day for Monday next. I ask the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I understand that the honorable Senator from Michigan has no objection that the consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday.

Mr. CASS.—None at all; but if there is not to be an understanding that it shall be the order of the day for Monday, we may as well proceed to vote upon it now.

Mr. SEVIER suggested, that if the bill were taken up now, it might remain as unfinished business, and would come up on Monday as a matter of course.

The question was then put upon the motion of Mr. CASS to proceed to the consideration of the bill; and, the yeas and nays having been ordered, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Bradbury, Breese, Cass, Davis, of Miss., Dickinson, Dix, Douglass, Fitch, Foote, Rusk, Sevier, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Greene, Hale, Johnson, of Md., Johnson, of La., Mangum, Phelps, Underwood, Upham, Yulee—20.

The Senate being equally divided, the VICE PRESIDENT gave the casting vote in the affirmative.

The bill having been read a second time,

Mr. MANGUM said:—I hope that this bill will be allowed to be passed over for the present. I very much desire that it should not now be taken up, and above all, that the final action upon it should not be had until all the great questions touching the policy of the government in regard to the Mexican war have been discussed, and the sense of this body in relation to them clearly ascertained. For if we are called upon to act now, we must act affirmatively, for I suppose there is no one who will not be disposed to grant what may be deemed necessary. It will then amount to an affirmative of the necessity for still further prosecuting this war, the end of which no man can foresee. For myself, sir, in case I am driven to a vote upon a measure of this kind, before I have an opportunity of examining into these subjects, I shall endeavor so to vote, as to throw the responsibility upon the Executive, and to assume only that degree of responsibility which will attach to a vote under such circumstances.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were opened, and

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 3, 1848.

REPORTS FROM DEPARTMENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, exhibiting the applications for pensions which have been rejected during the year 1847, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the further use and occupation of Fort Armstrong, on Rock Island, as a military site; which was ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. ASHLEY presented a memorial adopted at a convention held at Washington, in the State of Arkansas, composed of delegates from the several counties bordering on the Red River, praying an appropriation for removing the raft in that river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BREESE presented the petition of citizens of Montgomery county, Illinois, praying the establishment of a mail route from Shelbyvillee to Alton, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, it was Ordered, That the petition of Sour John, a Cherokee Indian, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution for consideration, which was ordered to be printed.

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate ——— copies of the letter or memoir of Dr Wislizenus, through the northern parts of Mexico, as physician to Col. Doniphan's column, being a history of the expedition of Col. Doniphan, with scientific observations upon the face of the country. Also, that there be engraved or bitho'd a chart for the use of the Senate, ——— copies of the sketch or map which accompanies the same. Also, the same number of the barometrical map of the profile of elevations above the level of the sea from St. Louis, in Missouri, on the line of march of said expedition to Santa Fe, in New Mexico, and thence by Chihuahua, the Bolson de Mapmi, Parras, Saltillo, and Monterey to Reynosa, on the Rio Grande. Also, the same number of the geological plate and the same number of the table of meteorological observations, which accompany the same.

Also, Be it resolved, That ——— copies of the said memoir, with the accompanying maps, be printed for the use of Dr. Wislizenus.

Mr. JOHNSON, of La., submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing an act granting a portion of the public lands in the State of Louisiana, to every citizen soldier, or widows or orphan of every citizen soldier, who bore arms in defence of Louisiana in the year 1814 and 1815.

Mr. HUNTER submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate the correspondence of Mr. Wise, late minister of the United States at the court of Brazil, embracing a letter of Mr. Hamilton Hamilton, Her Britannic Majesty's minister at the same court, to Mr. Wise, dated the 24th of March, 1846, with a note from the Earl of Aberdeen, of the 10th December, 1845, which was sent by Mr. Wise to Mr. Hamilton, dated the 27th March, 1846; a letter from Mr. Wise to Mr. Hamilton, dated 31st July, 1846, and the papers accompanying the same, all relating to the subject of the slave trade; provided that the same may be done, in his opinion, without detriment to the public service.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was Ordered, That the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, on the files of the Senate, relating to the subject, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Joseph Bouchaud, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of J. Kearsley, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed an enrolled bill, I am directed to bring it to the Senate for the signature of their President.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the enrolled bill entitled "An act making an appropriation to supply in part a deficiency in the appropriations for subsistence in kind of the army and volunteers during the year ending the 30th of June, 1848; and it was delivered to the committee, to be presented to the President of the United States.

NOTICES OF BILLS, ETC.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BERRIEN asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill making an appropriation for removing obstructions in the Savannah river; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a joint resolution to create a board to ascertain and determine the amount of each of the claims of the citizens of the United States against Mexico; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Peter Capella, administrator of Andrew Capella, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for the relief of Peter Capella, administrator of Andrew Capella, deceased, and for the relief of John Capoy, and for the relief of Elijah Petty and Hannah Petty, his wife, heirs of John Beardon, deceased.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Territories, reported a bill for the relief of W. B. Slaughter, late Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin.

The bill having been read a first time—

Mr. DOUGLAS remarked, that as this bill was asked for by the officers of the treasury, and was simply a bill to authorize them to settle certain accounts, he wished the bill would now be allowed to have its second reading.

The bill having been read a second time.

Mr. CLAYTON said he apprehended that no possible objection could exist to the immediate passage of this bill, and he trusted it would now be disposed of.

Mr. WESTCOTT said he could not distinctly gather the purport of the bill from hearing it read, and it had not been printed. He recollected the case well. It was before the Territorial Committee at the last session—he believed the session before, also—while he was on that committee, and he was then opposed to the allowance of the claim. It was for two items. One for compensation to claimant for expenses of visiting Washington to settle his accounts as a public officer, Secretary of Wisconsin Territory. The other item was for some two or three thousand dollars of public money, lost by his placing it on deposite in a territorial bank which broke. His excuse was, that the territorial legislature by resolution, instructed him to make this deposite in that bank. This was no excuse whatever. The territorial legislature had no business with this money—no right to direct it to be so deposited—no power to control the claimant with respect to it. Mr. Slaughter was Secretary of the Territory—a federal officer and agent, independent of the Legislature of the Territory. He was subject only to the laws of Congress and the instructions of the Treasury Department, and these did not allow the deposite at the case of the United States. It was his own fault, or misfortune if he lost this money by placing it in a rotten bank. His complying with the resolution of the Legislature was an act done on his own personal responsibility. It would be opening the door to the allowance of hundreds of thousands of dollars of similar claims, to allow this. Besides, it is not shown that this bank or its stockholders have been sued, or any means used to recover the money from those who have got it. The claim against the bank and its stockholders was not transferred to the United States, or the treasury officers given any authority to collect or secure it. He should vote against the allowance of the claim. But if he understood the honorable Senator from Illinois, (Mr. DOUGLAS,) this bill did not impliedly sanction the claim in any degree, but only directed the Treasury to examine and settle the accounts on principles of equity and justice. He desired to know of the committee distinctly, whether his understanding was correct? If so the bill sanctioned expressly or impliedly the items he had referred to, he should vote against it—if not, he should make no opposition.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—The bill does not sanction the claim; it merely refers the settlement of the claim to the accounting officers of the Treasury. The claim arises in this way: William B. Slaughter, Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin, received a draft for government funds to the amount of $10,000. The Legislature of the Territory appointed the Cashier of the Mineral Point Bank temporarily its fixed agent. This draft was deposited in the custody of that fiscal agent, and the money checked out according as it was required. That bank failed, and there was a loss of something like $3,000, speaking in round numbers.

The legislative assembly of the territory has unanimously passed a resolution expressing their opinion that the money was deposited properly, in good faith, and for the best interests of the Territory; and that he ought to have a credit at the Treasury for that amount of money. That is the principal item in the bill. All that the bill proposes, is to refer the matter to the officers of the Treasury, with authority and instructions to settle the account according to the principles of equity and justice; they having more ample opportunities for collecting information upon all points relating to the matter, than this body can possibly have.

Mr. WESTCOTT said he conceived there was one matter as to which he did not coincide with his friend the honorable Senator from Illinois, (Mr. DOUGLAS.) It was the chief question in this case. It was as to the resolution of the Territorial Legislature being any justification or even excuse for the Secretary of the territory putting this money in that bank. He conceived he was bound to disregard the resolutions as the Territorial Legislature had no right to direct him.

Mr. DAYTON.—Do I understand that the bill is now upon its third reading? It must, I apprehend, require the general consent of the Senate in order to have its third reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER replied, that the proposition had been made that the bill be read a third time.

Mr. DAYTON.—Had I understood that to be the case, I should have objected, not because I have any specific objection to this bill beyond the objection which applies to a large class of cases standing upon our calendar. I have observed, for the last three or four years in this body, that wherever a claim is a little distrusted in committee, or in reference to which the committee have doubts themselves, and cannot act upon it in a manner satisfactory to themselves, they report a resolution in this general phraseology—resolved that the claim be settled by the proper officers of the department, according to the principles of equity and justice. Thus they have generally recognized the existence of a class of cases of this description, and applied to them a different rule from that which is applied in other cases. Now, if this bill is to be put on its final passage, I think I shall be constrained to vote against it. I think at least it ought to be allowed to lie over, and take its proper place upon the calender. This case is similiar to a large number of cases which have been reported on, and if the Senate pass it and refer the matter to the department for adjustment, we shall have the same arguments addressed to us every day. I, for one, prefer that this case should stand with all other cases of the kind. I am not aware of any thing in it that entitles it to special precedence.

Mr. CLAYTON.—The gentleman is mistaken in supposing that the committee had any doubt in regard to the propriety of allowing the claim. There was no difference of opinion whatever. It was understood that this individual was entitled to the amount, and the proper accounting officer was desirous of giving him the credit. He had no doubt of the propriety of it, but he thought that Congress ought to give him the authority to do what was sought to be done in the premises. There was not a shadow of doubt as to the propriety, but the commissioner of the Treasury had not reported that he should be allowed the amount. They had merely authorized the officer of the department to give it him, if he be found to be entitled to it. This is one of those cases which the honorable Senator from New Jersey has referred to. There was no doubt in the mind of the committee, and no doubt in the mind of the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, as to the propriety or justice of allowing the amount. The only doubt was, whether that officer had authority to do justice in the case without the sanction of Congress. Now, if, under these circumstances, it be thought necessary to delay a bill of this kind, I will offer no objection; but I certainly suppose the bill might pass the Senate without going through the ordinary form of being read on different days.

Mr. DOUGLAS here read a paragraph from the letter of the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. BADGER.—If I understand correctly the points of the case, as given by the Senator from Florida, it seems to me that without some further statement or explanation, there is very serious objections to the passage of this bill. I understand it to be an application on the part of a disbursing officer of the United States, to be allowed a credit in his account with the Treasury, for a sum of money which has been lost in consequence of being deposited by him, without authority of law, in a banking institution.

Mr. CLAYTON.—He had the authority of the Territorial Legislature.

Mr. BADGER.—Very well; he was a disbursing officer of the United States, subject to the laws of Congress, and prohibited by a law of Congress from depositing the funds of the United States in a banking institution. He was himself bound to keep them, and without sanction or authority from his superiors in office, without a dispensation given to him by those to whom he was responsible, and who, on higher ground, represented the interests of the United States, but by authority of a State Legislature, he unlawfully takes these funds, deposited them in a banking institution, and they are lost. Now, what does this bill propose to do? As I understand it, it proposes to legalize this transaction. If he was authorized by law to make the deposite, he would undoubtedly be irresponsible; if in making it he followed the line of his duty, he would have a right to demand, as a matter of justice and of law, that credit should be allowed to him. This bill directs the officer of the Treasury to settle his account, not on principles of law—for it will be in express contravention of law—not to give him credit for losses he has innocently sustained in the discharge of his duty—for that he has a right to demand without the interposition of Congress—but they are to settle his account according to the principles of equity and good conscience; in other words, it is a direction on the part of Congress to the accounting officer of the Treasury, to disregard in this case the obligations of law, and apply one rule in the settlement of the accounts in this case, while the general law requires another rule to be applied in all circumstances. I must confess, sir, that with every disposition in the world to relieve a man who has suffered in the discharge of his duty, if any thing could be shown by which it would appear that he was under a reasonable apprehension that he was doing his duty as if he had been directed by his superior officers, I should be anxious to interpose and relieve him. But it seems to me it would be a dangerous precedent for Congress to declare that when an officer of the government having charge of the funds of the government, shall think proper to make a deposit contrary to law, they will relieve him from the consequences of losses thus sustained. It would be a direct and open invitation, by the policy adopted here, to all officers similarly situated, to act in defiance of authority and in defiance of law, trusting to a relaxation of its provisions in their behalf. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the honorable Senator from New Jersey is correct in saying that this bill ought to have a little more examination, and I move, therefore, that its further consideration be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom had been referred the bill to divide the District of Arkansas into two Judicial Districts, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report upon the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following motion, submitted by Mr. MANGUM, on the 30th December:

Ordered, That the Vice President be authorized and requested to have two moveable desks provided for the reporter of the proceedings and debates of the Senate, and his assistants, upon the floor of the Senate chamber, to be used only during the session of the Senate, and to accommodate two persons.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, it was Ordered, That the motion be referred to a select committee, consisting of three members, to be appointed by the Vice President; and

Mr. MANGUM, Mr. SEVIER, and Mr. BREESE, were appointed the committee.

ELISHA L. KEEN, DECEASED.

The bill for the relief of the administratrix of Elisha L. Keen, deceased, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

JOSEPH WILSON.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Joseph Wilson, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. BADGER called for the reading of the report accompanying the bill, and it was read by the Secretary.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third.

CLOTHING FOR VOLUNTEERS.

The bill to provide clothing for volunteers in the service of the United States, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An Act to provide clothing for volunteers in the service of the United States."

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. CASS rose and said: This is the first of a series of bills which the Military Committee is about to present to the Senate. They have commenced with the most important, and will ask the consideration of the others, in succession, till they have discharged the duty entrusted to them.

In presenting this bill I do not propose to touch any of the disputed topics, which divide the two great parties, under the banner of one or the other of which, every citizen of our country is arrayed. I shall leave these if introduced at all, to be introduced by others. I had hoped, till I heard the incidental discussion which arose a day or two since on the question of taking up this bill, that these exciting subjects would be postponed for some future opportunity, and that the propositions now submitted would be considered upon their military merits, taking it for granted that the propriety of voting the additional force required would not be controverted. I was well aware that we could not escape a full discussion of the origin of the war, its progress, its objects, and the whole course of the administration connected with it. Nor indeed did I wish to avoid it. However severe may be the attack, I trust it will be as earnestly met, and easily repelled, for I consider the ground which the administration occupies as perfectly impregnable. I am apprehensive, however, from the remarks which fell from some of the honorable Senators the other day, that the whole field of controversy is to be gone over, and that we are to fight this bill, necessary, as I deem its immediate passage to the public interest, inch by inch, till all the great party questions of the day are debated and exhausted. If it is to be so, I must of course submit, but the fault shall not be mine, nor will I provoke the contest by introducing any topics which may properly lead to it.

There is one point, sir, where we all can meet, and that is the gallantry and good conduct of our army. This is one of the high places to which we can come up together, and laying aside our party dissensions mingle our congratulations that our country has had such sons to go forth to battle, and that they have gathered such a harvest of renown in distant fields. The time has been, and there are those upon this floor who remember it well, when our national flag was said to be but striped bunting, and our armed vessels but fur built frigates. The feats of our army and navy during our last war with England redeemed us from this reproach. The offspring of foreign jealousy; and had they not, the events of the present war would have changed these epithets into terms of honor; for our flag has become a victorious standard, borne by marching columns, over the hills and valleys, and through the cities, and towns, and fields of a powerful nation, in a career of success, of which few examples can be found in ancient or in modern warfare.

The movement of our army from Puebla was one of the most romantic and remarkable events which ever occurred in the military annals of our country. Our troops did not indeed burn their fleet, like the first conquerors of Mexico, for they needed not to gather courage from despair, nor to stimulate their resolution by destroying all hopes of escape. But they voluntarily cut off all means of communication with their own country, by throwing themselves among the armed thousands of another, and advancing with stout hearts, but feeble numbers into the midst of a hostile country. The uncertainty which hung over the public mind, and the anxiety everywhere felt, when our gallant little army disappeared from our view, will not be forgotten during the present generation. There was universal pause of expectation—stopping, but still fearing; and the eyes of twenty millions of people were anxiously fixed upon another country which a little band of its armed citizens had invaded. A veil concealed them from our view. They were lost to us for fifty days; for that period elapsed, from the time when we heard of their departure from Puebla till accounts reached us of the issue of the movement. The shroud which enveloped them then gave way, and we discovered our glorious flag waving in the breezes of the capital, and the city itself invested by our army.

And similar circumstances marked the very commencement of the war, when the Mexicans first surrounded our troops, and shut them out from all communications with their country. This unexpected attack struck us all with astonishment, and we feared, as well we might, that numbers would overcome discipline and valor, which, however they might prolong, could not be expected to succeed in the contest. And hopeless indeed might have been the result, had not the honored soldier, who commanded our troops, had confidence in them, and they in him. Had he not known how to lead and they to follow. And well and bravely did they all bear themselves in the critical circumstances which surrounded them; and our doubts soon gave way to certainty, and gloomy forebodings to glorious convictions. And the campaign thus commenced was vigorously followed up on the Rio Grande, and victory after victory, till the crowning triumph at Beuna Vista was heralded by every breeze and became familiar to our ears as household words.

During the whole of this war there has been a series of successes, which has been uninterrupted by a single serious disaster. I hold in my hand a table, prepared at the Adjutant General's office, from the best materials which can be found there, exhibiting the actions fought with the enemy, and the forces engaged, and the losses sustained by each party. As we have official data, the true losses on our side are stated. But those on the side of the Mexicans, are in some instances entirely omitted, and in others, conjecturally estimated. This table shows the whole truth so far as we are concerned, and but a part of the truth so far as the enemy is concerned. Still, even under these circumstances, it is one of the proudest trophies with which any army ever enriched its country.

The Adjutant General remarks, that he cannot vouch for the perfect accuracy of the above statements, as from their nature they must often be estimated. He adds that the above table, although essentially correct, is not entirely complete, for he thinks there are yet wanting some reports, &c., of affairs, which have been lost or intercepted, and it may be, that the above statement may hereafter need amendment or correction.

If we recorded our history upon stone, as was done in the primitive ages of the world, we should engrave this series of glorious deeds upon tables of marble. But we shall do better; we shall engrave it upon our hearts, and we shall commit it to the custody of the press, whose monuments, frail and feeble as they appear, yet from their wonderful power of multiplication, are more enduring than brass or marble, than statutes or pyramids, or the proudest monuments erected by human hands. Let it be remembered, sir, that these battles were fought in a great measure by new and undisciplined troops, hastily collected at home, and rapidly marched to the seat of warfare. By men who had abandoned the duties and comforts of domestic life, and who made war, not a trade as in Europe; but a temporary employment in order to defend the interest and honor of their country. And even the small regular army, which existed at the commencement of the war, had seen little actual service in the field, and that not with a civilized foe, but in murderous conflicts with Indian tribes, where there was much exposure to meet and little glory to gain. Many of the officers and soldiers, and indeed a great majority of them, and some of the commanders, too, saw the first gun fired in the very field which they illustrated by their deeds, and moistened with their blood. Honor, then, to the highest and to the lowest, to the greatest and the least. Honor to the living and the dead—those who survive to enjoy it, and to the memory of those who sleep in a soldier's grave, far from the land they loved so well. And happy am I to see upon this floor, at this moment, particularly, one of the gallant officers who have inscribed their names high upon the military roll of their country, and there are others like him, in this city, who have returned from the campaign in which they distinguished themselves, bearing upon their persons ineffaceable marks of courage and patriotism. A kind Providence has permitted them to come back, and the plaudit of grateful millions, "well done good and faithful servants," is the proud welcome which greets them. Let modern philanthropists talk as they please, the instincts of nature are truer than the doctrines they preach. Military renown is one of the great elements of national strength, as it is one of the proudest sources of gratification to every man who loves his country, and desires to see her occupy a distinguished position among the nations of the earth. I should have been proud to have been in Europe during our military operations in Mexico—proud to witness the effect of the skill and prowess of our army upon the statesmen, and politicians, and communities of the old world. During the course of these events there was no war there to attract the general attention, and to excite by its uncertainties and vicissitudes, the solicitude of the government. Our war was the event of the day, and many a steadfast gaze was cast across the Atlantic to watch the prospects and progress of the pattern republic, as we are invidiously termed, in the new career into which we had entered. As we all know, our institutions have friends and foes in the other hemisphere. To both they are a light, shining across the ocean, but inviting some and warning others, as the impressions our experiment has produced have been favorable or unfavorable. The anti-republican croakers of the old world, at the commencement of our government, predicted that it could not long resist the shocks of peace or war. When they found it could do both, and do it successfully, they then denied our power to carry on a war without our own boundaries, should circumstances require such an exertion of national strength. This was our first great trial; for in the invasion of Canada, during the last war, the operations were so near, that they did not test our strength for distant warfare. The trial has been made, and has succeeded. No one will hereafter call in question our capacity to assert our rights, wherever those may require our interference. If the great experiment had failed, it would have taken ages to recover from the misfortune. But now, wherever the American flag is borne, or the name of American known, and that wherever is everywhere, the glorious feats of this war have proclaimed our power, and have announced that we have taken our position side by side with the mightiest nations of the world. Hereafter, in the wildest dreams of ambition there will be no dream of conquering us, nor will any hostile foot pollute our shore but to escape from it, if it can, as best it may.

The present bill provides for raising ten additional regiments of infantry to serve during the war. The average number of each regiment in the field is rather less than three-fourths of the legal establishment; so that this measure, if adopted, will add about 7,500 men to the army. The organization is precisely that provided in the act which passed at the last session of Congress for raising an additional force, and as the details were then fully considered, and are well known to the Senate, I need not recapitulate them here.

The reasons which render this increase of force necessary, are so clearly and forcibly stated in the report of the Secretary of War, that I need do little more than request that that portion of the document may be read.

The following extract from the report of the Secretary of War was then read by the Secretary :

"The control of our relations to Mexico, and conquest of a state of the United States in compliance with the obligation and recognition of her capital, the dedication and dispersion of her armies, the capture of most of her sea-board of war, and the annihilation of her hopes of recovering, have not yet brought peace, or the advent of such terms as could be accepted as just, honorable, without national degradation. The war will continue, and it appears to present new aspects in regard to its further prosecution. In general terms we repeat without remark the suggestion that successful occupation of more points, and within more limits, than heretofore, may be required to enable us to approach contentment. It may be necessary to extend our military operations, and to increase the number of the troops employed, in order to bring the contest with the enemy to a close.

"Our further operations must, in my opinion, be conducted in one of the three following modes: each to have and hold an efficient line, towards which all places and parts of the country in the rear, and extending to a further distance, are to be occupied, by advancing the pickets of a line of posts and subsisting the troops at the most convenient points; which, as they shall from time to time be established, will require additional forces, and will thereby enlarge the circle of operations; or by advancing the whole force in a compact body, and occupying the country in the rear of the line of march, as far as may be necessary to keep open the communications with the base of operations; or by advancing with a part of the force, and occupying the country in the rear of the line of march, as far as may be necessary to keep open the communications with the base of operations, and with the remainder of the force, after the establishment of a new base, to advance still further into the country, occupying it in the rear of the line of march, as far as may be necessary to keep open the communications with the new base of operations. The first mode would require a force of about 20,000 men; the second, a force of about 25,000 men; and the third, a force of about 30,000 men.

"The first mode would be the most economical in men, money, and time, and would be the most certain to bring the war to a speedy termination, if the enemy should not be disposed to prolong it by desultory warfare. The second mode would be more expensive in men, money, and time, and would be more certain to bring the war to a speedy termination, if the enemy should not be disposed to prolong it by desultory warfare. The third mode would be the most expensive in men, money, and time, and would be the most certain to bring the war to a speedy termination, if the enemy should not be disposed to prolong it by desultory warfare our positions, as well from the sea-coast to the capital, as in other portions of the country which may be brought into subjection to us.

4. A strong force, independent of what is necessary for these purposes, which shall always be kept upon the alert and ready to move whenever there may be any appearance of an outbreak on the part of the Mexican people.

The organization and maintenance of a large force may be the means of rendering its employment unnecessary. It is much better to render opposition hopeless, by the display of strength, than to excite it into action by the exhibition of weakness, and then to be compelled to resort to desperate struggles, to remedy evils which ordinary prudence would have prevented. It is true, humanity also, and we owe it to ourselves, to our army, who have done and suffered so much, to the enemy, and to the world. Remember, sir, that our troops are 3,000 miles from home, in the midst of a hostile population of some eight or ten millions, and that by great exertions and unparalleled bravery they have succeeded in a partial subjugation of the country. But we have no right again to expose them to such perils. There is a vast superiority of physical force opposed to them. All experience shows, that in this condition an invaded people will suddenly break out into insurrections, and sometimes display an energy and courage which they failed to exhibit upon the battle field. Who would weigh with a critical balance the amount of opposition we have to apprehend, and the strength necessary to overcome it, and then coolly provide this calculated force, and leave events to take care of themselves? What kind of political arithmetic would that be, which would say, if so many troops have done so much, how many will it require to do so much more? I trust that the supplies we may vote will be given upon a far better principle. Upon a principle which shall look indeed to results, but which shall make the most liberal arrangements for attaining them.

The proceedings of this government are as well known in Mexico as here. They do not indeed travel upon the wings of the wind, but they travel with the power of the press, and are spread through the civilized world. Vigorous and prompt action will produce the happiest effect upon the state of things in Mexico. Nothing would conduce more to impress upon the people of that country the necessity of a peace, than a unanimous determination in Congress to put forth all the strength of the nation till it is obtained.

I have caused the following abstract to be prepared from the report of the Adjutant General, exhibiting the entire strength of our present army, including regulars and volunteers:

VOLUNTEERS.	Actual force absent

It will be seen that we have in Mexico under General Scott, besides the garrisons of Tampico and Vera Cruz, about 29,000 men, rank and file, excluding officers, and in the command of General Taylor, an aggregate of 6,726 men, officers included.

From the statements of the Adjutant General, it appears that the actual force kept up is less, by one-fourth, than the legal force authorized by law. The continually renewing casualties of war, and other circumstances, occasion this difference. And it is not probable that the existing legal establishment could, by any effort, be made to keep in the field a greater numerical strength than is now there. So that if the force of the army is to be materially augmented, this must be done by the creation of new corps, and by multiplying the arrangements for procuring recruits and volunteers. I have omitted in this enumeration, some bodies of volunteers which have been called out, but have not yet joined the army. They cannot, if full, which it is not probable they will be, exceed 2,200 men, and do not change the question before us, if indeed they do more than keep up for a time the present number of volunteers in the field.

I know nothing more of the proposed plan of the campaign than is disclosed in that part of the report of the Secretary of War which has just been read to the Senate. I do not, therefore, presume to speak authoritively upon the subject, and indeed it may well be that no fixed system of operations has been or will be prescribed by the Executive; but that, after expressing its general views, the conduct of the war will be left to the discretion of the commander. But it is easy to see that if the obstinate injustice of the Mexicans drives us to greater exertions, and to a more enlarged sphere of operations, there are a number of positions which, from their importance, military or political, we must seize and hold.—These can only be indicated by an exact knowledge of the country, and particularly of its great lines of communication, which must be commanded and guarded.

And the mining countries would claim their share of attention, in the efforts we may be called on to make. The rich districts of Zacatecas and San Luis yet contribute their supplies to the reduced treasury of the enemy. I have seen, within a few days, a letter from one of the most gallant and distinguished generals in Mexico, which estimates the revenue now derived from the mines, at an amount so much higher than I was prepared to expect, that I am unwilling to state it here, as I am not at liberty to name my authority. But if this information is correct, or near it, the product is a most important portion of the national resources, which should be diverted from the Mexican treasury to ours. And he also gives it as his decided opinion that, by proper arrangements and directions, the produce of the taxes of the country may be made to bear the expenses of holding it in our possession. If so, and the same infatuation continues to prevail in the Mexican councils, we can hold on, as indeed we must hold on, and let the enemy pay the cost of a state of things whose existence is owing to themselves. Without the extinction of their independence, and the annexation of such a vast population to our country, with few sympathies to unite them to us, we can continue to govern them; and govern them with energy and justice, such as are new in their history, till the lessons of adversity shall have taught them to do us right, and till the experience of our sway, and its operation around them, shall have brought them to a better state of feeling. We can then treat with efficient rulers, and after securing the just objects of the war, we can retire, leaving the Mexican people in the enjoyment of their independence, with a salutary conviction that it is better to provoke our friendship by justice, than to provoke our enmity by insults and aggressions.

The returns show that we have less than 20,000 men, rank and file, which exclude officers, in the midst of a hostile population, of eight or ten millions, differing from us in race, in language, in religion, in institutions, in prejudices, and, indeed, in all the characteries, which constitute national identities, and separate the great families of mankind from one another. This is exclusive of our force upon the Rio Grande, amounting to about six thousand rank and file, and which is hardly large enough to hold that region in peaceable possession, and to guard against the irruption of the Mexican troops. And it may be that this force will need augmentation, with a view to onward operations, either directly upon San Luis, or by the more circuitous but less difficult route of Zacatecas, to the central countries of Northern Mexico.

He who believes that this principal force of 28,000 men, and this auxiliary force of 6,000, including the sick invalids and disabled, are amply sufficient to hold in subjection the people already reduced to obedience, to carry the war further the longer it is protracted, and to meet its casualties, whether these are found in the battle field, in the climate, or in popular tumults, may well vote against this bill, and refuse the augmentation it provides. But those who, like me, believe that this government, founded by all for the good of all, is bound by the most sacred obligations not to expose its citizens to unnecessary peril, nor to push their exertions to the very limit of human endurance, but to make the most liberal arrangements for the prosecution of the war, and to hold the treasure of the nation light as dust when weighed in the balance with the life blood of its sons, will cheerfully vote for this proposition, and hail its passage not only as a necessary measure of policy, but as a tribute to gallantry and patriotism.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—As we have heard the remarks of the honorable Senator, I will now, with his permission, move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until after the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) shall have an opportunity to-morrow of addressing the Senate upon the resolutions introduced by him.

Mr. CASS.—I have no objection to the postponement of the bill, provided it is understood that after the honorable Senator from South Carolina has opened the subject, and made the remarks which he desires to make, that he will then give way to this bill. It is only upon the condition that he gives way to this measure, that I will consent to the postponement.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Believing that I probably might not have the opportunity to speak to-morrow, I had a conversation with the Senator from Michigan, and expressed to him my desire of addressing the Senate. If I have that opportunity, it is all I ask

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I have no objection to withdraw that motion, but with regard to any understanding that this bill shall be postponed with. I am not disposed to submit myself, nor am I authorized to enter into any understanding which will in any way commit Senators upon this side to any particular course. I should myself be glad that the Senate from Michigan should proceed, as he will of course be able to do, notwithstanding any votes that may be given on this side of the chamber.

Mr. CASS.—I trust, if the subject is not postponed expressly with a view to accommodate the Senator from South Carolina, we shall go on with the consideration of the bill, for there is no more important question which can be presented to the American Senate.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I certainly am desirous of knowing in advance whether I can have an opportunity of speaking to-morrow or not. I understand my resolution before the Senate as the bill was reported, and fixed a day for its consideration. Now, if I am to be prevented from addressing the Senate, by reason of a measure subsequently introduced, which has obtained a parliamentary advantage, all that I can say is, it will be the first occurrence of this kind that I have ever known. All I ask is the opportunity of being heard. I do not choose to speak upon this bill, and my reason for it is, that it does not give me the scope which I desire. I wish to have it understood whether I am to have to-morrow or not.

Mr. CASS.—I hope the honorable Senator will do me justice; he will recollect, and the Senate will recollect, that at the very time his resolution was introduced, and the day fixed for its consideration, I then stated to the Senate that for myself, I should endeavor to get this bill up to the exclusion of all other business. I am not actuated, as the Senator seems to infer, by a desire to exclude him from an opportunity of addressing the Senate; I only desire that this measure shall be proceeded with without delay, believing it to be the most important business that can be brought before the Senate.

Mr. WESTCOTT said he should vote against any course calculated to postpone the passage of this bill a single hour. He deeply regretted that any one had supposed there was any discourtesy towards the Senator from South Carolina. [Mr. CALHOUN.] in insisting on the being acted on before any other business. He disclaimed any such intention on his part. The Senator from South Carolina was, of all others, that member of the Senate towards whom he should be most anxious to avoid disrespect or discourtesy. But he conscientiously regarded the passage of the bill as imperatively demanded by every dictate of prudence and wise policy. He did not consider the decision of the Senate on this bill as at all connected with the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina. No matter what was the ulterior policy adopted by us—even if it was resolved to withdraw our army from Central Mexico, and adopt the defensive line-policy, still, in his opinion, this bill should be passed forthwith. It will take months after the bill becomes a law to get the troops into the field. After it passes the Senate there may be delays elsewhere. Great, sir, as is the confidence I have in the skill, valor, and prowess of our gallant soldiers in Mexico, unforeseen and unexpected circumstances may involve them in difficulties making reinforcements necessary. The orders of the government to sustain the army by taking supplies from the enemy, have just about this time been received by the army. Three weeks hence we may, and some believe that we shall, get information that the effect of the enforcement of these orders may be the requirement of an additional force there forthwith to suppress outbreaks and insurrections. I will not say I anticipate this, but it is not improbable. Our fellow-citizens of the army are in a foreign land, in the midst of eight or ten millions of embittered foes, who are ready to avail themselves of any opportunity to massacre every one of them. They are scattered over Mexico in several different towns, and divided into detachments not very strong in numbers. They are in a different climate from that they have lived in—they are peculiarly liable to be attacked by disease. Armies are more subject to epidemics than those who occupy them are when at their homes. If any disaster should occur to any of our brave men in Mexico, which the giving the reinforcements afforded by this bill could have prevented, and if the immediate passage of this bill was delayed by any act or vote of mine, I should feel as if the blood of those thus sacrificed was upon my hands. Another argument forced itself upon his mind. He believed, if even it was not already too late to reason on the question, every hour's delay tended directly to produce the very result deprecated in the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina. If it could be averted, it was only by sending additional troops to Mexico at once, and by vigorous means, making her feel the war in every portion of the country, and forcing her to sue for peace. Indecision here, delays here, opposition here, encouraged our enemies in Mexico to hold out, and finally the country would become such a mere wreck, that we should be compelled to take it all and govern it. Vigorous and speedy measures would restore her people to a peace while they had strength left to sustain themselves when the war was closed. Under these circumstances, said Mr. W., anxious as I am to listen to the Senator from South Carolina upon his resolutions, I feel that I am right in resisting any and every postponement, and for one I am willing to sit here without a recess until the final vote is taken, and I trust the Senate will do its duty, and if any detriment is occasioned by delay, let the responsibility fall elsewhere.

Mr. BADGER.—When the Senator from South Carolina introduced his resolutions, something like a fortnight ago, he made them the order of the day for to-morrow, and at the last day of the session of the Senate, the honorable chairman of the Military Committee called up the bill which is now under consideration in this Senate, with. as I understand, the avowed design to keep the measure before the Senate to the exclusion of the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, which, by a previous order of this body, were to be taken up to-morrow. This was done, sir, against the remonstrance of the Senator from South Carolina. It was done, in my judgment, sir, contrary to the usages of this body. It was, in my opinion, an exhibition of a want of courtesy towards the Senator from South Carolina. The subject matter of the resolutions have been known and announced to the Senate. The Senate has designated a day on which they shall be taken up and considered; and this bill was called up on the last day of the sitting of the Senate but one, before the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina were regularly to come up before this body for consideration, with the avowed purpose of giving it precedence over these resolutions, and probably preventing the Senator who had brought the subject before the Senate from being heard, and having the subject matter of his resolutions considered.

Now, in my judgment, nothing but some extreme public necessity—nothing but a plain case, involving the public good, and requiring immediate consideration, should have precedence of these resolutions. An object of this kind alone, which could only be accomplished by giving it precedence over these resolutions would be sufficient justification for such a course being pursued. Now, where is the necessity? Wherefore is it that this particular bill is now to be considered and passed through with such hot haste? The Senator from Florida, it is true, tells us that he entertains serious alarm lest in the next three weeks our gallant troops, who have covered themselves with honors, who have defended themselves against three times their number, may suffer some great calamity—may be overborne by superior numbers. Well, if any Senator expects any such thing, does he expect these ten regiments to be raised—does he expect that at the slow and limping pace at which measures are passed through Congress, this can by any possibility be made available? It cannot, sir. It must be manifest, that whether this bill is acted upon before the vote is taken upon the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina is a matter of the utmost indifference, if the actual application of the force intended to be raised for the purpose either of relieving the troops or prosecuting the war, either to preserve our army or to annoy or overbear the enemy. This strikes me, sir, as being the actual position of the question before the Senate. It resolves itself into this—shall the Senate, without any plain reason upon the public good, without any exigency demanded by the present state of the war, without any possible reason to believe that any good purpose can be served by it, set the example of putting aside a previous subject, and thereby offering, as it appears to me, a want of courtesy, without example, as far as I know, in this body, towards an honorable Senator, who has introduced the subject for consideration. Well, what is now proposed? How is it that this wrong movement is to be redressed? Why, it is supposed by the postponement of the consideration of this bill until the day after to-morrow, in order to give the Senator an opportunity to be heard, without a distinct understanding that after that shall have been done, the consideration of this bill is to be resumed. Suppose the course pursued in calling up this bill had not been pursued; suppose to-morrow had arrived, the resolutions had come in their order, as in my judgment they ought to be permitted to do, what would have been the result? Why, not only that the Senator from South Carolina would have had an opportunity to be heard upon his resolutions, but others would also have had an opportunity to be heard—for I do not know but many others may desire to be heard upon these resolutions, if, as he suggests, there is no such scope in the bill as in the resolutions. Is it to be understood that the subject is to be taken up merely to allow the Senator from South Carolina to express his views, and then that a narrower ground, a more restricted range is to be given to other gentlemen, who may desire to be heard upon the matters at large which are embraced in the resolutions? I hope we shall resume the ground which I believe the resolutions ought to occupy. But what does the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs propose? Surely he does not expect to force this measure through the Senate without debate; surely he does not expect that this is a measure which can be passed silently through this body. The bill must be discussed as well as the resolutions. If members of this body are disposed to spend three or four weeks in the discussion of the subjects embraced in the resolutions, they may be equally disposed to discuss this bill: the discussion must come sooner or later. I hope, then, that the Senate will postpone this subject until the day after to-morrow, that the Senator from South Carolina may be heard to-morrow, and that the Senate may then determine whether they will discuss this bill, or whether the discussion upon the resolutions is to be prosecuted to its termination. I cannot come to an understanding that after the Senator from South Carolina has delivered his views, the bill is to be taken up, and the discussion prosecuted to its termination.

Mr. CASS.—I merely want to relieve myself from the charge of a want of courtesy towards the Senator from South Carolina, who is almost the last man to whom I should wish to exhibit the slightest discourtesy. That honorable Senator will recollect that at the time I introduced this bill, I gave notice that I would endeavor to bring it up at the very earliest opportunity, and the Senator must know also, that it has been out of my power to do it sooner, in consequence of the stroke of Providence having fallen upon one of our number, and in consequence of the observance of solemnities which were due to the occasion; and now comes the very first day on which the Senate could vote on this subject and the Senator says it is a mark of discourtesy on my part to urge the consideration of the measure. Let me ask the Senator whether, if he regarded a particular subject as vital to the interests of the country, he would regard the desire to proceed with that measure to the exclusion of all others as any mark of disrespect? Would he not insist upon its immediate consideration, even at the hazard of being accused of a want of courtesy? Would he not do this himself? I am one who believe that there is an absolute necessity for this measure. The Senator from Florida very properly suggests that a state of things may arise in which it would be vitally important that the troops proposed to be raised by this bill should be in Mexico; and an honorable Senator from North Carolina suggests the slow and limping progress of measures through this body. Why, that very consideration shows that there ought to be no delay.

Who can tell what may happen three months, or even three weeks hence? This is my view of the matter, and I trust it redeems me entirely with honorable gentlemen on both sides from the imputation of want of courtesy. If this measure be postponed and the resolutions taken up, no man can tell when the discussion will be terminated. This is a measure in which the honor and interests of the country may be involved, and without which the lives of our citizens may be hazarded. I think it is no discourtesy to any gentleman to ask for the consideration of measures so intimately connected with the public interests, before the Senate shall be addressed upon other matters. I repeat that I shall hear the honorable Senator with the greatest pleasure to-morrow. I never hear him without pleasure. I never disagree, without I doubt my own judgment; and with the understanding that to-morrow shall be devoted to the hearing of the Senator, and that the bill shall be proceeded with on the next day, I shall cheerfully acquiesce, but further than that I cannot go.

Mr. BUTLER.—I do not rise to vindicate the views of my colleague, but I do rise to demand for him the ordinary course which is conceded by all parliamentary usage. He has heretofore given notice of his purpose to express his views to the Senate, and the motion of the honorable Senator from Kentucky is nothing more nor less than to give him an opportunity of doing so to-morrow. The majority of this Senate has of course the power to forward this bill, but why does the honorable chairman of the Military Committee desire so earnestly to avoid discussion? Is he distrustful of himself on this subject? and does he suppose that in the course of one day's discussion the minds of Senators here will be so modified as to take from him the power of his own measure. It may be he distrusts his own friends. I am not prepared to say what the result will be—whether the Senate will be disposed again to lay down the resolution and take up the bill. I do not say that I have any opposition to offer to the measure which the Senator has introduced, nor will I admit that he has a right to assume that any measure will be the less ready to support that measure in consequence of any discontent that may take place, but I do say that the light to be derived from discussion should be had. Discussion should be permitted to proceed before we are called upon to vote upon any measure of importance. I am very far from agreeing with the gentleman, that I am to take counsel from apprehension that from a hasty announcement in this body, we are to rush to the rescue of our gallant army, as though it were menaced with danger. I shall not take counsel from any such apprehensions; and I think it is but a reasonable request on the part of my colleague, that he should be heard before the subject is prejudged.

Mr. FOOTE.—I desire to make a single remark—not more; nor would I have intruded upon the Senate at all, in my present state of voice and health, but for the allusion made so pointedly by the Senator from North Carolina to Senators on this side of the chamber on the point of courtesy. I confess that I am not only ambitious of recognition as a patriot, but I am wholly unwilling to be recognised as at all wanting in politeness or good feeling. How far the Senator from North Carolina can reconcile it with his views of Senatorial courtesy to fulminate his accusations of discourtesy against his associates in this hall, without substantial ground upon which to rest them, I leave him to determine. According to my judgment, though, the charge which he has brought is incapable of being sustained by evidence. What is the fact? I stated before—and the venerable Senator from South Carolina will justify me in the assertion—that he, in person, claimed the other day, with that urbanity which always marks his demeanor, that, as an act of kindness to him, from his friends here, he should be allowed a hearing upon his resolutions upon the day fixed by him for taking them up. As soon as the proposition was thus made, my heart responded to the call, and I thought all on this side were inclined to be in unison, and that this act of courtesy should be extended. Now, the truth is, the Senator from North Carolina, and those associated with him, have the control of the whole matter. This plain, practical proposition has been submitted to them—that a formal understanding should arise in this chamber that the Senator from South Carolina should be allowed to be heard upon his resolutions, and that the consideration of this bill should then be proceeded with. How easy to agree to such a plain proposition! But is agreement manifested? With whom, then, is the discourtesy, when it is proposed to do all that is asked for by the Senator from South Carolina—to do all that it may be necessary, to enable the Senator to be heard on these questions? What is the answer? None at all. An answer most significant; an answer significant of a '76 scheme—I hope it may not be considered discourteous to use the word—to postpone this vital question. It is not for me to remind the gentleman from North Carolina—who is as distinguished for his knowledge of the common law as for his learning and eloquence—that it is an established principle of the law (to give the maxim, without using the Latin) "so far as the reason of the law extends, so far the law operates, and no farther." Now, the reason of courtesy is plain in this case; requiring, simply, that the gentleman from South Carolina should have an early hearing upon his own resolutions, and no further. What does the Senator from North Carolina say?—that in violation of this rule of reason and common law, the instant the Senator from South Carolina is heard on the subject, then all the other Senators shall also be allowed the same privilege. Is this in accordance with the reason stated? Does courtesy require that all should be heard? Have all participated in the concoction of this resolution? We are willing to do all that the rule alluded to might seem to require. The Senator from North Carolina says that all other Senators must also be heard. Why, it is obvious to me, and it must be obvious to the Senator, that by insisting that all others must be heard, he makes a refusal to hear any Senator an act of discourtesy, the avoidance of which he seems to have so much at heart. I, for one, sir, am most anxious to hear the views of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina. As to the result of discussion in this chamber, I fear nothing. There is too much patriotism here to permit us for a moment to doubt as to what will be the action of this body when the interests and honor of the country demand such action.

Mr. BADGER.—I was endeavoring to obtain the floor immediately after the honorable chairman of Military Affairs took his seat, for the purpose of saying that I was very much astonished to hear him intimate that I designed to charge him with a want of courtesy towards the Senator from South Carolina. I know that that Senator is incapable of any intentional discourtesy to any member of this body. When I spoke of that act as contrary to the usages of the Senate, I spoke of those usages as I had observed them for a very short period. It is possible for gentlemen to do an act of discourtesy without being aware of it; but I can assure the Senator from Mississippi that he is entirely mistaken if he supposes that any "scheme" has been concerted on this side of the chamber. For my own part, I came from a part of the Union where schemes are not very much indulged in—where they are not held in very high estimation. All I intended was to express my own opinion, that according to the views I entertained it was discourteous to the honorable Senator and a violation of the usage of the Senate. I certainly did not suppose that either the Senator from Michigan or the Senator from Mississippi designed to offer a discourtesy to the Senator from South Carolina. But it seems, sir, I am claiming too much, when I decline to enter into any agreement or understanding, that as soon as the Senator from South Carolina has expressed his views, his resolutions are to be laid aside, and the consideration of the bill resumed, on the ground that the courtesy of the Senate is completely exhausted, after the Senator from South Carolina has had an opportunity to be heard. Now, upon this point I entertain an entirely different view from that of the Senator from Michigan, and when he claims the privilege of acting as his judgment dictates, it is but right that I should claim the same privilege. It has been suggested that ample range for debate would not be afforded on this bill. If so, and if courtesy requires that the Senator from South Carolina should be heard, with this "ample room and verge enough" for the expression of his ideas, it follows, of course, according to the same principle of common fairness, that other Senators who differ totally from him, if there be any such, or entertain a modification of his opinions, should be permitted the same opportunity for the expression of those opinions. For these reasons I am of opinion that this matter should be passed over without any such understanding as is proposed, and that the discussion which is to arise upon the resolution, should arise in regular order, and be prosecuted to its final termination. At the same time I agree with the Senator from Michigan, that the claims of courtesy towards any member of this body ought to yield to subjects of necessity, to measures which are demanded by the circumstances of the country, but in this case I cannot see that any such necessity exists, and as I hold it to have been originally wrong that the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina should have been supplanted or deprived of their priority, on this subject, I hope the Senator from Michigan will allow me to correct his recollection, while I disclaim imputing to him any intentional discourtesy, of which I know him to be incapable. He is certainly in error when he supposes, that at the time when the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina were made the special order of the day for to-morrow, he gave notice that he would, in the interim, call up his bill, because the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina were submitted on the 15th of December, and on the 20th of December they were made the order of the day for to-morrow, while the bill now under consideration of the Senate was reported to the Senate on the 22d of December, being two days after the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina had been made the order of the day for to-morrow, and one week after the resolutions had been submitted to this body. Therefore, it was impossible for the Senator, unless by the spirit of prophecy, to give notice on the 20th that he would call up a bill that was not reported from the Military Committee until the 22d.

Mr. CASS.—I have no hesitation in saying that the Senator has a better knowledge of chronology than I have—I recollect distinctly, that my object in making [illegible] to meet a remark of the Senator from South Carolina, and it was in connexion with what was said by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MANGUM.—I have no doubt that the Senator from Arkansas is perfectly correct in saying that there is no intention on the part of any one, to prevent the Senator from South Carolina from being heard to-morrow; and for the very reason, that this has been almost the constant usage in this body. I think a great deal more consequence has been attached to the importance of immediate action on this bill than it is entitled to. There is no disposition to deprive the administration of the opportunity of presenting their measures in their own good time, and although I must say that, if I had my choice, I would prefer to hear the discussion upon the resolutions—to hear an expression of the sentiments entertained by Senators previous to being called upon to grant supplies to any extent—but if the administration measures are urged on the ground of a pressing public necessity, I am unwilling to take the responsibility of occasioning any delay in regard to those measures which they deem of the highest magnitude. It is true, that the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina open a much wider range of debate, but if it be the sense of the Senate that the discussion should be delayed and the supplies proceeded with, I shall not offer any impediment, nor will any one on this side of the chamber, I am convinced, although I am not authorized to speak for others. If it be the sense of the Senate to renew the discussion on the bill as soon as the Senator from South Carolina shall have expressed his views, be it so. I am not apprised that there is any disposition here unnecessarily to postpone final action upon any measures of the administration.

Mr. FOOTE.—When I used the word "scheme," it was certainly not with any discourtesy towards the Senator from North Carolina. It was merely in allusion to the postponement of business, there being conflicting views in regard to the expediency of first taking up one subject or the other; and in reference to gentlemen who might be inclined to seize upon what might, perhaps, be properly termed a parliamentary advantage. And, while I am up, I will remark that if the Senator from North Carolina understands me as using the word "scheme" in any disrespectful sense, in reference to himself or in reference to the State of North Carolina, he is entirely mistaken. But while the honorable Senator repels the idea of the application of such a term to his own State, I hope he does not mean to imply that I came from a part of the country where schemes of a discreditable character are more apt to be adopted than in North Carolina. If I had understood the Senator as intending such an intimation, I should have repelled it at the moment with promptitude, and, perhaps, with some heat. The State of Mississippi, glorious in war and distinguished in peace, stands upon a mountain elevation too lofty to be reached by the arrows of assailment hurled at her character—even by the Senator from North Carolina. As was once observed here, on a somewhat similar occasion, by a distinguished member of this body, there is not sufficient strength in the bow which he bends to bring the arrows to their mark.

Mr. BADGER.—It was my intention, as soon as the Senator had taken his seat, even had he done so without introducing such a threatening figure, to say to him that I did not think of the circumstance which might have led to the suspicion that there was at least the appearance of discourtesy in what I said. I meant no discourtesy; and I assure him that even if I were not satisfied of the strength of Mississippi, on this floor and elsewhere, I entirely disclaim the intention of assailing her. She is connected with North Carolina by many ties of association; and I can assure the honorable gentleman that if he does not make up a conflict on this floor before he is assailed by me, he will pass through his senatorial career (and long may it be,) in the most agreeable manner, and that he never will have occasion, so far as I am concerned, to make the Senate the arena of any unpleasant observations. And, indeed, I had not the slightest idea that the Senator had used the word "scheme" offensively. I am sure the word dropped from him unguardedly, and I was far from taking offence at it, for I am not "sudden and quick in quarrel"—I am not anxious to find cause of offence, nor desirous to signalize myself in contests of this kind. Perhaps there might have been another consideration—that feeling on the subject a tolerably clear conscience, I would not have been much disturbed if I had supposed the Senator was aiming the word opprobriously at my State.

Mr. FOOTE.—I trust I shall be excused for trespassing a single moment further upon the time of the Senate. Notwithstanding the express disclaimer of the Senator from North Carolina in the first half of his remarks, there is something yet in the tone and bearing of the honorable Senator, which, without explanation, conveys the impression that he has not that respect for the State of Mississippi which is due to her.

Mr. BADGER.—I have expressly disclaimed intending any offence to Mississippi.

Mr. FOOTE.—Sir, so I understood the Senator, and yet from the whole tenor of his remarks we are as much at a loss as to the intention of the Senator as before. He certainly did disclaim an intention of offending, and yet the disclaimer was accompanied by a suggestion which weakened its value, and seemed to produce some little merriment. He had stated, that he was not aware of the circumstance that would make allusion so painful.

Mr. BADGER.—No, sir; the Senator mistakes me. I did not say that I was aware of the circumstance which might make the allusion painful. I said that when I made the remark I did not think of any circumstance which might make the allusion painful.

Mr. FOOTE.—Very well, sir, I am entirely satisfied.

Mr. MANGUM.—I was remarking that I think there has been a degree of interest in regard to the priority of proceeding between this bill and the resolutions greatly disproportioned to the importance of the question. There is no design, I am persuaded, to take from the administration the opportunity of controlling the measures which they may propose. Yet it cannot be denied that the Senate has the right to act first upon such subjects as they may deem proper, but under the circumstance of this bill being pressed by the friends of the administration, though I have a bare preference the other way, I will yield that preference, and agree to proceed with the consideration of the bill; though in the meantime I desire that its consideration should be postponed until the day after to-morrow, and I now move its postponement until that day; and I hope that the motion will meet with unanimous concurrence, and that all dispositions to give preference to any other matter will vanish.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I am afraid I will find myself constrained to give a vote which may be considered wanting in courtesy to certain Senators, if I am to judge from the opinions which I have just heard expressed. I would not willingly be discourteous to any Senator; but I am unable to perceive how it is that a refusal to postpone the business of the country, or the necessary measures of legislation for the prosecution of the war, in order to take up an abstract question, having no practical bearing upon our legislation, can be considered an act of discourtesy. I am equally unable to perceive how it is that the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina will give a broader field for the discussion of the war question, including its consequences. Those resolutions do not seem to me to fairly bring up the subject of the war. They simply assert the principle of opposition to the annexation of Mexico; a proposition, the affirmation of which never has been, and perhaps never will be presented to us for action. It is an evasion of the real question, by the presentation of a false issue, if, indeed it presents any issue. What do the resolutions mean? Do they mean that the Senate is opposed to the acquisition of any territory and to all indemnity? or that he is opposed to the annexation of the whole of Mexico? They may be construed to mean the one or the other, and perhaps with equal plausibility. They strike me, sir, as furnishing a successful example of that saying of Talleyrand—that language was given to man by the Deity to enable him to conceal, not to express, his ideas. I am opposed to the postponement of the legislation of the country for the purpose of taking up any such abstract, idle propositions. I shall oppose them from a sense of duty, whether offered by the Senator from South Carolina, or contained in the resolutions of the Senator from New York. The war bills are the true measures upon which to discuss the origin, progress, and results of the war. If gentlemen desire to make speeches against the war, I wish to have them made on the bills providing for the prosecution of the war, so that the proper responsibility shall attach to their speeches and acts. The supporters of the war are willing to take the responsibility of speaking and voting for the war measures; let our adversaries take the responsibility of their acts in the same way. I repeat, that I mean no unkindness or discourtesy to any Senator. But I must be permitted to say, that this doctrine of courtesy is being carried to great lengths. I begin to think there was some force in an incident which I once witnessed in this chamber. A Senator was making a speech against a measure on constitutional grounds; a friend of the measure desired a brother Senator to go to the Senator who was opposing the bill, and ask him to vote for it as an act of courtesy, adding, that he would much sooner violate the constitution than be deemed discourteous. I suppose, therefore, if we are called upon to withhold the recruits and supplies from our army in Mexico, upon the score of courtesy to any Senator, we are bound to yield to the request. I trust that gentlemen will pardon me if I shall feel constrained to give my vote for attending to the public business first—for the discussion of abstractions afterwards.

Mr. WESTCOTT said he desired a few words to correct a misconception of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] and also a misapprehension of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] with regard to the remarks he made a few moments since. The first Senator seemed to think that he was apprehensive of immediate, impending, imminent danger to our army in Mexico.

Mr. BADGER.—I did not understand him as saying immediate danger, but that there would be danger three weeks hence.

Mr. WESTCOTT continued: And the last Senator imagines that he was laboring under great alarm and "consternation" as to its safety. He had not supposed anything in what he said, or the manner in which he said it, would have caused such thought.

Mr. BUTLER corrected the Senator, and said he had alluded to the remarks that apprehensions were now entertained of news being received in three weeks that would show the necessity of those troops—and he had not referred to the Senator as expressing any fears of "imminent" danger.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—Both Senators had misunderstood him. He had as much confidence in the army as any man had, but he could not calculate closely the amount of force that might be needed in Mexico, so as to send the smallest number. He would be liberal in men and money, and, above all, be prompt. He would provide against possible though unexpected contingencies. The remark of the Senator from North Carolina, that months would ensue before these troops could be raised, furnishes a complete answer to the argument of there being no immediate necessity for these troops. It was well known that many of our volunteers there desired to be discharged and return home, but who could not be allowed to do so till their places were supplied by new levies. This should be done as soon as practicable. Until the new regiments of regulars provided by this bill are sent to Mexico, none of the volunteers or other troops there can be withdrawn, whatever their claims to such favor. Though he did not anticipate disaster, much less defeat to our soldiers in Mexico, he would be prepared for any casualty, not only what was likely to occur, but what was possible. As to the discourtesy imputed, he denied that there was any in fact. He repeated, the bill was an independent measure, proper and necessary, whatever was decided upon as to the policy to be pursued towards Mexico. He said he could vote for the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, if convinced they were founded in wisdom and right, even after this bill passed. There was no inconsistency in such a course. He should listen to the Senator attentively, and if satisfied, he should vote for the resolutions, and if not so persuaded, he should vote against them. He did not hesitate to say that he believed one position assumed by a distinguished statesman, a citizen of Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] though he had never supported that gentleman, to be correct. It was, that Congress had the constitutional right to direct and control the President by law or resolution, as to the management of a war. He did not, as some gentlemen did, limit this right to the declaring the objects of the war; in his opinion, the Senate and House of Representatives could properly and constitutionally at any time dictate to the President how the army should be employed, and regulate how the supplies should be disposed of; and he would exercise this right whenever he believed the Executive was doing, or was about to do wrong. As to his opinions of the Executive, and of the course pursued with respect to this war, this was not a proper occasion to express them. His votes, and speeches, and acts heretofore, displayed them; they were well known. When the question as to the policy to be settled upon as to Mexico came up, he should express his views as to that. But as it respects this bill, he regarded delay as exceedingly injudicious. If it could possibly be hoped there would be no delay after it passed the Senate, he should still urge it in this chamber; but with the probability of delay in the other House, the duty to dispose of it here forthwith was made still more imperative.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I rise to say that I am perfectly satisfied with the course which is suggested by the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from North Carolina—either will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I deem it proper, as one of the Military Committee, to say, that this bill for ten additional regiments was prepared and submitted early to the Senate, under the impression that an exigency existed that troops should be promptly raised. The chairman, under instructions of the committee, announced his intention to bring up the bill at the first possible moment, and present it to a speedy passage. It is now one week—

Mr. CASS.—(In his seat.)—Two weeks.

Mr. DAVIS.—Two weeks then, Mr. President, since this announcement was made. One week, I had hoped, would have been sufficient to have passed the bill; surely it was long enough to relieve us from any charge of design to interpose it between the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina and the consideration of the Senate.

It appeared to us, that unless active operations are renewed in Mexico, thus exciting the military ardor of the people of the United States, it would require all the intervening time between the present and the period of yellow fever to organize and forward the necessary troops into the interior of Mexico. The Senator from Florida is right; there may justly be entertained apprehensions for our troops in Mexico, and that further efforts may yet be required on the battle field. What induced Santa Anna to attack General Taylor at Buena Vista, but the knowledge that his forces had been reduced so low that an easy and certain victory might be expected? Had his force upon that line been undiminished, the battle of Buena Vista would never have been fought. Let the past instruct us of the future. Tardiness in furnishing supplies of men and munitions has been the great cause of the expenditure of life which has occurred in the progress of this war. Had General Scott possessed enough of men, of transportation, and other supplies, to have advanced into the interior immediately, and after the battle of Cerro Gordo to have pressed close upon the retreating enemy, it is most probable that Santa Anna would have remained in his refuge at Orizaba, Scott's march have been unopposed, no fortifications erected around the capital, and the city of Mexico have surrendered without firing a gun. Sir, to secure peace, we must show our power to compel submission. Our weak columns have induced attacks. Our gallant soldiers outflanked, encircled—as it were engulphed in a sea of enemies—have been equal to the emergency. American valor has triumphed over every disparity; but they have done so at immense sacrifice of blood. Shall such sacrifice be demanded for the future? Shall treasure be weighed against the blood of our countrymen? Let us not, by delay, expose the lives of our patriot soldiers; defer the public necessity to discuss general positions of no applicability to the question before us. Those occasions on which our men have performed such prodigies were not anticipated until it was too late to give relief. We shall show ourselves more wise only by avoiding, in future, similar contingency.

The Secretary of War, with all the information before him—the Executive of the United States, with all the knowledge his position gives him—asks for these additional regiments. On what rule shall we determine the propriety of the demand? Sir, all history concurrently establishes the fact, that when civil governments at home attempt to direct military operations in a foreign country, failure is the result. Upon the generals must fall the responsibility of failure—upon their reports must decisions here, as to means, mainly rely. These come to us through the Executive and War Department. As to the special order for to-morrow, I will say that the Military Committee have certainly not sought any parliamentary advantage; nor have the Senators, with whom I have conversed, any wish or intention to prevent the Senator from South Carolina from discussing his resolutions. I shall be pleased to hear that distinguished Senator upon any great question; and certainly do not object to his offering his remarks upon his resolutions rather than upon the bill. Nor do I perceive any antagonism between the resolutions and the bill. I do not wish to annex the whole of Mexico, or govern it as a province. The President does not look to such end; nor, sir, does the sending of these troops, in my opinion, tend to it. To secure indemnity for the past, is more easy than to attain security for the future. This last object, and to leave behind us a republican government sufficiently stable to maintain treaty obligations, and give us some guaranty for the observance of neutral rights, are objects which I hope to see promoted by this addition to our army. To me it is easy to concur in the main proposition of the resolutions, and yet insist on the augmentation of our army, and refuse to withdraw our forces. I shall be pleased, as on other occasions, to hear the Senator from South Carolina; but, after his remarks, shall insist on resuming the consideration of the bill now before the Senate; leaving those who may wish to reply, to do so after the public service has been attended to; and when, for one, I shall be more willing to listen attentively to a general discussion.

Mr. SEVIER.—I hope this bill will be postponed, and made the special order at one o'clock on Wednesday.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I wish to make a single remark. I think that my honorable friend from Mississippi is a little mistaken in supposing that any of the disasters of this war are attributable to the tardy legislation on the part of Congress. I have been here the whole time, and if any blame is to be attached to Congress for tardy legislation, of course I must come in for my share of that blame. When was it that we have been guilty of any tardiness in granting any supplies of men or money that were demanded by the Executive? We began by authorizing the Executive to accept the services of fifty thousand volunteers, and that force was never exhausted until the fall of last year. There have been military resources open at all times to the President, which he might have exercised, and which he has exercised, by calling out men to serve during the war. This is the remark I intended to make. I am satisfied the honorable Senator meant no rebuke to the Senate; he has been more meritoriously engaged, and is evidently under a misapprehension if he supposes that any such charge can possibly be made upon Congress.

Mr. DAVIS.—It is very far from my intention to rebuke the Senate; but I believe that I am borne out in what I have stated by proof. We did pass a bill authorizing the raising of fifty thousand volunteers; but all other supplies were cut down—I mean camp and garrison equipage.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—One word as to that—my recollection is fresh—that when the appeal was made for supplies, they were at once granted; there was not a dollar asked that was not granted, not an item of supply demanded that was reduced in amount. I think the Senate will find this to be the case. Not a dollar was refused. We were guided by the estimates that were furnished, and voted their full amount.

Mr. DAVIS.—I intended to refer the honorable Senator, when I was up, to an item that was stricken off from the Quartermaster's estimate.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I did not know any thing about that; it was not in this body.

Mr. DAVIS.—It was stricken off in the House of Representatives; the item was for camp and equipage supplies.

The question being taken on the postponement, it was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and, after a short time spent therein, the doors were opened, and

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 4, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. STURGEON presented the petition of Jones and Baker, and others, praying the repayment of certain Treasury notes purloined from the post office. Mr. Speaker had been deputed by commission by mail; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Henrick Aiker, praying an extension of his patent for an improvement in the saw-set; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. BELL presented the petition of Betsy McIntosh, a Cherokee, praying payment of the money awarded her by the Board of Cherokee Commissioners under the 17th article of the treaty of 1835; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of the Kennet Monthly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends in Chester county, Pennsylvania, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and the slave trade between the States; also, the rejection of any proposition for the acquisition of territory, unless provision be made for the exclusion of slavery therefrom.

The motion to receive the memorial being objected to,

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

WAR MEETING IN PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. CAMERON, in presenting the proceedings of a town meeting in Philadelphia, held on the 18th December, 1847, approving the measures pursued by the administration in the prosecution of the war with Mexico, remarked that he agreed with those composing the meeting in every particular, and that he should deem it his duty, as a Senator, to act in accordance with their wishes.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CASS submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to the Senate such military reports, letters, &c., as may have been received from the officers in Mexico since the communication of his annual report, and that the same be printed with his annual report.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs inquire into the expediency of granting the President authority to commission, from the regular army, such officers as may think proper to tender their services to command, occasionally during the war, New Mexico, with power in the commander-in-chief to withhold the commission of any officer, at any time, during the war, or to terminate the same, at pleasure, and to withdraw the commissions, or any of the rights incident thereto.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BREESE asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to create the office of surveyor general of public lands in the Territory of Oregon, and to grant donation rights to settlers therein, and for other purposes; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, gave notice of his intention to ask leave, at some future day, to introduce a bill.

Mr. BADGER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Charles L. Dell, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Joseph Wilson, was read a third time.

Resolved, That the said bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

The joint resolution to create a board to ascertain and determine the amount of each of the claims of the citizens of the United States against Mexico, was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill providing for the payment of the claim of Walter R. Johnson against the United States, was read the second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the said bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

The Senate resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of the administratrix of Elisha L. Keen, deceased.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill concerning certain collection districts, and for other purposes; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution in favor of David Shaw and Solomon T. Corser, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read a third time.

Resolved, That this resolution pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this resolution.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Rhodes was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. SEVIER called for the reading of the report. It was read by the Secretary.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

CONQUEST OF MEXICO.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order of the day, being the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. CALHOUN, on the 15th of December:

Resolved, That to conquer Mexico and to hold it, either as a province or to incorporate it in the Union, would be inconsistent with the avowed object for which the war has been prosecuted; a departure from the settled policy of the government; in conflict with its character and genius; and in direct subversion of our free and popular institutions.

Resolved, That no line of policy in the further prosecution of the war should be adopted which may lead to consequences so disastrous.

Mr. CALHOUN.—In offering, Senators, these resolutions for your consideration, I have been governed by the reason which induced me to oppose the war, and by the same considerations I have been ever since guided. In alluding to my opposition to the war, I do not intend to notice the reasons which governed me on that occasion, further than is necessary to explain my motives upon the present. I opposed the war then, not only because I considered it unnecessary and that it might have been easily avoided—not only because I thought the President had no authority to order a portion of the territory in dispute and in possession of the Mexicans, to be occupied by our troops—not only because I believe the allegations upon which it was sanctioned by Congress were unfounded in truth, but from high considerations of reasons and policy, because I believed it would lead to great and serious evils to the country, and greatly endanger its free institutions.

But after the war was declared, and had received the sanction of the government, I acquiesced in what I could not prevent, and which it was impossible for me to arrest; and I then felt it to be my duty to limit my course so as to give that direction to the conduct of the war as would, as far as possible, prevent the evil and danger with which, in my opinion, it threatened the country and its institutions. For this purpose, at the last session, I suggested to the Senate a defensive line, and for that purpose I now offer these resolutions. This, and this only, is the motive which governs me. I am moved by no personal or party considerations. My object is neither to sustain the Executive nor strengthen the opposition: but simply to discharge an important duty to the country. But I shall express my opinion on all points with boldness, and independence, such as becomes a Senator, who has nothing to ask, either from the government or from the people, and whose only aim is to diminish, to the smallest possible amount, the evils incident to this war. But, when I come to notice those points in which I differ from the President, I shall do it with all the decorum which is due to the Chief Magistrate of the Union.

When I suggested a defensive line at the last session, this country had in its possession, through the means of its arms, ample territory, and stood in a condition to force indemnity. Before then the successes of our arms had gained all the contiguous portions of Mexico, and our army has ever since held all that it is desirable to hold—that portion whose population is sparse, and on that account the more desirable to be held. For I hold it in reference to this war, a fundamental principle, that when we receive territorial indemnity it shall be unoccupied territory. In offering a defensive line, I did it because I believed that in the first place it was the only certain mode of terminating the war successfully. I did it also, because I believed that it would be a vast saving of the sacrifice of human life; but above all, I did so because I saw that any other line of policy would expose us to tremendous evil, which these resolutions were intended to guard against. The President took a different view. He recommended a vigorous prosecution of the war—not for conquest—that was disavowed—but for the purpose of conquering peace: that is, to compel Mexico to sign a treaty making a sufficient cession of territory to indemnify this government both for the claims of its citizens and for the expenses of the war. Sir, I opposed this policy. I opposed it among other reasons, because I believed that if the war should be ever so successful, there was great hazard to us at least, that the object intended to be effected by it would not be accomplished. Congress thought differently. Ample provisions in men and money were granted for carrying on the war. The campaign has terminated. It has been as successful as the Executive of the country could possibly have calculated. Victory after victory has followed in succession without a single reverse. Santa Anna was repelled and defeated with all his forces—Vera Cruz was taken and the castle with it. Jalapa, Perote, and Puebla fell, and after two great triumphs of our army, the gates of Mexico opened to us. Well, sir, what has been accomplished? What has been done? Has the avowed object of the war been attained? Have we conquered peace? Have we obtained a treaty? Have we obtained any indemnity? No, sir; not a single object contemplated has been effected, and what is worse, our difficulties are greater now than they were then, and the objects, forsooth, more difficult to reach than they were before the campaign commenced.

Now, Senators have asked what has caused this complete discomfiture of the views of the Executive for which men and money were granted? It is not to be charged to our troops—they have done all that skill and gallantry was capable of effecting. It must be charged somewhere, and where is it to be charged, but upon the fact that the plan of the campaign was erroneous—that the object pursued was a mistake. We aimed at indemnity in a wrong way. If we had aimed directly to it, we had the means to accomplish it directly—they were in our hands. But, sir, we aimed at indemnity through a treaty. We could not reach it by a treaty with Mexico, and Mexico by refusing to treat simply, could defeat the whole object which we had in view. We put out of our own power and into her hands to say when the war should terminate. We have, for all our vast expenditure of money, for all the loss of blood and men, we have nothing but the military glory which the campaign has furnished. We cannot, I presume, estimate the expenses of the campaign at less than $40,000,000, (I cannot compute the sum with any degree of precision, but I believe I may say about that sum,) and between the sword and disease, many thousand of lives, probably five, six, or seven thousand have been sacrificed; and all this for nothing at all.

But it is said that the occupancy of a defensive line would have been as expensive as the campaign itself. The President has assigned many reasons for that opinion, and the Secretary of War has done the same. I have examined these reasons with care. This is not the proper occasion to discuss them; but I must say, with all possible deference, they are to my mind utterly fallacious. I will put the question in a general point of view, and satisfy the minds of Senators that such is the case. The line proposed by myself, extending from the Pacific Ocean to the Paso del Norte, would have been covered by the Gulf of California and a wilderness peopled by hostile tribes of Indians; and for its defence, nothing would have been needed beyond a few vessels of war stationed in the Gulf, and a single regiment. From the Paso del Norte to its mouth, we can readily estimate the amount of force necessary for its defence. It was a frontier between Texas and Mexico when Texas had not more than 150,000 of a population—without any standing army whatever, and very few troops. Yet for seven years Texas maintained that frontier line; and that too, when Mexico was far more consolidated than she is now; when her revolutions were not so frequent, her resources in money were much greater, and Texas her only opponent. Can any man believe that Mexico, exhausted as she now is—prostrated as she has been—defeated—can any man believe that it will cost as much to defend that frontier as the last campaign has cost. I will not say, I would hazard nothing in asserting that the very interest of the money spent in the last campaign, would have secured that line for an indefinite period, and that the men who have lost their lives would have been more than sufficient to defend it.

So much for the past. We now come to the commencement of another campaign; and the question is, what shall be done? The same measures are proposed. It is still "a vigorous prosecution of the war." The measures are identically the same. It is not for conquest—that is now as emphatically disowned as it was in the first instance. The object is not to blot Mexico out of the list of nations; for the President is as emphatic in the expression of his desire to maintain the nationality of Mexico. He desires to see her an independent and flourishing community, and assigns strong and cogent reasons for all that. Well, sir, the question is now, what is to be done? We are now coming to the practical question. Shall we aim at carrying on another vigorous campaign under present circumstances.

I have examined this question with care, and I repeat, that I cannot support the recommendations of the President. There are many and powerful reasons, stronger than those which existed at the commencement of the last campaign, to justify my opposition now. There is a bill for ten additional regiments now before the Senate, and another bill providing for twenty regiments of volunteers has been reported, making in all not less, I suppose, than twenty-five thousand troops, raising the number of troops in the service, as I presume the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs can inform you, to not much less than seventy thousand in the whole. Well, sir, the expense will be much more than that of the last campaign. It will cost not much short of sixty millions of dollars.

To meet so large an expenditure would involve, in the present and prospective condition of the money market, it is to be apprehended, not a little embarrassment. Last year money was abundant, and easily obtained. An unfortunate famine in Europe created a great demand for our agricultural products. That turned the balance of trade greatly in our favor, and specie poured into the country with a strong and steady current. No inconsiderable portion of it passed into the Treasury, through the duties, which kept it full, in spite of the large sums remitted to meet the expenses of the war. The case is different now. Instead of having a tide flowing in, equal to the drain flowing out, the drain is now both ways. The exchanges are now against it, instead of being in our favor, and instead of specie flowing into the country from abroad, it is flowing out. In the meantime, the price of stocks and Treasury notes, instead of being at or above par, have both fallen below, to a small extent. The effects of the depreciation of Treasury notes will cause them to pass into the Treasury in payment of the customs and other dues to the government, as the cheaper currency, instead of gold and silver; while the expenses of the war, whether paid for by the transmission of gold and silver direct to Mexico, or by drafts drawn in favor of British merchants or other capitalists there, will cause whatever specie may be in the vaults of the Treasury to flow from it, either for remittance direct, on account of the ordinary transactions of the country, or to pay the drafts which may be drawn upon it, and which, when paid in the present state of exchanges, will be remitted abroad. But this process of paying in Treasury notes, instead of gold and silver, and gold and silver flowing out in both directions, cannot continue long without exhausting its specie, and having nothing to meet the public expenditure, including those of the war, but Treasury notes. Can they, under such circumstances, preserve even their present value? Is there not great danger that they will fall lower and lower, and finally involve the finances of the government and the circulation of the country in the greatest embarrassment and difficulty?

Now, sir, in this state of things, what can possibly follow? A great commercial crisis—a great financial crisis—even, possibly, a suspension of the banks. I do not pretend to deal in the language of panic. But there is danger of all this, of which there was not the slightest apprehension at the commencement of the last session. At present there is great danger. The great difficulty in prosecuting your campaign will be to obtain money. Men you may raise, but money it will be difficult to get. I lately conversed with a gentleman who ought to know these things better than myself, and he supposed that forty millions of dollars would be required, either in the shape of Treasury notes or stocks, to carry on the campaign. I asked at what price money could be had, and the answer was that it would be at the rate of ninety for one hundred, which would be rather more than seven per cent. I believe.

But, sir, these are not the only objections, formidable as they are. The farther you proceed, the difficulties will increase. I do not see the slightest chance that can tend to the realization of what it is avowed, the prosecution of the war is intended to accomplish. The object is to obtain a treaty. We no longer hear of conquering a peace, but of obtaining an honorable treaty—the meaning of which, is neither more nor less than that we are to obtain a treaty from Mexico, giving us a cession of land equal to the whole indemnity already stated in the former part of my remarks. Well, sir, as it strikes me, whether the war is successful or unsuccessful, it must certainly end in the defeat of the object, for the attainment of which it is avowedly prosecuted. If the war be unsuccessful, I need not argue the point. If we should be baffled in our arms—as I trust we will not be, and I think is not very likely to be the case—if circumstances should prove unfortunate for us, and we should not be able to accomplish, in a military point of view, what is characterized as the vigorous prosecution of the war, then certainly there will be no treaty. I take higher ground. I insist upon it that the more successfully this war is prosecuted, the more certain will be the defeat of the objects designed to be accomplished, whilst the objects disavowed will be accomplished. How is a successful war to be carried on? What is the object of it? What is it intended to effect? I can see but one thing to be effected. It is to suppress all resistance in Mexico, to overpower and disperse her army, to overthrow her civil government, and to leave her without any farther power of resistance. Well Mr. President, if that be done, what is the reade? How are you to get an honorable peace? It takes but one party to make war—two parties to make peace. If all authority in Mexico be overthrown, if there be no legitimate power with whom to negotiate, how are you to accomplish those objects which it is proclaimed the vigorous prosecution of the war is intended to effect. Sir, you are defeated by your success. That will be the clear and inevitable result. But what do you accomplish? The very objects which you disavow! For if the war should be so prosecuted, where will be the nationality of Mexico? Where her separate existence? Where this free republic with whom you desire to treat? Gone! We have blotted her out of the list of nations. She has become a mere mass of individuals without any political existence, and the sovereignty of the country, at least, for the time being, is transferred to us. Now, Mr. President, this is not only a conclusion from reasoning upon this subject, but it is one to which, if I understand the President aright, he comes with a single exception, and that, a mere contingency not likely to take place. The President has very much the same conception of the object of a vigorous war as I have presented. He says that the great difficulty of getting peace results from this, that the people of Mexico are divided under factious chieftains, and that the chieftain in power dare not give peace because his rival would then be able to turn him out; and that the only way to remedy this evil and obtain a treaty, is to put down the whole of them. Well, what is to be done then? Is the thing to stop there? No. We are then to build up again and establish, under our power and protection, a republican form of government from the citizens who are well disposed, which he says are numerous, and are prevented from obtaining it only by fear of those military chiefs. And it is with this government, sir, which is to grow up under the encouragement and protection of our army—to be established by their authority—that it is proposed to treat in order to obtain peace. I must confess I am a little at a loss to see how a free and independent republic can grow up under the protection and authority of its conqueror. I do not see how such a government can be established under his authority. I can readily understand how an aristocracy—how a kingly government—a despotism, might be established by a conqueror. But how a free and independent republic can grow up under such circumstances, is to me incomprehensible. I had always supposed that republican government was the spontaneous work of the people—that it came from the people—from the hearts of the people—that it was supported by the hearts of the people, and that it required no support—no protection from any quarter whatever. But, sir, it seems that these are antiquated notions—obsolete ideas—and that we may now manufacture republics to order, by authority of a conquering government.

But suppose, sir, all these difficulties surmounted. How can you make a free government in Mexico? Where are your materials? It is to be, I presume, a confederated government like our own. Where is the intelligence in Mexico adequate to the construction of such a government? That is what she has been aiming at for twenty-odd years, but so utterly incompetent are her people for the work, that it has been a complete failure from beginning to end. The great body of the intelligence and wealth of Mexico is concentrated in the priesthood, who are altogether disinclined to that form of government. Then the owners of the haciendas—the large planters of the country, who comprise almost all the remaining mass of intelligence, are without opportunities of concert and destitute of the means of forming such a government. Sir, such a government would be impossible—and if put up, would tumble down the very next day after our protection was withdrawn.

It appears to me to be a far more plausible plan, if it is determined to have peace, to sustain the government that now exists in Mexico; or rather to refrain from putting it down. Let it grow up and mature itself. I have conversed with several officers of the army—men of intelligence—on the subject, and all agree in the opinion that the mere shadow of a government which now remains at Queretaro, will have no authority whatever; and that if we were to make a peace in any degree conformatory to our view of what a peace ought to be, the very moment we withdraw, it would all be overthrown; and what then? The very country assigned to us by the peace for an indemnity, we must either hold defensively and be brought back ultimately to the defensive line, which would be the end of the whole of it; or, return and renew this war till it terminates in the conquest of the country.

I protest utterly against this government undertaking to build up any government in Mexico with the pledge of protection. The party placed in power must be inevitably overthrown, and we will be under the solemn obligation to return and reinstate them in power, and that would occur again and again, till the country would fall into our hands precisely as Hindostan fell into the hands of the English. This very conquest of Hindostan, which we have been censuring for years and years, ever since I recollect, was the result of mistaken policy, leading on from step to step, each one deeper and deeper—scarcely any design of conquest being entertained, but ultimately conquest became unavoidable, and it was necessary not to hold the country, but to conquer the adjacent territory.

Well, sir, if this contingency follows—if the Executive fails in establishing another government there under our encouragement and protection, and if the government itself shall refuse to make a treaty with us on such terms as we will accept in regard to indemnity, then the President himself agrees that he must take the very course which I have said would be the inevitable consequence of a vigorous prosecution of the war. The President says in substance, after having attempted to build up such a government—after having employed the best efforts to secure peace upon the most liberal terms, if all fail—I now give his own words—if all fail, we must hold on to the occupation of the country, we must take the measure of indemnity into our own hands, and enforce such terms as the honor of the country demands. Now, sir, what is this? Is it not an acknowledgment, that if this factitious government, which is aimed at, cannot be built up, we must make a conquest of the whole country and occupy it? Can words be stronger? "Occupy the country"—take the full measure of indemnity—no defensive line—no treaty—and enforce terms—terms on whom? On the government? No, no, no. It is to enforce the terms on the people individually; that is to say, to establish a government over them in the form of provinces.

Well, the President is right. If in the vigorous prosecution of the war, as the President proposes, the contingency should fail—and the chances of its failure are many—there will be no retreating. Every act against calling back the army, as they designate it—against taking a defensive line, which is now advanced, will have double force after you have spent sixty millions of dollars, and have acquired possession of the whole of Mexico. The interests in favor of keeping us there will be much more influential then than now. The army itself will be larger. Those who live by war—a large and powerful body—the numerous contractors, the sutlers, the merchants, the speculators in the lands and mines of Mexico, and all engaged every way, directly or indirectly, in the progress of the war, and absorbing the whole expenditures, will be all adverse to retiring, and will swell the cry in favor of continuing and extending conquest. The President talks, sir, of taking indemnity into our hands, then; but why not take indemnity now? We are much nearer indemnity now than we will be at the end of the next campaign, when we shall have sixty millions added to the expenditure of the last forty. What will you then have to indemnify you? Nothing but a Mexican population, on whom you are to impose taxation in all forms and shapes, and amongst which you will have to maintain an army of at least forty thousand men, according to the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. DAVIS,) not a very large number; for he says that the 43,000 men now there are in danger. Then there is no indemnity at all. You will never get enough in that way to meet your expenditures. It will all have to come out of the pockets of the people of the United States; and after all the talk of indemnity—of pushing on this war vigorously to success—at the end of the next campaign, instead of indemnity, you will have a heavy pecuniary burden imposed upon the present and succeeding generation.

Well, we have now come to the solemn question proposed by these resolutions. I have shown where this line of policy will, in all probability, lead you—I may say, will inevitably lead you, unless some unexpected contingency should prevent. It will lead to the blotting out of the nationality of Mexico, and the throwing of eight or nine millions of people, without a government, on your hands. It will compel you, in all probability, to assume the government, for, I think, there will be very little prospect of your retiring. You must either hold the country as a province, or incorporate it into your Union. Shall we do either? That's the question. Far from us be such an act, and for the reasons contained in the resolutions.

The first of these reasons is this: It would be inconsistent with the avowed object for which the war was prosecuted. That needs no argument after what has been said. Since the commencement of the war till this moment, every man has disavowed the intention of conquest—of extinguishing the existence of Mexico as a people. It has been constantly proclaimed that the only object was indemnity. And yet, sir, as events are moving on, what we disavow may be accomplished, and what we have avowed may be defeated. Sir, this result will be a dark and lasting imputation on either the sincerity or the intelligence of this government; on its sincerity because so opposite to your own avowals; on your intelligence for the want of a clear foresight in so plain a case, as not to discern the consequences.

Sir, we have heard how much glory our country has acquired in this war. I acknowledge it to the full amount, so far as military glory is concerned. The army has done nobly—chivalrously—they have conferred honor on the country, for which I sincerely thank them.

I believe all our thanks will be continued to the army. So far as I know in the civilized world, there is no approbation of the conduct of the civil portion of our power. On the contrary, every where the declaration is made that we are an ambitious, unjust, hard people, more given to war than any other people of modern times. Whether this be true or not, it is not for me to inquire.—I am speaking now merely of the reputation which we bear abroad. Everywhere, I believe, for as much as we have gained in military reputation abroad, I regret to perceive, we have lost in our political and civil reputation. Now, sir, much as I regard military glory—much as I rejoice to behold our people in possession of the indomitable energy and courage which surmount all difficulties, and which class them among the first military people of the age, I would be very sorry indeed that our government should lose any reputation for wisdom, moderation, discretion, justice, and those other high qualities which have distinguished us in the early stages of our history.

The next reason which my resolutions assign is, that it is without example or precedent, either to hold Mexico as a province, or to incorporate her into our Union. No example of such a line of policy can be found. We have conquered many of the neighboring tribes of Indians, but we never thought of holding them in subjection—never of incorporating them into our Union. They have either been left as an independent people amongst us, or been driven into the forests.

I know farther, sir, that we have never dreamed of incorporating into our Union any but the Caucasian race—the free white race. To incorporate Mexico, would be the very first instance of the kind of incorporating an Indian race, for more than half of the Mexicans are Indians, and the residue is composed chiefly of mixed blood. I protest against such a union as that! Ours, sir, is the government of the white man. The greatest misfortunes of Spanish America are to be traced to the fatal error of placing these colored races on an equality with the white race. That error destroyed the social arrangement which formed the basis of society. The Portugese and ourselves have escaped—the Portugese at least to some extent—and we are the only people on this continent which have made revolutions without being followed by anarchy. And yet it is professed and talked about to erect these Mexicans into a territorial government, and place them on an equality with the people of the United States. I protest utterly against such a project.

Sir, it is a remarkable fact, that in the whole history of man, as far as my knowledge extends, there is no instance whatever of any civilized colored race being found equal to the establishment of free popular government, although by far the largest portion of the human family is composed of these races. And even in the savage state we scarcely find them any where with such government, except it be our noble savages—for noble I will call them. They for the most part had free institutions, but they are easily sustained amongst a savage people. Are we to overlook this fact? Are we to associate with ourselves as equals, companions, and fellow-citizens, the Indians and mixed race of Mexico? Sir, I should consider such a thing as fatal to our institutions.

The next two reasons which I assigned, were, that it would be in conflict with the genius and character of our institutions, and subversive of our free government. I take these two together as they are so intimately connected; and now of the first—to hold Mexico in subjection.

Mr. President, there are some propositions too clear for argument; and before such a body as the Senate, I should consider it a loss of time to undertake to prove that to hold Mexico as a subjected province would be hostile, and in conflict with our free popular institutions, and in the end subversive of them. Sir, he who knows the American constitution well—he who has duly studied its character—he who has looked at history, and knows what has been the effect of conquests of free states invariably, will require no proof at my hands to show that it would be entirely hostile to the institutions of the country, to hold Mexico as a province.—There is not an example on record any free state even having attempted the conquest of any territory approaching the extent of Mexico without disastrous consequences. The nation conquered have in time conquered the conquerors by destroying their liberty. That will be our case, sir. The conquest of Mexico would add so vast an amount to the patronage of this government, that it would absorb the whole power of the States in the Union. This Union would become imperial, and the States mere subordinate corporations. But the evil will not end there. The process will go on. The same process by which the power would be transferred from the States to the Union, will transfer the whole from this department of the government (I speak of the legislature) to the Executive. All the added power and added patronage which conquest will create, will pass to the Executive.—In the end you put in the hands of the Executive the power of conquering you. You give to it, sir, such splendor, such ample means, that, with the principle of proscription which unfortunately prevails in our country, the struggle will be greater at every presidential election than our institutions can possibly endure. The end of it will be, that that branch of the government will become all-powerful, and the result is inevitable—anarchy and despotism. It is at certain as that I am this day addressing the Senate.

Sir, let it not be said that Great Britain furnishes an example to the contrary—that she holds provinces of vast extent of population without materially impairing the liberty of the citizen, or exposing her to anarchy, confusion, or corruption. It is so; but what is the explanation? Of all governments that ever existed affording any protection whatever to liberty, the English government far transcends them all in that respect. She can bear more patronage in proportion to her population and wealth than any government of that form that ever existed, nay, to go farther, than can despotism in its most absolute form. I will not go into the philosophy of this; that would take me farther from the track than I desire. But I will say in a very few words, it results from the fact that her Executive and the House of Peers, the conservative branch of her government, are both hereditary. The Roman government may have exceeded, and did exceed, the British government in its power for conquest; but no people ever did exist, and probably never will exist, with such a capacity for conquest as that people. But the capacity of Rome to hold subjected provinces, was as nothing compared to that of Great Britain, and hence, as soon as the Roman power passed from Italy beyond the Adriatic on one side, and the Alps on the other, and the Mediterranean, their liberty fell prostrate—the Roman people became a rabble—corruption penetrated every where, and violence and anarchy ruled the day. Now, we see England with dependent provinces of vastly greater territorial extent, and probably not less in population—I have not examined—we see her going on without impairing personal liberty, or exposing the government to violence or anarchy. Yet the English have not wholly escaped. Although they have retained their liberty and have not fallen into anarchy and despotism, yet we behold the population of England crushed to the earth by the super-incumbent weight of debt. Reflecting on that government, I have often thought that there was only one way in which it could come to an end—that the weight of the superstructure would crush the foundation—that the wealth accumulated, in part by these very conquests, by the higher classes would crush the laboring masses below. But has she obtained indemnity from all her subjected provinces? On the contrary, instead of drawing the means of supporting herself from them, has she not been compelled to resort to the labor of her own population to hold them in subjection? And has she not thrown a burden upon them, which, with all their industry and skill—with all their vast accumulation of capital and power of machinery, they are incapable of bearing without being reduced to poverty? Take even her earliest and nearest conquest—the neighboring island of Ireland—is it not to this day a source of heavy expense, and a burthen to her, instead of a source of revenue?

But while the English government has such vast power of holding subjected provinces in subjection without impairing her liberty—without the evils incident to it, our government, of all free governments that ever existed, has the least capacity to bear patronage proportionate to its wealth and power. In this respect the genius of the two governments is precisely the opposite, however much alike in their exterior forms, and their laws and customs. The cause of this difference I cannot undertake to explain on the present occasion, but must content myself by saying that it results from its federal character and the nature of its conservative principles. Shall we, then, with these certain and inevitable consequences in a government better calculated to resist them than any other, adopt such a ruinous policy, and reject the lessons of experience? So much then, Mr. President, for holding Mexico as a province.

I come now to the proposition of incorporating her into our Union. Well, as far as law is concerned, that is easy. You can establish a territorial government for every state in Mexico, and there are some twenty of them. You can appoint governors, judges and magistrates. You can give the people a subordinate government, allowing them to legislate for themselves, whilst you defray the cost. So far as law goes the thing is done. There is no analogy between this and our territorial governments. Our territories are only an offset of our own people, or foreigners from the same regions from which we came. They are small in number. They are incapable of forming a government. It would be inconvenient for them to sustain a government, if it were formed; and they are very much obliged to the United States for undertaking the trouble, knowing that on the attainment of their majority—when they come to manhood—at twenty-one—they will be introduded to an equality with all the other members of the Union. It is entirely different with Mexico. You have no need of armies to keep your territories in subjection. But when you incorporate Mexico, you must have powerful armies to keep them in subjection. You may call it annexation, but it is a forced annexation which is a contradiction in terms, according to my conception. You will be involved, in one word, in all the evils which I attribute to holding Mexico as a province. In fact, it will be but a provincial government, under the name of a territorial government. How long will that last? How long will it be before Mexico will be capable of incorporation into our Union? Why, if we judge from the examples before us, it will be a very long time. Ireland has been held in subjection by England for seven or eight hundred years; and yet still remains hostile, although her people are of kindred race with the conquerors. A few French Canadians on this continent yet maintain the attitude of a hostile people; and never will the time come, in my opinion, Mr. President, that these Mexicans will be heartily reconciled to your authority. They have Castilian blood in their veins—the old Gothic, quite equal to the Anglo-Saxon in many respects—in some respects superior. Of all nations of the earth, they are the most pertinacious—have the highest sense of nationality—hold out longest, and often even with the least prospect of effecting their object. On this subject also I have conversed with officers of the army, and they all entertain the same opinion—that these people are now hostile, and will continue so.

But, Mr. President, suppose all these difficulties removed. Suppose these people attached to our Union, and desirous of incorporating with us, ought we to bring them in? Are they fit to be connected with us? Are they fit for self-government and for governing you? Are you, any of you, willing that your States should be governed by these twenty odd Mexican States, with a population of about only one million of your blood, and two or three millions of mixed blood, all the rest being pure Indians, not equal to the Cherokees or Choctaws?

We make a great mistake, sir, when we suppose that all people are capable of self-government. We are anxious to force free government on all; and I see that it has been urged in a very respectable quarter, that it is the mission of this country to spread civil and religious liberty over all the world, and especially over this continent. It is a great mistake. None but people advanced to a very high state of moral and intellectual improvement are capable, in a civilized state, of maintaining free government; and amongst those who are so purified, very few indeed, have had the good fortune of forming a Constitution capable of endurance. It is a remarkable fact in the history of man, that scarcely ever have free popular institutions been formed by wisdom alone that have endured.

It has been the work of fortunate circumstances or a combination of circumstances, a succession of fortunate incidents of some kind, which give to any people a free government. It is a very difficult task to make a constitution to last, though it may be supposed by some, that they can be made to order, and furnished at the shortest notice. Sir, this admirable constitution of our own was the result of a fortunate combination of circumstances. It was superior to the wisdom of the men who made it. It was the force of circumstances which induced them to adopt most of its wise provisions. Well, sir, of the few nations who have the good fortune to adopt self-government, few have had the good fortune long to preserve that government; for it is harder to preserve than to form it. Few people, after years of prosperity, remember the tenure by which their liberty is held; and I fear, Senators, that is our own condition. I fear that we shall continue to involve ourselves until our own system becomes a ruin. Sir, there is no solicitude now for liberty. Who talks of liberty when any great question comes up? Here is a question of the first magnitude as to the conduct of this war. Do you hear anybody talk about its effect upon our liberties and our free institutions? No, sir. That was not the case formerly. In the early stages of our government the great anxiety was how to preserve liberty. The great anxiety now, is for the attainment of mere military glory. In the one we are forgetting the other. The maxim of former times was, that power is always stealing from the many to the few; the price of liberty was perpetual vigilance. They were constantly looking out and watching for danger. Then, when any great question came up, the first inquiry was, how it could affect our free institutions—how it could affect our liberty. Not so now. Is it because there has been any decay of the spirit of liberty among the people? Not at all. I believe the love of liberty was never more ardent, but they have forgotten the tenure of liberty by which alone it is preserved.

We think we may now indulge in everything with impunity, as if we held our charter of liberty by "right divine"—from Heaven itself. Under these impressions we plunge into war, we contract heavy debts, we increase the patronage of the Executive, and yet even talk of a crusade to force our institutions, our liberty, upon all people. There is no species of extravagance which our people imagine will endanger their liberty in any degree. But it is a great and fatal mistake. The day of retribution will come. It will come as certainly as I am now addressing the Senate, and when it does come, awful will be the reckoning; heavy the responsibility somewhere!

Mr. President, with these impressions I cannot approve of the policy recommended by the Executive, nor can I, with my present views, support it. The question is now, what shall be done? It is a great and difficult question, and it is daily becoming more and more difficult. What is to be done? Sir, that question ought not to be for me to answer. I, who have used every effort in my power to prevent this war, and after its commencement have done everything in my power to diminish the evil to the smallest possible amount. But I will not shrink from any responsibility, whether it properly belongs to me or not. After saying that I cannot support the course recommended by the Executive, I will proceed to state that which I would propose as the best to be pursued. Well, then, I will say that there is not the smallest chance of our disentangling ourselves from this Mexican concern which threatens us so much—there has not been, in my opinion, the smallest chance, from the commencement of the war until this time, but by taking a defensive line, doing that now which the President recommends should be done finally after the conquest, and taking indemnity into our own hands. To do this depends on our own volition, and not on the fleeting consent of Mexico. Sir, if time had been allowed to the Senate when the message of the President recommending war was before them, if time had been allowed to the Senate, I would have announced the course of policy which I thought right, but time was not permitted. My opinion was, that we should have simply voted Taylor the means of defending himself. That ought to have been done. There then should have been a solemn report from the proper committee, going into all the circumstances, showing that the republic of Mexico had not yet recognized these hostilities—recommending a provisional army to be directed to a proper point, giving time to the Mexican Congress and Mexican people to have considered whether they would avow or disavow the attacks upon us; and if no satisfaction were obtained, not to make war in this set form, but seize upon the portions of the country contiguous and most convenient to us, and then have assumed the defensive line. These are my views, but unfortunately, we were all acting here under an urgency without time to reflect. We were pushed on, and told, if you do not act to-day nothing can be done.

Well now, sir, as to where the defensive line should be at the present time, I do not presume to offer an opinion. I suggested a line at the last session. I am not prepared to say what would be the proper one at the present time, but I do say that we must vacate the central parts of Mexico. We must fall back, if you choose to use that word, or take a line that shall cover ample territory for indemnity.

For my part, I am not for charging Mexico with the whole expense of the war, but I would take ample territory, and hold it subject to negociation. Now, sir, I know it will be said that this will be as expensive as the war. I think I have said enough to show that that cannot be, that it will fall far short of it; but I will not repeat the argument. But admitting it should, admitting that by no means concludes the argument, for the sacrifice of men would be infinitely less, and, what is more important, you will thereby be able to disentangle yourselves. That is the only way by which it can be done. You are tied as a present to a corpse! My object is to get rid of it as soon as possible.

I look not to Mexico; I look to our own country and her institutions. I look to the liberty of this country and nothing else. Mr. President, if we but preserve our liberty by a proper course of moderation, acting justly towards our neighbor, and wisely in regard to ourselves—if we remain quiet, resting in an able and masterly inactivity, and let our destinies work out their own results, we shall do more for liberty, not only for ourselves but for the example of mankind, than can be done by a thousand victories.

Sir, I find I am becoming old; I almost feel that I live among strangers. If I have expressed anything that is uncongenial to the feelings of this body, put it down as proceeding from the old associations of thirty or thirty-five years ago, which are still clinging around me. Sir, this is not the first time that I have taken my stand against war. When General Jackson recommended letters of marque and reprisal against France, I arose alone in the Senate and remonstrated against such injustice. And, in point of fact, the treaty which was subsequently concluded with France, was ratified with the express understanding, which was known to our government when the treaty was formed, that it would require a vote of the Chambers on the part of France to sustain it, as it would require a vote to sustain it on the part of this country; and that they were no further responsible than to use their best efforts to obtain that vote. And yet, though it was acknowledged that the Executive of France had done all in his power to obtain that vote, we were nearly pushed into a war. Nothing but the interposition of Great Britain prevented it. As for myself, standing on this side of the Chamber, I raised my voice singly against it.

Mr. President, in my opinion all parties are interested in giving this matter the only direction that can be given to it with any prospect of a favorable result. Let me say to the friends of the administration, if you go on and some accident does not meet you, if you go on in the prosecution of this war from year to year, you will find that it will overthrow you. Do you not see that as far as the internal affairs of the government are concerned, you are reversing the policy of which you have heretofore professed to be the advocates. What party has been opposed to the re-creation of a great national debt? The democratic or republican party? Well, sir, this war is involving you in a greater debt than the opposite party could have done, perhaps, in any circumstances short of war. This very campaign, which you look upon so lightly, will be almost as great a charge upon the country as the debt of the revolution. What party has always been against the extension of the patronage of the Executive? Well, sir, you are doing more towards the extension of that patronage, and, above all, towards the continuance of that extension, than has been done under our government. Well, sir, what party professes to be most in favor of a metallic currency? And do you not see that as your treasury notes and stocks accumulate, you are in danger of being plunged again into the paper system to the utmost extent? What party has been always in favor of free trade? Do you not see that by accumulating charges and burdens upon the people by the debts which have now been contracted, that you never will, during your time, have an opportunity of making any considerable reduction in the tariff?

Sir, I know what is at the bottom of the course of policy which is recommended to be pursued. It is that pride of opinion to which we are all subject. No doubt it was thought that that course of policy would lead to the consequences which were contended for; but it has not. But, sir, the alternative is pressing. You will have but the choice between that and worse, in my opinion. It is magnanimous and honorable to retract when a course of policy which has been pursued turns out to be wrong. It would do great credit to the party in power to act now precisely as they would have acted if they had had all the lights of experience at the commencement of this war which they now have. It would be doing a high act of patriotism, to sacrifice their feelings of individual pride to the good of the country.

Now let me say that in asserting that a defensive line was the only alternative to the plan recommended by the President, I have put out of the question the course which most of you advocate—taking no indemnity of territory; because, I believe that the voice of the country has decided irrevocably against it; and that to keep it as the alternative would but render more certain the adoption of the policy recommended by the Executive and in consequence the conquest of the whole country. Let me say further, to my friends, on the other side of the Chamber, for I regard them as such—(it is our good fortune to differ in politics here, without permitting our personal feelings to be affected)—that they have contributed by their course to give the public opinion that strong and fixed determination, not to terminate the war without some suitable indemnity. I do not allude to your voting on the bill recognizing the existence of war between the republic of Mexico and the United States. No one knows better than myself, that you voted for the bill with the view of furnishing immediate relief to General Taylor and his army—and not in reference to the war—that you even protested and remonstrated against that interpretation being put upon your vote. But after the bill passed, and the war was authorized, most of you have continued to vote appropriations to prosecute the war with the object expressed of acquiring territory as an indemnity. Now, I must say, I cannot see how the two can be reconciled—how you vote to acquire territory can be justified, and a the same time your opposition to the acquisition of territory as means of indemnity, when it is acknowledged on all sides, that that is the only means by which it can be acquired. The people will find it had to believe that it was necessary to vote so much money for the purpose of getting territory for indemnity, which you intend to throw away when you get it! But, whatever may be the causes which have led to this state of public opinion, it has, beyond all doubt, decided against any conclusion of this war that does not involve territorial indemnity to some extent. Hence, I repeat the alternative whether this war shall go on and consummate itself, is between taking a defensive line and adopting the course pointed out by the Executive, and that the decision must be made now; for if it be passed over until another session, the end will be, I doubt not, the subjugation of the whole country, thereby involving us in all the difficulties and dangers which must result from it.

Now, I have delivered my opinion with that candor and frankness, which, I hope, become my position on this floor. I shall now propose nothing, but if I find that I can be supported in these my views, I will undertake to raise a committee to deliberate, after consulting with those officers who are now fortunately in this city, upon the best defensive line that can be taken. If it should be fortunately adopted, we may not get peace immediately; the war may continue for some years, but be that as it will, we will accomplish that all-important consideration, the extrication of ourselves and the country from this entanglement with Mexico.

Mr. SEVIER moved to lay the resolution upon the table.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded.

Mr. CALHOUN said he hoped the motion would be allowed to prevail. It was perfectly right in the present circumstances that the motion should prevail. He would take it as a personal favor that no opposition should be offered to it.

Mr. SEVIER observed that it was, of course, to be expected that this speech would be replied to; but he was desirous that this debate should be suspended for a time, in order to proceed with the consideration of the army bill.

The motion to lay on the table was then agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were opened, and

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1848.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE TREASURY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Treasurer of the United States, accompanied by accounts of receipt and disbursements for the Post Office Department for the year ending 30th June, 1847.

PETITIONS.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of the heirs of Moses White deceased, a revolutionary officer, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DICKINSON presented additional documents in relation to the removal of John Lorimer Graham; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ATCHISON presented the petition of the widow and legal representatives of Reuben Lassater, deceased, praying compensation for a slave shot by a party of volunteers in the service of the United States in the Seminole war; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SEVIER presented the petition of Albert Pike, praying that compensation may be made to a company of Arkansas cavalry, commanded by him, for horses lost or stolen while in the service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of Susan C. Randall, widow of Archibald Randall, late District Judge of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, praying compensation for services rendered by her late husband as Circuit Judge; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of William Woodbridge and Henry Chipman, late Judges of the United States, in the Territory of Michigan, praying compensation for services not incident to their judicial office, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DIX presented the petition of Mary M. Foot, widow of Lyman Foot, late a Surgeon in the army, praying that provision may be made for herself and family, in consequence of the death of her husband, while in the discharge of his duty in Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DIX presented the petition of Marvin W. Fisher, praying compensation for the use of his invention for charging percussion caps by the government, and the purchase of his patent right; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, presented additional documents relating to the petition of Hugh W. Dobbin; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DICKINSON presented the petition of citizens of the county of New Orleans, New York, praying that the franking privilege may be abolished, and that the rates of postage on newspapers be reduced; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

NOTICE OF BILLS.

Mr. ASHLEY gave notice, that on to-morrow, he should ask leave to introduce a bill to alter and amend the Judicial system of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, gave notice that on to-morrow he should ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the survey of the mouth of the Red River, in the State of Louisiana.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

[illegible]

COMMISSIONS TO AGENTS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. HUNTER asked, and obtained leave, to bring in a bill to authorize the payment of equitable commissions to the agents or attorneys of persons in whose favor awards have been made under three several treaties between the United States and certain foreign powers, which awards have been returned in the Treasury in payment of debts due to the United States; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MARTIN FENWICK, DECEASED.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, asked, and obtained leave, to bring in a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Martin Fenwick; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EMIGRANTS TO LIBERIA.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom had been referred the memorial of the American Colonization Society, reported a bill exempting vessels employed by the American Colonization Society in transporting colored emigrants from the United States to the coast of Africa, from the provisions of the acts of 22d February, and 2d of March, 1847, regulating the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

RICHARD S. COXE.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committe on the Judiciary, to whom had been referred the memorial of Richard S. Coxe, made a report upon the subject, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

REPEAL OF PILOT LAWS.

Mr. DIX, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom had been referred the bill to repeal the act of 2d March, 1837, entitled "An act concerning Pilots;" reported it without amendment.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE SAVANNAH RIVER.

Mr. DIX, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom had been referred the bill making an appropriation for removing obstructions in the Savannah river, reported it without amendment.

THOMAS N. WELSH.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas N. Welsh, submitted a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit the petition and other papers accompanying it, to the Secretary of War, with this report.

The Senate proceeded, by unanimous consent, to consider the said resolution; and the resolution was agreed to.

THE SHIP JAMES MITCHELL.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom had been referred the memorial of George Harvey, made a report thereon, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of George Harvey, agent for the owners and consignees of the English ship James Mitchell, ought not to be granted.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill making further provisions for surviving widows of the soldiers of the Revolution; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The President of the United States yesterday approved and signed the enrolled bill entitled "An act making appropriations to supply in part a deficiency in the appropriations for subsistence in kind of the army and volunteers during the year ending June 30, 1848."

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

The bill from the House of Representatives making further provisions for surviving widows of the soldiers of the Revolution, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THOMAS RHODES.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Thomas Rhodes was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

ASSISTANT PURSERS.

The bill to authorize the appointment of Assistant Pursers in the Navy, was passed by informally

PRIVATE BILLS.

The following bills were severally read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole:

Bill for the relief of Foxall A. Parker, of the United States Navy.

Bill for the relief of the heirs of Andrew D. Crosby.

Bill for the relief of William A. Christian.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, it was Ordered, That they severally lie on the table.

BOUNTY LAND WARRANTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to allow further time for satisfying claims for bounty lands for military services in the late war with great Britain, and for other purposes.

Mr. SEVIER said he hoped the Chairman of the Committee from which this bill was reported would explain the reason which existed for its passage. This was a rule which had been generally followed heretofore. The are, continued Mr. SEVIER, extensive tracts of land reserved for military bounty land, which land is exempted from taxation, much to the injury of the districts in which they lie. I think it is time that this system should be put an end to. There may be individual cases which are deserving of special legislation, but we ought to pause, I think, before we adopt any general law embracing a class of cases which have been already provided for, more especially when we all know that doubtful claims of thirty years' standing invariably grow stronger and better as they grow older.

Mr. BREESE.—This bill was introduced to the notice of the Senate by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, who is not now in his seat. It was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and received an attentive consideration. I apprehend that the honorable Senator from Arkansas is entirely mistaken as to the scope and object of the bill. This bill is intended to meet cases where parties holding land warrants have neglected to locate their claims. The law relating to such cases expired in July last, and persons who have applied since that time for their lands, have not been able to obtain them. There is no danger, as the gentleman supposes, in extending this law. We do not know the number of unlocated claims growing out of the revolution and the late war, and it is merely proposed to extend the law relating to them for five years longer. It is never too late to do justice.

Mr. SEVIER.—My honorable friend is entirely mistaken in regard to this bill. There are large tracts of land in his own State, and in Maine, which have been set apart to satisfy the claims of the soldiers of the last war. The names of the claimants are put into a box and drawn out consecutively, and the location is determined by such drawing. There are warrants, I admit, for revolutionary services, but warrants for services in the late war I have never heard of. A large portion of my State—millions of acres—have been set apart, as I have said, to satisfy these claims, and the claimants have had thirty years in which to bring them forward; there is no one who has not had his number assigned to him, and had his patent. I would like to know why, at this late day, after thirty years have elapsed, we are to be called upon to pass a law to give them five years longer, and for what purpose? Why, simply to have their locations determined by drawing, which has already been done. This is the whole purpose.

Mr. BREESE.—The Senator is in part correct in regard to claims for military services in the last war. Patents were issued. The soldiers had nothing to do with it. The whole matter was transacted in Washington city. But these are not such cases; these are cases of land warrants which have been omitted to be located under the act of 1812-'13. I have had numbers of these warrants sent to me from Illinois; but as this is a bill which has been introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, who is not now in his seat, and who takes great interest in it, I hope it will be passed over for the present.

Mr. SEVIER.—Only one word. If there have been land warrants granted under peculiar circumstances, I know nothing about them. All I have to say is, that if five years further are to be granted to the claimants, I suppose some good reasons can be given for it. I would like to hear them.

Mr. ALLEN.—I would inquire of the Senator from Illinois, whether there is a report from the Land Office upon this subject.

Mr. BREESE.—There is none.

Mr. ALLEN.—I would like, before I vote for this bill, to see a report setting forth the facts in the case. It is something new to my ears—entirely so.

The question being taken on the motion for postponement, it was agreed to.

WIDOWS' PENSIONS.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to continue the pensions of certain widows; and no amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. DAYTON.—May I ask the Chairman of the Committee on Pensions to state what this bill is?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana.—It is, sir, for the purpose of continuing the pensions of certain widows who are very old, and in distressed circumstances. I trust there will be no objection to its passage. The measure has been recommended from the War Department, and has received the unanimous concurrence of the Committee.

Mr. DAYTON.—What is the bill?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—It is the very same bill in substance as that from the House which was before the Senate a few minutes ago.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I was not aware of the fact, that they were the same until the circumstance was mentioned by the Senator from Florida. It would be more proper, perhaps, to take up that bill. I move, therefore, that this bill be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL VOLUNTEER FORCE.

The bill providing for the further prosecution of the existing war between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CASS said it was the disposition of the Military Committee that this bill should be deferred until the ten regiment bill should have been disposed of. He thought it better to go on with the discussion upon that bill, and let this be taken up after its passage. He, therefore, moved that it be laid upon the table; which motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM B. SLAUGHTER.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of William B. Slaughter, late Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I think that when this bill was up the other day, there was a slight misapprehension on the part of some Senators, in regard to the true state of the facts. I will detain the Senate for a moment in an exposition of what I understand to be the law and the facts in the case. By the act of 1792, it is provided that the official duties of the Secretary of any Territory shall be controlled by such laws as are in force in each territory. I understand this to be the law now in force, and applicable to the official duties of the Secretary, or which was in force at the time of this transaction. Mr. Slaughter was Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin, and as Secretary was required by law to be the disbursing officer, for the payment of moneys, for the necessary and incidental expenses of the Legislature of the Territory. The Secretary of the Treasury furnished him with a draft for $10,000, to pay these expenses. I have reason to suppose, in fact, I think the evidence will be satisfactory to the Senate, to show that the draft was deposited with Samuel B. Knapp, the Cashier of the Mineral Point Bank, under the authority and by the direction of the Legislature of the Territory. Search has been made for copies of the documents by which the deposit was authorized and directed, and they cannot be found at the present time. But I am confident that such is the fact, and I think that the statement of the Comptroller of the Treasury is conclusive on the point. After stating the fact to which I have referred, the Comptroller goes on to say, that the claim arises from his having deposited under the direction and by virtue of a resolution of the Legislature of the Territory, the money, &c. [Mr. DOUGLAS continued to read from the letter of the Comptroller, in corroboration of this point.] It will appear, therefore, by this statement, that Mr. Slaughter, being Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin, received this draft from the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of being applied to the payment of the expenses of the Territory; that he was required to be governed by the instructions and laws of the Legislature of the Territory; that the Legislature of the Territory instructed and directed him to make this deposite with Mr. Samuel B. Knapp, the Cashier; that he made the deposite in obedience to the directions of the Legislature, which he was bound to obey. And we have also a resolution here which was read the other day, passed by the Legislature, specifically approving of the act, and saying that he ought to be remunerated for the loss. If there can be any doubt upon this point, I can have read several letters showing the facts as they occurred. I have one from Mr. Dodge, Governor of the Territory, in which he states, that he informed the Secretary of the Treasury of the deposite. The deposite was made in a specie paying bank, a bank which was considered by every one to be perfectly safe. Mr. Slaughter made this deposite as he was required to do. The fact of the deposite having been made was reported to the Secretary of the Treasury here, who sanction the act by allowing the deposite to remain without being withdrawn, and Mr. Slaughter went out of office, leaving the money where it had been deposited under the instructions of the legislature, and with the knowledge, and, therefore, it is to be presumed, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury. The bank afterwards broke, and the money was lost. I think, under these circumstances, there cannot be any hesitation in authorizing the accounting officer of the treasury to settle this account upon principles of justice and equity. I do not deem it necessary to occupy any more of the time of the Senate in relation to a matter that is so clear as this.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I did not intend to say another word against the bill: but to let it pass, as, on examination of it I find it does not sanction the claim, but only directs its examination by the treasury officers, and payment, if they find it to be just and equitable. But the remarks of the Senator who has just taken his seat, makes it necessary to say a few words. The act of 1792 has no more to do with this call than a statute of Missouri. It is an old, obsolete act respecting the territories then (in 1792) existing north and northwest of the Ohio, and has expired twenty-five years ago. [Mr. W. here, at the request of Mr. BERRIEN, referred to the act.] The secretary of Wisconsin held his office under the act organizing the government of that territory, called the Organic Law, passed in 1836; and under that law he was expressly required to account to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for these funds. [Mr. W. here read part of the act of 1836.] Again, if I understand correctly, he was not ordered to deposite this money with the broken bank, by the legislature, before it failed; but after the bank broke, the legislature passed resolutions asking Congress to pay the money lost, &c. When he made this deposite also, if I am correct as to dates, the sub-treasury law of 1840 was in full force, forbidding such arrangements.

Mr. BUTLER.—It was entirely competent certainly for the committee to have allowed or disallowed the claim; but the view I take is this: that it is better to refer the matter to a safe and proper tribunal, than that a committee should assume the jurisdiction and decide peremptorily upon the case. I was entirely in favor of referring the claim to the officers of the treasury, for I have no reason to suppose, that under such reference any injustice will be done.

In reference to this claim, I do not see how the laws which have been referred to can have any bearing upon it. Then the only question is, whether Mr. Slaughter acted as a prudent man would have done? whether, at the time, and under all the circumstances, it was not to be regarded as a safe deposite? He acted as the legislature directed him, and it would be wrong, sir, to compel him to pay the money.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—One word in reply to the Senator from Florida. I am still under the impression, that the act of 1792 was intended to apply to the secretary of the territory. I was aware of the existence of the act of Congress to which the gentleman alluded. That act merely makes the secretary of the territory responsible to the Secretary of the Treasury, so far as regards the settlement of accounts, and that such settlement was to be made at the Treasury Department. It is true, that act also says, that the money shall be expended by the secretary of the territory, but was the secretary to expend this money according to his own discretion without control? Was he not to expend it according to law? My understanding is, that he was to expend it according to the law of the land. What was that law? Why, it was the law that was in force in the territory at the time the deposite was made. Such, sir, I have always understood to be the practice, not only in Wisconsin, but in Iowa, in the neighborhood of which I have lived for many years. I think, that the facts which I have already stated to the Senate, abundantly show that this officer acted in good faith as a prudent man should act. I think they show that he acted with great prudence and great caution—that there was no fault, no neglect on his part, and that it was in consequence of neglect elsewhere, that the money was lost. I think, therefore, as a matter of justice, if we were voting now, we ought to vote him the money. But the committee does not propose to appropriate the money, they only propose to say, to the accounting officers of the treasury—those officers who have been accustomed to settle the accounts of the treasury, from the commencement of the government—you are authorized to make this settlement upon principles of equity and justice. Sir, is it to be supposed that the officers of the Treasury Department would concurrently have tendered their request to Congress to do justice to this man, unless injustice had been done him? I think, sir, we ought to give them an opportunity to do him justice.

Mr. CASS.—I move that that bill be laid upon the table for the present.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I presume there will be no more discussion upon it.

Mr. CASS.—Then I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. BADGER and Mr. CAMERON rising simultaneously,

Mr. BADGER said: I think it due to the case to make a single observation.

Mr. CASS.—Will the Senator excuse me?

Mr. BADGER.—Certainly.

Mr. CASS.—The Senator from Pennsylvania intends to discuss the bill. I, therefore, move that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the following:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, should the exigencies of the war against Mexico in his opinion so require, to call for, and accept the services of additional volunteers, not exceeding fifty thousand, who may offer their services, either as cavalry, infantry, or riflemen, to serve three years after they shall have arrived at the general rendezvous, and to continue the largest to be raised and organized in the same manner as are provided for companies under existing laws, and to have the same pay, subsistence, and allowances, including land warrants, according to grades; and to be subject to the same regulations and to the rules and articles of war."

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That where companies of volunteers, which are now, or may hereafter be in service, shall become reduced in rank and file, the President be, and he is hereby authorized to discharge a part of the commissioned officers, leaving not more than three for sixty rank and file in the company, and not more than two for forty rank and file; and where the company shall be reduced below twenty rank and file, he may discharge the whole company, officers and men, and receive a new company of not less than eighty rank and file, in lieu of and discharged company: Provided, nothing herein contained shall require the President to reduce the officers, or to discharge a company, if, in his opinion, the reduced companies can be again filled up by recruits.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That where regiments of volunteers, which are now, or may hereafter be in service, shall become reduced the President be, and he is hereby authorized to receive additional companies of volunteers for such regiments: Provided, the additional companies, so received for any regiment, shall not increase its strength beyond one thousand rank and file.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the provision in the 21 section of the act entitled "An act to encourage enlistments in the regular army," approved January twelfth, eighteen hundred and forty-seven, be, and the same is hereby extended to include the recruits who may hereafter enlist for the first and second regiments of dragoons, and the regiment of mounted riflemen, and the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of volunteers, who may engage to serve during the war with Mexico, or for the term of three years, appointed by the act.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers, raised under this act, and whose term of service may not sooner expire, shall be discharged within six months after the ratification of a treaty of peace with Mexico.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said: I do not propose, on this occasion, to say more than will be barely necessary to explain the amendment which I have had the honor of offering to the bill now before you. The bill which is now under consideration for raising ten additional regiments, and the bill lying upon the table to succeed it, authorizing the President to accept the services of 20,000 volunteers, have severally been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of War, and are supposed to be necessary to meet the requirements and exigencies of the present war with Mexico. The bill now before you, sir, propose to raise 10,000 men, or ten additional regiments; and what I proposes is, to give to the government the necessary numerical force, only changing the form of its organization from a regular to a volunteer force. And, I desire to assign, very briefly, the reasons which have induced me to adopt this course.

The bill before you raising the ten regiments, places upon Congress the responsibility of declaring, that under the present existing circumstances, it is proper and necessary that this force should be raised. Is there any other power necessary to be given to the Senate of the United States? I think not, sir. We have from the Secretary of War a discussion of various plans upon which it has been suggested that this war ought to be prosecuted. The Secretary, in discussing them, recommends the plan which he prefers, viz., to hold all those portions of Mexico which are now in our possession; and in addition to the force which would be necessary to accomplish such a purpose, to have an active force raised, not with a view of marching upon the conquering the whole country, but with a view of being prepared to make occasional conquests, should circumstances require it. This is his plan. Now is an additional force necessary, I would ask, to accomplish the designs of the Secretary, taken even in their utmost latitude? This, sir, would be a question of a very indefinite character indeed, if by our experience it had not, in some degree, become a practical one. And what is our experience? What has been our experience in this war? and what have been the results of the war?

General Scott landed at Vera Cruz with a force of about twelve or thirteen thousand men, a considerable number of whom were volunteers. With this force he succeeded in taking the strong castle of San Juan de Ulloa and the city of Vera Cruz. Pressing forward with his victorious army, from Vera Cruz he entered the Capital, breaking in pieces and scattering to the winds with a force of less than 10,000 men, the armies of Mexico in his triumphant career. General Taylor, with a still smaller comparative force, at the battle of Buena Vista completely broke the power of Mexico, and so in every action would, no matter, sir, how disproportionate in number, the American troops have been victorious.—And, sir, with what a small amount of force these achievements have been accomplished!

General Scott, as I have already stated, fought all those distinguished battles before the city of Mexico, and took the capital of the country with less than 10,000 men; and General Taylor with not more than 6 or 7,000 men, the most of whom were volunteers, gained several distinguished victories. Indeed, General Taylor, with less than 4,000 men, beat Santa Anna with an army 20,000 strong, and that, too, not by a sudden surprise, not by a sudden burst of valor, not in a moment of enthusiasm on one side and panic on the other, but in a hard fought battle, continued from the rising to the setting of the sun, occupying, in fact, the whole of nearly two days. Thus, we see that not only are the sword and shield of Mexico broken and cast into the dust, but her government is dispersed and almost annihilated by our conquering army. She has no army, and scarcely can she be said to have a government; it consists of nothing more than disorganized factions. And if Mexico now lies prostrate before you, without an army or government—with here and there only a body of guerrillas, instead of an army to oppose you, what in the name of Heaven, if this is all that is left to her, do you want with 10,000 more troops? Sir, since these conquests have been achieved, what has been done? Our army now reposing on the Rio Grande consists of three or four thousand regulars. Nay, I will give the exact number, it consists of 3,937 regulars. At the battle of Buena Vista you had but 200 or 300 regulars, all the rest were volunteers. In place of that army less than 5000 strong, which constituted the force in that portion of the country upon that field of battle, you have now, sir, a force amounting in the whole to upwards of 10,000 men. Do you want any more there?

I have already stated the force with which General Scott obtained possession of the Capital. How is it with him now, sir? He has been receiving additional reinforcements almost daily since that time, and there is now at Tampico and Vera Cruz together a force amounting to 32,156 men—17,101 of whom are regulars, and the remainder 15,055, volunteers. These statements are extracts made from the report of the Adjutant General.

General Scott's army has been almost trebled in number since he gained those battles. His force is larger by 15,000 men than when he landed at Vera Cruz. It is this much stronger than at the time when he conquered the whole region of the country between Vera Cruz and the Capital—and cannot he hold this country with the same force with which he conquered it? How, upon the facts declared to us in official public document, can any argument be found to prove the necessity of sending any further troops there? General Scott took possession of the city with 6,000 men, and of that whole region of country with not more than 12,000; and now, when he has with him 32,000 men, what more can he require? Suppose it requires as many men to hold a country as it does to conquer it, has not General Scott already doubled the number of his force since he entered the Mexican territory? Make what deduction you please on account of casualties and disease—make a deduction of 5,000, and it leaves you 15,000 men for active service. Where, I ask, could 15,000 of such men as ours be employed? What fortress is there that will not open its gates at the sight of our banners? There is not one that will not. And yet we propose to add 30,000 men to the force already there. Sir, these facts lead my mind irresistibly to the conclusion that for any purpose of conquest even, it is not necessary to have more men in Mexico. If you have done what you have with that number of men—if they have accomplished such victories, surely you have a positive rule established by actual achievement, as to what your army can do.

Cannot double the number of force with which these victories have been gained conquer all Mexico? Why did you lead your armies from Vera Cruz to the Capital? Because there you expected to find the more vital part of the republic. Well, you have done all this, and still the cry is for more troops. You have had your forces doubled, and you want to double them again. If you press this bill, sir, what will then be the strength of your armies in Mexico? What number of men have you there now? I have shown you that under General Scott there are upwards of 32,000, and under General Wool upwards of 10,000 more, making an aggregate of 43,000 American soldiers now within the limits of Mexico.

I reckon only those who are in the heart of Mexico, leaving out those who are stationed in California and at other distant posts.—There are southward and westward of the Rio Grande from 42 to 43,000 American soldiers; and during this whole time the recruiting service is going on rapidly. Scarcely a week passes by in which reinforcements of troops are not being landed in Mexico. Now, there are 43,000 troops, as I have said, independently of what these bills propose; and the laws of the country now authorize the enlistment of some 8 or 9,000 more to fill up the ranks of your armies. There is also still a deficiency of upwards of 6,000 men in your volunteer service, which may at any time be supplied. This, then, is your state of preparation in Mexico! So far as the authority of law extends, these troops are at your command. Besides these, there is an addition yet to be made, by which your army will be still further increased. The regiment called for from the State of Michigan, has not yet appeared in the field; two other battalions, also, one from Alabama and the other from Mississippi, from some cause or other have not yet been mustered into the public service, and are not included in the calculation. These regiments, added to those which you have the legal authority to send, will make our force there about 60,000 strong. Add these ten regiments, and you will then have 70,000 American soldiers beyond the Rio Grande, exclusive of those distributed throughout the United States at various posts, and in California and New Mexico. Add, again, to this estimate, the number that is proposed to be raised by the other bill which has been reported to us, and you will have an army of from 90,000 to 100,000 men. Sir, can all these troops be necessary? Does not this estimate startle the ears of Senators? I confess, for one, that I have been greatly startled, while reading the reports from which I have gathered these statements, at the vast army which we are now maintaining. And, another more startling consideration which ought not to be forgotten or omitted is the enormous cost of every regiment. I am told by those who have entered into calculations on the subject, that the average cost of officers and men is nearly 1,000 dollars per man. This subject becomes, then, a matter of some consequence to us. Suppose our object be to conquer Mexico, and to incur no unnecessary expense, these ten regiments will add to our expenses nearly 10,000,000 dollars; no small item in the aggregate expenditures of such a contest. I think, therefore, for these reasons, that it is highly necessary for us to determine whether all these troops are to be raised, and all this cost incurred.

I am perfectly willing to meet every possible contingency of casualty or disease, but I confess I cannot foresee, at present, any contingency which will justify this increase. I am willing to authorize the President to call out whatever force he may require, under such contingency as may hereafter occur; but I would not authorize that force to be raised now. I am willing to lodge in the hands of the Executive the power, if an emergency demand it, to call out 30,000 additional men for the war; and I would have such force, consist of volunteers.

Now, are not volunteers as good, have they not proved themselves as efficient as regulars? Is not Buena Vista a bright and burning evidence of their efficiency in the field? They may be called out for the same period of service, and are entitled to a discharge under the same circumstances, and the difference in cost is great. I would substitute them, therefore, for these ten regiments of regulars; and, I would accordingly give power to the President to call out the 30,000 additional troops, in case circumstances require the adoption of such a course. In my view, there is no necessity for anything else than this to be done.

Gentlemen have appealed to the authority of information obtained from officers of the army. Why are they here, sir? Why are they here reposing in Washington and all parts of the country, if it is not that they are satisfied that the war has closed, that no more battles are to be fought, no more laurels to be won? They have given us ample evidence by the bravery which they have heretofore displayed, that they would not leave the field of their victories if they were not fully convinced that nothing more remained to be done. There is not one who does not believe that that the war is at an end. There may be a few skirmishes here and there with parties of guerillas, but so far as armies are concerned that will stand before American forces, they are never to be seen again in Mexico. This is the opinion of every officer I have spoken with, and it is also my opinion. From all the facts to be gathered from official reports, we can come but to one inevitable conclusion, viz: that their armies are broken to pieces; that the country is given over to the control of factions; and that they can no longer make head against us. You have now an army there of 43,000 men. They are capable of going where they please, and staying where they please, in all the wide domains of Mexico. I therefore, can see no necessity for a further increase of force at present, even if it were the conquest of the whole country that was contemplated; but when it is to limited assaults only to which it is proposed to confine this war, there appears still less necessity for such increased provision. It is with these views, and with no feeling of captiousness, from no spirit of opposition, and no disposition to scan the merits or conduct of this war, but simply taking it as it is, that I have been induced to offer the amendment which I have presented; whilst I question the propriety of any additional force being now added to our already large and increasing army in Mexico.

Mr. CASS then rose and remarked, that he wished to correct one or two errors into which the Senator from Kentucky had fallen; and having shown from the returns of the Adjutant General that the number of men under General Wool was only 6,700, and not 10,000, as had been stated by the Senator, he was interrupted by Mr. CRITTENDEN, who observed that he had fallen into an inaccuracy in summing up the forces under General Wool, on account of which he readily admitted a reduction of upwards of three thousand men, was to be made from the aggregate number, which he had stated.

Mr. CASS proceeded. The Senator had taken one position and eloquently supported it, on which he begged to differ with him. The Senator seemed to think that an additional force was entirely unnecessary, after the country had been conquered. But all experience showed they might gain a battle and get possession of a country without being able to retain it. Portugal and Spain were full of lessons upon this subject. To march to the capital of a country was one thing, and then to diffuse the forces over it, in various positions, in order to hold the people in subjection, was another and quite a different thing. Our armies in Mexico had gained a series of victories as brilliant in themselves as honorable to the national character. But they were now to break up as a mass, to spread themselves into various detachments, else it would be impossible to hold the Mexican people in obedience.

They would now be exposed to popular tumults, and liable to be cut down by detachments, and still the more, the further they would be compelled to march. Besides, it was important that the Mexican people should be convinced by the exhibition of our overwhelming force, that resistance was out of the question. What we wanted was to produce a moral effect upon the people of Mexico—to satisfy them of our strength, and their weakness, and to avoid fighting battles by showing them, that if fought, they would certainly be gained by us.

It was also important to note that the regiments now in the field, did not average more than eight hundred and fifty men to each, which was nearly three hundred short of the legal establishment. This bill would not give more than 7,500 men to the army. The calculation of the honorable Senator was based on the legal establishment. Now, no legal establishment can be kept full. The reports of the Adjutant General show, that there must be a deduction of more than one quarter, leaving the force on foot, less than three fourths of the legal establishment. This is the result of experience. It is not, probable, therefore, that the number of the regular army in Mexico, can be much, if at all, increased but by raising new corps, and establishing new recruiting rendezvous.

The honorable Senator in all his calculations looks to the numbers on the Statue book—not to the numbers on the returns. The continually recurring casualties of battle, of climate and of all the other circumstances which make war hazardous, are a perpetual drain, which keeps down the force far below the strength authorized by law.

With respect to the cost, the Senator or himself must be under a misapprehension. The cost of a regiment of Infantry was about $270,000 per annum. It was true that all incidental expenses might be charged upon the soldiers—bounty lands, Medical Staff, and Quartermaster's Staff. But the actual cost of each regiment of Infantry was the sum he had stated. A regiment of Dragoons, of which they had three, cost something like $700,000. If he understood the Senator from Kentucky aright, he proposed to raise 30,000 men at present, leaving it to the President to call out the rest when he pleased. So far as regarded himself, he [Mr. CASS] was perfectly willing that it should be left to the discretion of the President. But as he deprecated the Senator that all the force should be composed of volunteers, brought up the old question. He [Mr. CASS] had no disposition to do injustice to the volunteers. Far from it. No man had a higher opinion than he of the gallantry and efficiency of volunteers. But the address to the regular force which the bill proposed was entirely justified alike by experience, and the exigencies of the present time.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said that the Senator from Michigan had introduced rather a new principle, which made war more alarming than ever. It was this: that it would require a much greater military force to be kept in a subjected country, than had been required to conquer it. If the Senator said that there might be a sudden rising of the people, and they must be prepared at all times and everywhere, to suppress such hostilities. How many men would be required for that purpose? The gentleman had given them no information as to that. He had prescribed no rule, and there was no experience, military or civil, on such a subject. Now he [Mr. CRITTENDEN] thought that it was pretty reasonable to suppose that those who had gone into a country, prepared for forcible occupation, and had taken all its fortresses, and dispersed its armies were able to hold that dismantled country, and defy that conquered people. Had the Senator attempted to show that what was done by 12,000 men could not be repeated by 30,000? It was admitted that Scott had about 30,000 men beside the force which he had when he conquered and took the city of Mexico. Was there any pressing emergency now? What did the gentleman want? He was one of great intelligence and of no weight in that body—acquainted, as might be supposed, with the peculiar views of the Secretary of War; and what reason, it might then with propriety be asked, did he assign for this immediate increase of the forces in Mexico? What did he propose to do with them? Was there anything to be done for which the present force was not perfectly competent? Did they want to take Queretaro, the present seat of government? Did they want to go to San Luis Potosi?—to Zacatecas? Well, was there anywhere to which the forces now in Mexico could not go? He contended that they had proof in what had been already accomplished, that the forces now in Mexico were adequate to any emergency.

But the Senator from Michigan seemed to think that they ought not to be content till they had force enough to act by intimidation and terror. Well, how many men did that require? He believed that neither the great Frederick nor any other warrior of ancient times had shown an example of that amount of force, by which a people could be terrified into submission. They had beaten the Mexicans, when they were not terrified—they had conquered them in field after field—they had broken them into pieces like a potsherd—they had doubled their forces since that day, and yet they were told that they were not in safety unless they had more troops—more forces! It was not a military effect that the gentleman wished to accomplish, for he could not point out any military operation which could not be effected by the army now in Mexico. But the Senator wanted an army large enough to produce a great moral effect. A religious effect could hardly be expected, it was to be supposed in a Catholic country like Mexico by such means. It was a moral effect then that was intended, and to produce it, they were called upon to make this addition to the army. He (Mr. CRITTENDEN) could not consent to raise armies for such a purpose. He was willing to raise armies to fight battles, but not to produce a "moral effect." For all military purposes, they had ample forces now in Mexico. Yet, in order to meet any possible contingency, although he did not apprehend any danger, still he was willing to provide for any possibility of danger, and give to the President the power of calling out 30,000 volunteers, if in the exercise of his discretion they should be deemed necessary.

The Senator from Michigan seemed to think, though he was not very distinct on the subject, that these regulars were much better than so many troops enlisted for the same time, and called volunteers. Why? Both were raised in the same laws, engaged for the same terms of service, to one general object, perhaps, of the same materials. Why then were they to be regarded as better when called regulars, than when styled volunteers. Was there anything in the name?—not at all. The volunteers would be just as effective, as if they were called regulars. Their obligations to their country would be the same, and no sensible being could see a difference in relation thereto, in order service, or in their preparation. If the President were of opinion to-morrow that there was an exigency which demanded that he should be authorized to call 30,000 men, and no expenses would be incurred until they were mustered into the public service. But pass this bill for ten thousand regulars and there would be at once from five to six hundred officers under pay, and each of the men under pay, as fast as enlisted. Not so with volunteers.

Again, which description of force was most easily raised? The volunteers of course. There was something in the name of volunteer that appealed to the hearts of their free born countrymen, with a force much greater, than that which belonged to any argument or appeal employed by the officer recruiting for the regular army. If expedition was the object, the volunteer was undoubtedly the force which should be raised. The call on Kentucky for two regiments of volunteers was received there about the first of October, and the Governor, to give opportunity to those living in distant parts of the State to participate in the honor of serving the country, gave as long a period as possible for the rendezvous—about twenty days—and by the first of November, two full regiments embarked at Louisville for the seat of war. How long would it take, he asked, to enlist two regiments in Kentucky? Every other gentleman could easily turn to his own State and answer that question for himself. He did not believe that two regiments of regulars could be raised in two years in Kentucky. Yet two regiments of volunteers were filled within thirty days, and ten or a dozen captains went away with tears in their eyes, because there could not be assigned them places in the army. Such men went to the wars with spirit, courage and ambition. They had homes to which to return, and trusted to bring back good names. That was the feeling that sustained them and enabled them, with but little discipline, to accomplish every thing in the field. For all the reasons which he had urged, he therefore hoped that the amendment would be adopted in preference to the original bill.

He had already said that he had no captious spirit about this thing at all; and he had avoided any allusion to parties. He did not wish to revive the controversy about the war. The question before them did not require it. Supposing the war to be ever so just—their desires of conquest ever so unlimited—in his judgment they had already a force capable of accomplishing everything. He was therefore opposed to the additional expense, and the exposure of additional thousands of his countrymen to the dangers of that climate. Let the President have the power of calling for thirty regiments of volunteers, and he can have them immediately, if he believed that they were needed.

Mr. CASS said he had but one remark to make. The honorable Senator from Kentucky, with an emphasis not to be mistaken, talked about the moral effect to be produced by the presence of the army in Mexico. He (Mr. CASS) had used the term "moral effect," but he did not say an effect of morality. He did not wish to produce a moral effect, as contra-distinguished from the physical effect of their military operations. There was nothing at all in the remark to justify the little slur of the Senator, and surely it must have been apparent to all, that it was a great deal better to intimidate than to kill the Mexicans. The Senator had asked him how many troops were needed to produce that moral effect, and in reply, he could only say, that he intended to vote for the bill because it provided such an augmentation of the military force in Mexico as would be likely to produce that desirable effect. The Senator could hardly expect a statement of the force necessary to be given with mathematical precision.

Mr. CRITTENDEN only wished to know how the Senator would employ his additional force?

Mr. CASS said he would answer the Senator with a great deal of pleasure. They might suppose a case in which a nation might sit down, every man, woman and child to be killed. But it never has been so and never will be so in Mexico. The national obstinacy will stop at a point far short of this. He believed that they must occupy the posts which they had taken, and extend their lines of communication as far as necessary—the great roads to the east and to the west. There were other great positions also to be occupied. No man could point them out who was not well acquainted with the topography of their country. There were some positions that appeared very advantageous; among these would appear to be Queretaro, which stood at the junction of the joint line of communication between Northern and Western Mexico, and it would probably be difficult to open the communication between that region and country now held by us. As he remarked yesterday, the rich mineral region of Zacatecas and San Luis must also be taken and held. They must either withdraw or extend their operations, and remain inactive. The former course was out of the question, and the latter would leave an interminable war upon our hands. We must of necessity extend our operations—wisely indeed as circumstances might require, but rapidly as the amount of force would allow.

With respect to the remarks of the Senator with reference to the volunteers and regulars, he had only to say that he believed that a mixed force was by far the best. He believed that the regulars submitted better to wholesome discipline and restraint, than men who elected their own officers. The honorable Senator himself, knew the fact from his own experience. The enlisted soldier became a part of the army, part of a great machine, and the principal duty he had to learn was the duty of obedience. All this was known and felt by every man who became a recruit in the regular army. Not so with the volunteers. The honorable Senator here did not volunteer with any such state of feeling, nor indeed, could it be so from the composition of both officers and men. They were formed of the very best material our country afforded. They had gone into battle and had fought, he was about to say, as men never had fought before. They would do stern duty to the utmost, so long as they were kept in motion, and would do it with the more alacrity as the danger was the more pressing. But the moment they stopped, then a spirit of dissatisfaction would begin to spread, increasing the more, the longer they remained stationary. The duties of the camp and the post, of police and all the routine of stationary service, was irksome to them. And for the reason, they yielded more readily to the diseases of the climate than the regular soldiers. Every one knew, that the strict subordination in which the regular soldier was held, contributed essentially to the health and efficiency of the army.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he did not wish to continue the discussion—much less a controversy on the subject. He confessed that he did not yet understand exactly what the Senator meant by the moral effect which he intended to produce. Had the Senator ever sat down, and according to any rule of philosophy, calculated how many men with arms by their side, were necessary to produce the moral effect of which he spoke, or how many men with arms in their hands, were needed for the same purpose? Did he not see that if war was to be carried on, or military objects effected in that way, how completely they were under the moral influence of the Mexicans? There they were 10 or 15,000 strong, in the heart of Mexico with ten millions of people. Mexico had, therefore, 100,000 to one, and, therefore, in order to counteract the "moral effect," if mere numbers produced it, it must be necessary for the United States to send nine or ten millions to Mexico. It would certainly be necessary to do that in order to counteract the moral influence of the present overwhelming number of Mexicans! No, it was not mere numbers that produced 'moral effect.' It was the battles of Bucna Vista, Chapultepec, Contreras, and Churubusco. These were the great witnesses which produced effects—witnesses of the power of one party, the subjugation and conquest of the other. It was the arms of the United States that had produced the moral effect. They had prostrated Mexico. She felt it and knew it. She was now nothing but a huge, indigested mass of vanity and faction. Her armies had been scattered—her authorities broken to pieces, and it was to protect themselves in the midst of such a people as that, that 30,000 men were pronounced insufficient, needing a reinforcement of 10,000 regulars and 20,000 volunteers. The law at present gave the privilege of recruiting 8,600 men for the regular army. When these men were raised where would be the necessity for more? Would they recruit more than that number in the course of the present year? They did recruit a few more during the last year—11,000 men. But in six months was it likely that any more would be recruited by two sets of recruiting officers at the same places?

Mr. CASS.—The Senator had asked if more could be raised by two sets of recruiting officers in the same places. But it was not intended to send the two sets to the same places.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, then said: It is not my purpose at this time to go into a discussion of the ten regiment bill, but to address myself especially to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. I have been surprised at the introduction of that amendment. I certainly did not expect it.

The gentleman has not anticipated the ground upon which I would oppose the substitution of that amendment for the bill. He seems to rest it on the supposition that we are to oppose the substitution of volunteers for regulars, because regulars are better than volunteers. I take no such ground, and fortunately stand in an attitude in which I can have no prejudices for one or the other, having served with both. But, sir, the question lies deeper and far beyond the mere availability of the one over the other. And I would say to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, who has seen service, that if he will revert to the period when he returned from his campaign, and met the aged patriot, who wrung his hand and enquired for his son who had died on the field of battle—when he met the mother who with tears streaming down her cheeks, put to him the same question, he will at once say, however necessary it may be to call forth the chivalry of the country to fight its great battles, let us not send such men, to be wasted in the mere duties of the sentinel, by the attacks of disease and an unfriendly climate, whilst engaged in a service where neither patriotism is elicited nor glory to be won. If this country were invaded, I would turn to the great body of the militia—for I use the terms "volunteers" and "militia" as synonimous—for its defence. But when we carry on a foreign war, and especially when defensive operations merely are carried on, we have reached a point where regulars are the force which should be employed in the nice routine of the service, in which the duties are not sufficiently important to justify that disruption of society—that injury to the commercial interests of the country, which would result from bringing out men of that high class, which the honorable Senator from Kentucky has correctly said constitutes the great body of the volunteers. There is a great difference in the material of the volunteers and the regular force. There is an enthusiasm that speeds over every neighborhood when the call for volunteers goes forth. When Kentucky is called on to send her regiment, and every county its company, an enthusiasm burns out every where, and the State pours forth its best material—material too good for common use.

The gentleman inquires why is it that we prefer regulars? I will answer: we prefer regulars, first, because they are cheaper; secondly, because they can be maintained in better discipline. They will maintain a better state of police. They will be healthier, and, therefore, more effective in proportion to their numbers, for mere garrison duties. As long as you keep the high-bred gentlemen for the battle, they will bear any privation, submit to every restraint, and discharge to the utmost every duty. But do you expect that those men, who have broken all the endearing ties of home in order to fight their country's battles, will sacrifice themselves to the mere duties of the sentinel—will be content with the performance of the police of a garrison? Will they be suited better for the one, or as well for the other, as men of a lower grade in society, and more accustomed to such duties?

But the gentleman has made an argument which I regard as more congenial to his feelings. He has alluded to the gallantry of the army, and the battles won by small forces, affording evidence against the necessity of this increase of our force. But it is one thing to beat the enemy and another to hold him in subjection, and the argument of the honorable Senator, which rests upon the supposition that Mexico is conquered, I hold to be by no means indisputable. Is Mexico conquered? Is any part of it conquered? Conquest, as laid down by some writers, is of three kinds. Ruin is one of these kinds of conquest; but we have not ruined Mexico, and God forbid we ever should! The moral feeling of this country would never justify such a course. Another mode of conquest is to hold a country by controlling its government. That is not suited to the genius of our country. We send no pro-consul abroad—no provincial army to direct the government of the country. We recognize as the great basis of all institutions, self-government. The other mode of conquest is by colonizing a country. We cannot do that. In neither of these modes, then, have we conquered Mexico. We have not even suppressed the hostility of the Mexican people. I hazard the assertion that there is more hostility against us in Mexico now, than there was at the beginning of the war. Mexico is not conquered.

But the honorable Senator asks, how will you employ this large force? Not to take cities. Not to fight battles. And I agree with him that our army could now march through all South America and defeat every enemy. But we want this force to hold towns and posts in Mexico—to convince the Mexicans that resistance is idle, and beyond all this, to afford protection to all the citizens of Mexico, who are ready to recognize our authority and give us supplies. These are some of the great objects to be obtained. To effect them large bodies of men will be needed. We must garrison our posts with forces adequate to make a sortie, if necessary, and not be shut up when any partizan chief chooses to come and sit down before their gates.

Again, the army of General Scott, which achieved such victories before the city of Mexico, did it at a heavy sacrifice of blood, and that resulted from the want of force. The length of their lines was far inferior to that of the enemy's. Our gallant men fell under the converging fire of the foe, and therefore their blood was spilled like water. American courage, the skill of the officers, and the science of our incomparable staff, achieved those victories, and God forbid that they should ever be tested again at such a fearful sacrifice. But that army in its present state is not combined, whilst there are many posts without a garrison, which we ought to hold.

Then, again, the resources of Mexico must contribute to the support of that army. We cannot afford to keep down anarchy in Mexico at the expense of our treasury. We must not depend on the petty amount of property that might be wrung from the poor rancheros. Such a thing has never been contemplated by our government, nor practised by our officers. In Zacatecas you can have possession of the mint. In Potosi are the richest mines in Mexico; and if, as has been stated, the annual produce of these mines amounts to nearly twenty-five millions, and we claim the revenue which the Mexican government extracted from mining operations, and by protecting the entrance of goods into the country, furnish a new source of revenue from the duties on imposts, then we have something to support our armies, without touching private property, and the expenses of the war are borne by Mexico herself.

The object now is, not to prepare to fight a battle, but to prevent a battle. The great object now is, to allow the ability which yet remains in Mexico, to establish federal government on republican principles, to exert itself. We have taught Mexico salutary lessons. We have convinced them that they are not what they supposed they were, and I hope it will not excite a laugh when I mention that supposition to have been that they were the greatest military power on the continent. For it was not until after the battle of Buena Vista that they began to doubt it. Let us now give them an opportunity to create a government somewhat stable, and capable of adhering to its obligations. I reject the idea of taking her federal government under our protection, as altogether impracticable; and because it would certainly tend to render it odious to the people. Our policy should be directed by the purest reason and most patriotic motives to that end which will hasten a peace and leave Mexico the power to erect again her nationality.

If I believed that this additional force were unnecessary, I should vote against the bill. If I believed that regulars were not better calculated to occupy garrisons, and that the gallantry of our volunteers in the field should decide this question, I would vote against it. But I believe the force to be necessary, and that these regulars are the proper force. The Senator from Kentucky spoke of giving a discretionary power to the President to call out 30,000 volunteers. Well, I doubt not the wisdom of the Executive—I doubt not his nerve to encounter that responsibility. I would be quite willing to make him responsible, and to rely upon the good feelings, patriotism and intelligence of the country, to sustain him in calling out these men for the present purpose, and still further for the ultimate object, when the forces may be reduced, of recalling the volunteers, now making sacrifices beyond the duty which they undertook to perform. And at this moment, sir, the honorable Senator from South Carolina, before me, recalls to my mind, appropriately, in this connection, the fact that the regiment which has covered the Palmetto with laurels and cypress, now numbers only about one hundred and fifty fit for active service. I would recall that regiment at once. I would return its members to their social and commercial duties, and substitute for them a regular regiment, equally able to perform, at all events, the duties they have now to discharge.

I did not rise for the purpose of making any extended remarks, and have been led to say more than I intended. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. CALHOUN said that there were two or three points of difficulty still unexplained in answering the objection to the bill. If he understood aright the Senator from Kentucky, during the period of the last fifteen months not more than about eleven thousand recruits had been enlisted.

Mr. CASS here interposed and said that the Senator from Kentucky was in error. More than twenty thousand had been enlisted in the course of little more than a year.

Mr. CRITTENDEN referred to the report of the Adjutant General, to show that the number was but little over eleven thousand.

Mr. CASS explained that that was exclusive of the new regiments which had been raised.

Mr. CALHOUN continued:—He would, then, assume the number stated by the Chairman of the Military Committee. If only twenty thousand men were raised during the last year, it was very evident that in the present state of the market—for the recruiting had taken up a great deal of the loose portions of society disposed to enlist—it would be very difficult, indeed, to raise, during the present year, the men necessary to fill these additional ten regiments. Well, they had been told that this additional force was required immediately, when, in all probability, with the strongest recruiting force, it could not be obtained in less than six or eight months after the passage of the bill, allowing the greatest success. Yet they had been emphatically told that this force was so immediately necessary, that not a day could be allowed here for debate. He did not doubt that regulars were the best description of force. He wished to know if the eight thousand included the entire deficit.

Mr. CASS replied that the general deficiency amounted to eight thousand men.

Mr. CALHOUN.—That, added to the ten regiments would make 18,000 or 20,000 to be raised. Then the defect must be in the recruiting service. Eight thousand was very near the number which it was proposed to raise by this bill, and yet a deficit to that extent existed in the present force. The remedy seemed to be in the creation of a sufficient number of recruiting officers—not of generals, nor colonels, not of officers of the higher grades, but of officers suited for that service.

This business of war was a serious one. War created the means of its own continuance. It called into being mighty influences which were interested in carrying it on; and few nations ever terminated war so long as they possessed the means of carrying it on. A single regiment could not be raised without the creation of new interests in favor of the war. If these views were correct, the cheaper plan would be to strengthen the recruiting service, rather than create additional regiments, officers and all. The volunteers, if their services were needed, could be called out at once. The spirit and gallantry which characterized the people was not yet exhausted, notwithstanding the disasters of the war as far as deaths were concerned, and all the regiments had been thinned to an extraordinary extent. He presumed that the mortality had not been less than twenty per cent. Yet recruits, he had no doubt could be still had plentifully. If, then, the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs wanted an immediate augmentation of the military force, he should ask for volunteers.

He (Mr. C.) was glad to perceive that the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. DAVIS,) was not averse to a defensive line at the proper time. In his (Mr. C.'s) opinion, the present was the proper time. In view of that policy he would prefer regulars to volunteers. He objected, though, to regulars, because that force gave greatly increased patronage, and greatly added influence to the support of the war. He knew not how other gentlemen felt; but as for himself, he was convinced that the patronage of this government had gone beyond all bounds, and already exercised a most dangerous control over the deliberations of Congress. He felt the awkwardness of his position. He was utterly averse to pursuing this war for any view yet presented, even taking the strong view presented by the Senator from Mississippi. He put it to that gentleman—was there any certainty of peace? and if not, where would the country stand? That was the question. It would be in a position worse than ever! Every step they took only plunged them deeper and deeper into difficulty. If his memory served him, the Secretary of the War Department stated 70,000 men as adequate to conquer and hold in subjection all Mexico. Was that not the view of the Secretary? He could not at the moment lay his hand on the Report of the War Department, but if he had not correctly stated the views of the Secretary, any Senator could set the matter right. The Secretary then disavowed the plan of entire subjugation. The Executive disavowed it; and yet a force, according to the Senator from Kentucky, of ninety or one hundred thousand men was demanded. He could not believe that it was the intention of the Executive, because it had been again and again disavowed. But when he saw such a force asked for in the report of the Secretary; when he saw in the President's message the declaration which he had quoted yesterday, to the effect that he himself believed that, unless in a certain contingency, they must take possession of the country, and take the measure of indemnity into our own hands; he could not but think that there was a strong impression on all sides that the end would be to conquer and hold Mexico.

If they could have the question first submitted to the deliberative consideration of that body, and it were decided what was to be the proper course of conducting this war; if it were known whether they were to go on, or take a defensive line, they would then act understandingly. But voting and voting, without knowing what was ultimately to be done, threw him, and, he believed, every member of the Senate, into a state of great difficulty to determine how to vote.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. CRITTENDEN, and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Dayton, Greene, Hale, Mangum, Miller, Pearce, Phelps, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Webster—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Bradbury, Breese, Butler, Cameron, Cass, Davis of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Dawns, Felch, Foote, Hannegan, Hunter, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Mason, Rusk, Sevier, Simpson, Turney, Westcott—29.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Md., moved to amend the bill by inserting in the fifth line of the first section, after the word "President," the words, "if, in his opinion, the exigencies of the war require such a further increase of force."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

The amendment having been concurred in, the question was upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

It was suggested that the bill might be ordered to be engrossed, and the question on its passage deferred until to-morrow.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

On motion

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 6, 1848.

Mr. TURNEY presented the credentials of the HON. DIXON H. LEWIS, elected a Senator of the United States, from the State of Alabama, for the term of six years from the 8th day of March 1847.

Mr. LEWIS having taken the oath of office, which was administered to him at the hands of the Vice President, took his seat in the Senate.

REPORTS FROM DEPARTMENTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Post Master General, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senator, in relation to the claim of Jamison and Williamson.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, made agreeably to law, showing the number and compensation of clerks in the Department of State; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, transmitting the military reports which have been received by him from the Commander of our Army in Mexico since the transmission of his annual report.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, made agreeably to law, showing the operations, expenditures and condition of the Institution.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That it be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of citizens of Ohio, praying a reduction of the rates of postage and the discontinuance of the franking privilege; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of citizens of Ross county, Ohio, praying the adoption of measures for the immediate termination of the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALLEN presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Ohio, in favor of the passage of an act granting a pension to Henry Johnson, of that State, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DICKINSON submitted documents relating to the claim of the legal representatives of Jethro Wood, deceased, to an extension of their patent for an improvement in the plough; which, with their petition on the files of the Senate, were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of Patrick Marantette, praying compensation for provisions and merchandize furnished to the Pottawattamie Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CORWIN presented the memorial of the New-Garden Monthly Meeting of Friends in the county of Chester, Pennsylvania, praying the adoption of peaceful measures for terminating the war with Mexico; that slavery may not be tolerated in any territory which may be acquired from that republic; and the adoption of measures for establishing a tribunal for the peaceful settlement of national disputes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I would call the attention of the Senate to the fact, that at the last session we refused to print memorials of this description.

Mr. CORWIN.—I do not remember what the action of the Senate has been on the subject of memorials from the Society of Friends. I think the Senator from Florida is mistaken, when he says that the Senate refused to print memorials asking the attention of the Senate to the subject of the establishment of some tribunal for the subject of national questions. I did not know that he Senate had refused to print such memorials; nor do I believe hat any objection has ever been made to their reception or reference to a committee. I think the Senator from Florida will find that he is mistaken. The paper which I had the honor to present, is very brief, and the cost of printing will, therefore, be very small; and as I rarely trouble the Senate with anything of the sort, I hope this memorial will be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I understand the general rule to be, that petitions of this character are not allowed to be printed without some special reason therefor.

Mr. SEVIER.—Does this petition ask the action of Congress?

Mr. CORWIN.—It does.

Mr. SEVIER.—I move then, that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CORWIN.—I have made that motion already.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The question is on the motion to print.

Mr. SEVIER.—It appears to me it is entirely unnecessary to print this document until we have a report upon it. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio, that printing is somewhat expensive, and we have not a great deal of money to waste. If we open the door to printing of petitions of this sort we shall incur a very serious expense.

Mr. CORWIN.—If it is reduced to a question of economy, I shall be compelled to withdraw my motion to print, and content myself with the reference.

The petition was referred.

Mr. ATCHISON submitted documents in relation to the claim of Margueretta Reneau, praying compensation for a section of land, reserved to her under the treaty of 1825; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. YULEE presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of Florida, in favor of the passage of an act to authorize the reimbursement of the expenses incurred by the Florida Volunteers previous to being mustered into the service of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, in favor of the establishment of a branch mint at Charleston, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, it was Ordered, That the petition of Joseph De la Francia, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. CORWIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of the representatives of Moses Shepherd, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

On motion by Mr. BRADBURY, it was Ordered, That the petition of William Miller, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. BRADBURY, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of William Frost, and the petition of the heirs of Nathaniel Leavett, on the files of the Senate, be severally referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the petition of John M. McIntosh, assignee of John Clute and Jacob Hart, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was Ordered, That William H. Hildreth have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

EDITORS OF THE UNION.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution for consideration:

[illegible] Journal of the Last session, and that Washington and other navy yards, except the Gosport navy yard, be added to the list, and to the floor of the Senate, which is now extended to other navy yards, being the exhibits.

DRY DOCK.

On motion of Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the message of the President of the United States of the 23d December, 1842, with the report of the Secretary of the Navy accompanying the same, and the communications and papers on file relating to the Dry Docks at Pensacola, Philadelphia, and Kittery, be printed for the use of the Senate.

CLAIMS UNDER THE TREATY WITH MEXICO.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a resolution providing for the payment of certain claims under the treaty between the United States and Mexico of April 4, 1839, which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

SURVEY OF THE MOUTH OF RED RIVER.

Accordingly to notice, Mr. JOHNSON, of La. asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for a survey of the mouth of Red River, in the State of Louisiana, which was read the first and second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PRINTING.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee on Printing, who were instructed, by a resolution of the Senate, to inquire and report what number of the copies of the President's message, with documents, and of the reports of the Secretaries and the Postmaster General, with documents, have been furnished for the use of the Senate, and when the said copies may be furnished by the said printers," submitted a report accompanied by a communication from the Printers of Congress on the subject.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a resolution authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, of a monument to George Washington, reported it without amendment.

ASSISTANT PURSERS.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill providing for the appointment of Assistant Pursers in the Navy.

Mr. BADGER moved to amend the bill by striking out the words "by warrant," and inserting "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." The station was an important one, and he thought it better that they should be commissioned officers, as it would secure the services of a better class of persons than if they were warrant officers.

Mr. YULEE observed that he desired to offer an amendment to the bill, and to enable him to obtain some information before doing so, he moved to lay the bill upon the table. The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

On motion, it was

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next.

BOUNTY LAND CLAIMS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to allow further time for satisfying claims for bounty lands for military services in the late war with Great Britain, and for other purposes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I was not in my seat when the motion was made the other day for the postponement of this bill; but I have been informed of the objections that were made to the bill, and I rise for the purpose of obviating them. I understand that my friend over the way doubted whether warrants for bounty lands to soldiers in the late war with Great Britain, are in existence. My information on this subject is based not only upon the statutes, but upon the statements of the Commissioner of Pensions, and the Commissioner of the Land Office. The bill upon your table is but a transcript of former laws upon the subject. The provisions of the general law were renewed in 1842 and continued for five years, and that act consequently expired in the past year. [He read from the act and also from communications received from the Commissioner of Pensions, and the Commissioner of the Land Office.] Now, he continued, all that the bill on your table proposes to do, is to prevent the statue of limitations from applying against the soldiers of the late war, and to grant them an additional five years for producing satisfactory proof of their claims and receiving lands.

Mr. SEVIER repeated his objections to the passage of the bill. Pass such a law as this, he said, and no man knows how many old claims will be brought forward, which have been heretofore rejected by Congress. I believe we have already paid more land claims for military services than we even had troops in the field. I hope, at least, that some data will be procured from the Land Office, to show how many claims are yet outstanding. This bill, I suppose, is to pay all the old Virginia claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I will say to my friend over the way, that I have no objection whatever to procure all the information which he seems desirous of examining before voting upon the bill, but I take occasion now to correct a mistake into which he has, no doubt, unintentionally, fallen. He said that the provisions of this bill, he supposed, would satisfy all the Virginia claims. That is a mistake. Virginia had two regiments in the revolution—a State regiment, and a Continental regiment. As far as the Continental regiment was concerned, they were to receive lands at the hands of this government, but so far as the State line of Virginia troops are concerned, there is no provision made for them here.

Mr. RUSK.—I have the information which is desired by the Senator from Arkansas in a letter from the Commissioner on Pensions.

The letter was read.

On motion of Mr. CASS, the bill was laid upon the table for the purpose of proceeding with the special order of the day.

ENLISTMENT OF VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. BADGER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to promote the filling up of vacancies in the volunteer corps now in the service of the United States, which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, moved to amend the bill so as to extend its provision to the first and second regiment of dragoons, and the regiment of mounted riflemen, in addition to the volunteer regiments; which was agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendment concurred in.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force, was read a third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. HALE said: Feeling compelled from my convictions of duty to take a course in reference to this bill, in which I am aware very few Senators will entirely coincide, I have thought, humble as is the sphere in which I move, that it was due to those who placed me in the position I occupy, to let my vote upon the bill go out accompanied with the reasons which have induced me to take the course which I am about to take. I would have been glad if older and abler Senators had favored the Senate with their views in opposition to this bill. I would have been glad if the action of the Senate upon the bill had been delayed until the documents coming from the several departments, and which we are well nigh getting, had been placed before us, so that we might have had all the light that could be thrown upon that, which in my mind, is a dark subject at the highest; but seeing that the bill is likely to go through the forms of legislation, and become a law without having those lights before us, I have thought it necessary to trespass briefly upon the time of the Senate, in order to express the views which I entertain. It may be said that I do not stand much in need of light, because I have already declared that I stand here prepared to vote against the war in all its forms; against any measures for the supply of troops, either regulars or volunteers, (and if there are any other kind.) I go against them.) because I stand prepared to vote against the appropriation of a single dollar beyond the simple amount—as I have before suggested—which will be sufficient to bring home your troops by the shortest and cheapest route. Entertaining these views, before entering upon the discussion of the bill, I want to say a word in regard to a sentiment which I have heard avowed here, and elsewhere, and it is—that when the country is engaged in war we lose all discretion, we have nothing to do but grant the supplies that are demanded of us—an appeal being made to our patriotism—patriotism can only find rightful action in a support of the war—that there is no patriotism anywhere else, and that the administration, which has been so fortunate as to plunge the country into a war, has only to appeal to the country, and expect to receive no other response except hearty and unanimous support. And this doctrine has been carried so far, and in such high places, that the President of the United States has denounced as treason, the opposition of Congress, although his mode of prosecuting the war did not accord with their convictions. I recollect but one incident in my reading of history which is analogous. It is stated by an English historian, that when Queen Elizabeth had summoned her Parliament, and they were about to organize for business, she sent her messenger to them with this royal mandate; she told them to be very careful that they did not meddle with affairs of State, "because," said she, "such things are altogether beyond the compass of your narrow understanding." Well, our royal President did not follow exactly in the footsteps of Elizabeth. He did not question the understanding of Congress, but their patriotism. Now, let us see where this doctrine will carry us. Let us see to what it will lead. Suppose you should have an exceedingly bad and corrupt administration—mind, I do not say that this is such an administration, or that we are ever likely to have such an one. But suppose that such a thing were possible, and that the measures of the President had become exceedingly odious, oppressive, burdensome, and intolerable, and that notes of disapprobation were beginning to be heard from the people assembled in their primary meetings; that the tones of indignation at last penetrate the walls of the palace, and the President, finding that he could not stand against the united will of an injured people, what has he to do? Ought he to desist in his course of wrong-doing, or to retrace his steps? No, sir, this is not the path to popularity; according to his new school of ethics and morals, he has only to go on and plunge the country into war, and, if he can manage so skilfully, as to involve the country into two wars at once, so much the better—there is the more glory for him; a popularity greater than that of a Washington, or a Jackson. This is the inference, the plain and unmistakable inference. War, instead of being, as it is said to be by all writers on ethics or politics, the direst calamity which Heaven in its wrath can send upon a nation, is converted by this alchemy into a healing Bethseda, in which political profligacy and corruption of the darkest hue may wash itself and be clean. Sir, I utterly deny the soundness of this doctrine, that Congress ought to have no voice beyond granting the supplies. If there ever is a time when opposition should be vigilant, scrupulous, watchful, noticing everything that is wrong, it is at a time when, through the acts of the administration, the country is burdened with an unnecessary war. When the fruits of industry are consumed for the support of such war, and when we are surrounded by all the horrors which war brings in its train. If there ever is a time that should put men upon their individual judgment, reflection, and responsibility, it is such a time; and such is our position now, and we are there by the unadvised, unconstitutional, and illegal acts of the President. I propose, I say, to do what I may, feeble as it may be, to place the country right. I have never learned in that school of moral or political science that by persevering in an unconstitutional and wrong course, we shall ever come out right.

And, sir, there is another view that is sometimes taken, which certainly does not accord with my own convictions, and upon which I wish to say a word or two at this time, (and I do it with deference to the opinions of abler men about me,) and which relates to the course those should take who believe the war to be wrong, radically wrong. Why, I think I have heard an idea something like this:—The country is engaged in a war which is unjustifiable—we confess it is wrong to go on, we see clearly it is wrong—nevertheless we are now at war; and the President calls on us for supplies of men and money, and Senators say they will vote men and money; but by some sort of a process which escapes my comprehension, they imagine they are going to throw the responsibility on the President. I confess I do not understand how they are to escape from their due share of responsibility, they must share the responsibility with the President, let the character of the act be what it may. If the war be wrong, put an end to it at once. I have no doubt the President will be exceedingly gratified with opposition of this kind. You will hear nothing about a factious opposition in the organ of the administration. The President would care little for the opposition of the whole world if it were an opposition of this kind. It is very like Sam Weller, who happened to find himself in prison, and a person whom he met was bewailing the misfortune of having a thousand pounds left to him by will, which circumstance had been the occasion of his imprisonment. "I wish," exclaimed Sam, "all my enemies would try to ruin me in that way." Just so with the President. You tell him he is wrong, while at the same time you vote him all the men and money that he asks you for.

Believing that the cause of this war is radically wrong, I hold it to be the first, the plainest, and the simplest duty of those who think as I do, to withhold supplies and compel the President to do what we believe to be right. Believing there is a strict and pertinent analogy between the course to be pursued by Congress, and that which is taken by the British Parliament, I consider that the course of those who think the war wrong, is plain and clear, and admits of no mistake. Upon a question of voting supplies, I think the very first thing to be inquired into by Congress, is, whether the object for which the supplies are demanded is a correct and legitimate object? If it be determined that the object is a proper one, let the supplies be granted; if otherwise, withhold them.—This is my understanding of the nature of our Constitution. I have heard our government spoken of as a government of checks and balances, but when you speak of the President having the power to make war unconstitutionally and illegally, I cannot understand the cause or propriety of that course of conduct which would sustain him in his unconstitutional act.

Believing, then, that the question of this war is a question which ought to be discussed; that it lies at the very bottom of the question of supplies, I will proceed to give my views to the Senate and the country, of this war. And, as I suggested the other day, in the few remarks which I had the honor to submit, I believe that the cause of the war lies a little deeper than any that has been assigned by those who have expressed their opinions upon the subject. I believe that the question, whether it arose from the march of General Taylor to the Rio Grande, or whether any of those incidental and temporary movements were the immediate cause of the war, is entirely irrelevant. The cause, sir, lies deeper than any of these; and when I speak of the causes of the war, permit me to say, that I do it with no desire to introduce exciting or angry discussion, or to arouse unpleasant feeling; but having a duty to perform here, I must do it fearlessly—I must do my duty as an American Senator, feeble as it may be. And when we speak of the causes of this war, I must avow my conviction, beyond a cavil or a doubt, to be, that it lies in the avowed policy of the American Government—a policy which was avowed four years ago—to make the extension of human slavery one of its primary motives of action. And when I say this, let me be understood. I refer to the principle avowed in the diplomatic correspondence which preceded the annexation of Texas to the United States. And permit me to say, that in approaching this question, I do it with a desire and a disposition to do full justice to the officers of this government who were engaged in that correspondence. I will do them the justice to say, that what they did, they did manfully and above board. There was no concealment. They came out boldly. Their course was very different from that of a set of men we have among us, called Northern men with Southern principles—men who profess to be against slavery, but who are nevertheless enlisted in the slaveholding interest, ready to do slavery's bidding. That was not the case with the men to whom I have referred. They came out boldly and avowed the object at which they aimed, and the means by which they proposed to attain it. Let this ever be said to their credit.

In that correspondence the objects of this government are as evident as much beyond controversy as anything can possibly be. No, Sir! If the fingers of a hand were sent from the throne of Eternal light, to write this upon the wall over your head, it would not flash conviction more readily to the mind than is done by a perusal of that correspondence. I will not go through the whole of it, but will content myself with sending to the Clerk and asking him to read an extract from this letter:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 7, 1847

"Sir: A recent letter from a citizen in Maryland, then in London, contains the following statement:

"I must now communicate to you the fullest confidence that there is now here a Mr. Andrews, deputed by the authorities of Texas, to negotiate with the British Government that he may get Lord Aberdeen and submitted to guarantee for the abolition of Slavery in Texas, which is that there shall be organized a company in England who shall advance a sum sufficient to pay for the slaves now in Texas, and receive in payment Texas land, that the annual interest shall be paid over to an indemnity fund for the abolition of slavery, and I am authorized by the Texan minister here to say that Lord Aberdeen has agreed that the British Government will guarantee the payment of the interest on this loan, upon condition that the Texan Government will abolish slavery."

This proposition, it will be seen, was exceedingly simple and easy to be understood. It announced, not that there was a scheme on foot amongst a set of fanatical politicians, to decoy away the slaves, not to steal them—nothing of that sort—but a proposition had been entertained, by which the government and slaveholders of Texas agreed to abolish slavery, and for this agreement on their part, it was said that a company had agreed to advance a stipulated price. What right had our government to interfere? The Secretary says "a movement of this sort cannot be contemplated in silence." I agree it should not; but what should every American heart have said, when it was found that a scheme of this kind was on foot? Should they not have burst out in thankful aspirations to Almighty God, that such a scheme of benevolence as that, had even been thought of. I think the Secretary says well in saying that they could not look on in silence.

The Secretary further says, "such an attempt upon any neighboring country would necessarily be viewed by this government with very deep concern."

Certainly, they should have looked on with deep concern—as deep as that with which affection watches by the side of dying love, now gathering hope from the symptoms, that the smiles of health will again smooth the cheek of love, and then trembling lest the pall of despair should settle on our hopes.

Again, he says, "it cannot be permitted to succeed without the most strenuous efforts on our part to arrest a calamity so serious to every part of our country"—a calamity so serious to every part of the country—so serious to New Hampshire, to Massachusetts, and the other New England States. And, sir, this bill, which is now before you, is one of the measures which are to be adopted to redeem the pledge thus made. In the same letter it is said:

"The establishment, in the very midst of our slaveholding States, of an independent government forbidding the existence of slavery, and by a people born, for the most part, among us, reared up in our habits, and speaking our language, could not fail to produce the most unhappy effects upon both parties."

When I saw it formally announced by the government that it could not produce any but "unhappy effects," I thought that I was mistaken in the reading. I thought it must be a mistake of the printer, but I found that it was no mistake that the announcement was really made. What a mistake then did the Pilgrim Fathers make in coming to found a colony in the New World, where they might avoid the consequences of slavery. Had they not slavery enough at home, that they bade farewell to everything that bound their hearts to the land of their birth,—the land where the bones of their fathers reposed,—and came over and founded the institution of American slavery? Was it for this that the May Flower sailed from the coast where slavery prevailed? Was it for this that those patriots wandered from England to Holland, and from Holland here? In heaven's name, was not England oppressive enough? One more extract, and I leave the letter :

"Few calamities could befall the country like this!"

I had understood, up to the time when I read this declaration, that the institution of slavery, for good or bad, was a State institution. I thought it was one which the general government had no right to touch. Everything that I had ever heard upon the subject had tended to take that institution from the cognizance of the general government, and make it exclusively a subject of State policy. But here I find it baptized, and made one of the gods before which the whole people are to bow, down and worship.

From this source, whether remote or immediate, this war proceeded. Can any man deny this? We may have our doubts whether, if there had been more caution and prudence, this war would have been precipitated upon us at so early a period. But is it not evident that the whole matter springs from this? Was not annexation itself an act of war? War was existing between Mexico and Texas at the time. By the very fact of annexing to ourselves one of the belligerent nations, we incurred the responsibility of fighting her battles. If this, then, be the cause of the war, I come next to the question how this war commenced? Well, sir, it may seem exceedingly strange that one should be found asking that question at this time, when the President has told us over and over again so many times how it commenced—that it commenced by the act of Mexico. Said the President in his message to Congress of the 11th May, 1846 :

"In my message at the commencement of the present session I informed you that began the year I supposed both of the congress and convention of Texas I had ordered an efficient military force to be concentrated in that country. Accordingly the 1st Regiment of Infantry had become part of the force which was ordered to Texas by the 31st of March last, to which extensive military preparations have been made. The force was thus organized with the view to the defence of Texas against any foreign enemy, and for the protection of the Texas people during the pendency of the question of the annexation of Texas to the United States, to annex herself to our Union; and under these circumstances, it was plainly our duty to extend our protection over her extreme and solid.

The force was concentrated at Corpus Christi and remained there until after I had received such information from Mexico as rendered it probable, if not certain, that the Mexican government would refuse to receive our Envoy.

Meantime, Texas, by the final action of our Congress, had become an integral part of our Union. The Congress of Texas, by its act of December 19, 1836, had declared the Rio del Norte to be the boundary of that republic. Its civil authority had been extended and exercised beyond the Nueces. The country between that river and the Del Norte had been represented in the Congress and in the convention of Texas; had thus taken part in the act of annexation itself, and is now included within one of our Congressional districts. Our own Congress had, moreover, with great unanimity, by the act approved December 31, 1845, recognized the country beyond the Nueces as a part of our territory, by including it within our own revenue system; and a revenue officer, to reside within that district, has been appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In short, the country between the Nueces and the Del Norte had been absolutely and unconditionally, by the act of December 29, 1845, transferred to the United States. Texas had exercised jurisdiction over it, and to the extent of her ability defended it. Under the circumstances, I deemed it proper to station the troops of the United States on the left bank of the Del Norte."

And in his annual message to Congress on the 8th of December, 1846, he repeats the assertion, and he not only repeats the declaration that war exists by the acts of Mexico, but he says every honorable effort has been made by me to prevent the war, but all proved in vain, and the war has come notwithstanding he was so exceedingly opposed to it. Now I desire to examine this matter. The President is not satisfied with thus telling us that the war arose from the act of Mexico, and that he had used every honorable exertion to avoid it. He comes forward in his message this year and tells us fourteen times distinctly, and several times impliedly, that it arose from the act of Mexico. It seems a part of the President's religion, to accompany his more solemn acts with the continued declaration that war exists, by the acts of Mexico," as it was of the followers of Mahommed, to profess their more solemn sayings with the oft-repeated avowal that there was "no God but Allah, and Mahommed his prophet." Now let us examine this matter, did it commence by the act of Mexico? Such is not my reading. The taking possession of Texas was of itself an act of war. Sir, at the time of the American Revolution, when France signed a Treaty of Alliance with us, Great Britain was not long in finding out that that was an act of war. But suppose that act was not one of war, what follows?

One of the fundamental conditions of the Joint Resolution for annexing Texas to the United States, was war.

"That said territory is finally subject to the adjustment by the Government of all conflicting claims."

"Subject to the adjustment of all questions of boundary." That was the very first condition which the American Congress fixed to the act of annexation. Well, is it necessary for me to stand here to-day to tell the American people, that if there is a question of boundary existing, and one party goes and occupies the territory to the extreme verge of the claim that is an act of war? Why I think the President himself, in the course of the controversy with Great Britain, must have found that this was the case although one of the first acts of his administration was to tell the people in his Inaugural Address, that our title to Oregon was clear and unquestionable. I saw the President amid the dripping of the storm, standing at the east front of this capitol, reminding the people how young a man he was, and yet he would have the whole of Oregon. I almost expected to hear him say—

"You'd scarce expect one of my age,
To speak in public on the stage."

I know not whether I was most amused at the juvenility of the President, or his determination to seize upon the whole of Oregon. He would not even submit the question to arbitration, because that would be admitting that Great Britain had some sort of title there. Nothing short of the whole would satisfy him. Why, a man could hardly be recognized as a democrat in the Eastern States, unless he was for claiming the whole of Oregon. He must go for 54° 40', or he was no democrat; and one State Legislature was so violent in the cause, that they were for claiming 54° 40'. I wonder it never occurred to the President to send our officers and take possession of the territory up to that line. Why did he not do this? Because he knew, and every body knew, it would be an act of war. He knew it would be so considered by Great Britain, and resented by her. Well, so it was here. The sending of General Taylor to the Rio Grande was, beyond all controversy, an act of war, and was the occasion to give you the President's own account of it. In his message of May, 1846, he says that:

"He kept the troops at Corpus Christi until it was rendered certain that the Mexican government had refused to receive Mr. Slidell."

Well, on the 10th day of November this commissioner was appointed, and not being much acquainted with matters of diplomacy, I of course take what the President said, as being what he meant.

"MR. SLIDELL'S LETTER OF CREDENCE

JAMES K. POLK,

President of the United States of America

GREAT AND GOOD FRIEND: I have made choice of JOHN SLIDELL, one of our distinguished citizens, to reside near the government of the Mexican republic in the quality of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America. He is well informed of the relative interests of the two countries, and of our sincere desire to reduce, cultivate, and strengthen friendship and good correspondence between us, and, from a knowledge of his talents and good conduct, I have entire confidence that he will render himself acceptable to the Mexican government, by his constant endeavors to preserve and advance the interests and happiness of both nations. I therefore request your excellency to receive him favorably, and to give full credence to whatever he shall say on the part of the United States. And I pray God to have you in his holy and holy keeping.

Written at the city of Washington the fourth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-five, and of the independence of the United States the seventieth. Your good friend,

JAMES K. POLK.

By the President
JAMES BUCHANAN, Secretary of State.
To his Excellency, Don Jose Joaquin Herrera, President of the Mexican Republic."

"And pray God to have you in his holy care and keeping." How pious the President is! He prays for his enemies. This was written on the 10th of November. Now, I want to read another document, to show how Mr. Polk was treating his good friend on the 15th of June preceding. In a confidential communication from the War Department, dated June 15, 1845, to General Taylor, I find the following:

"The point of your ultimate destination is the western frontier of Texas, where you will select and occupy, on or near the Rio Grande del Norte, such a site as will command the mouths of the Nueces, and will be best adapted to repel invasion, and to protect what, in the event of annexation, will be our western border. You will limit yourself to the defence of the territory of Texas, unless Mexico should declare war against the United States.

Your movement to the Gulf of Mexico, and your preparations to embark for the western frontier of Texas, are to be made without any delay."

Well, now, what do you think of this pious President? On the 15th of June, he ordered the troops to be ready to embark for the coast of Mexico, and five months afterwards, he sends a messenger to General Herrera, and by the hands of this messenger, a supplication to Almighty God, "to have him in his safe and holy keeping," lest this prayer should fail, he had taken the precaution to send General Taylor with his army, five months before, to take him in his care and keeping. Well, I will not detain the Senate long on this part of the matter. It seems to me it is too plain for cavil; and if I had the issue to be tried before twelve good men and true, the first witness I would call would be James K. Polk—for I never knew a witness who was conscious of telling the truth, who found it necessary to repeat so often the same assertion. Why does the President go into so long and labored an effort to prove that we had good cause of war? If this were the case, and we had not commenced it, instead of being to our credit, it would have been a disgrace to us. It would have shown us a pusillanimous nation. It is, therefore, felo de se of his argument? Because, if this were the case, it shows that we should have done what the President has labored to show we have not done. The President may conquer Mexico, but he never can succeed in conquering the truth. He may direct as many guns to bear upon it as it would require to silence a Mexican battery, but he will not be successful.

Well, if this was the cause of the war—if this was the manner in which the war commenced, what are we carrying it on for now? What do we propose? What do we want? Why, in the message of the President to Congress, in 1846, he tells us that it was not conquest that he desired, in the message of this year he modifies it a little. Now the conquest he disavows, that is, he does not mean to take the whole of Mexico. I suppose that he means to divide it, very much as Lord Aberdeen divided Oregon with him, to take what he wants, and leave the rest. He says:

"It was never contemplated by me to make a permanent conquest of Mexico or to destroy her nationality."

Well, sir, actions speak louder than words, and I need not admonish gentlemen on this floor of this fact, for I have proof in my hand. What does the President tell you? I heard it asserted by a Senator the other day, that Senators voted for the appropriation of the war under a protest. That they did it for nothing else than to relieve Gen. Taylor from the critical position in which he was placed. The President came and made the thrilling announcement that American blood had been shed on American soil. And while every heart palpitated at such an outrage, Senators, anxious to relieve Gen. Taylor, were now willing to vote the supplies required, even though the bill for raising them was accompanied by the declaration which, at that time, they believed to be untrue, that "war existed by the act of Mexico." They gave their votes under the protest that was expressly for the relief of Gen. Taylor. And what does the President now say to those Senators?—Why, he says you did not mean any such thing. You could not have meant it. You knew that indemnity must be acquired. Senators, when you paused that you did not mean to get territory. The President has said so. He is your Executive officer—surely he ought to know; and the President has a right to say it, because actions speak louder than words. You voted him the men and the money; you gave him the sword and the purse, and you gave him unlimited license to conduct the war as he pleased, and now you must pass this bill—give him the ten regiments of regulars, and afterwards twenty regiments of volunteers, and let him thus, according to the Senator from Kentucky, increase his available forces in Mexico to ninety thousand, and go on, subjugating that country; and what will he tell you at the next session? He now tells you:

"Congress could not have meant—when, in May, 1846, they appropriated ten millions of dollars, and authorized the President to employ the military and naval forces of the United States, and to accept the services of fifty thousand volunteers, to enable him to prosecute the war; and when, at their last session, and after our army had invaded Mexico, they made additional appropriations, and authorized the raising of additional troops for the same purpose—that no indemnity was to be obtained from Mexico at the conclusion of the war; and yet it was certain that, if no Mexican territory was acquired, no indemnity could be obtained.

"It is further manifest that Congress contemplated territorial indemnity, from the fact, that at their last session an act was passed, upon the Executive recommendation, appropriating three millions of dollars with the express object, as avowed in debate, that it was made 'to enable the President to conclude a treaty of peace, boundary, and limits with the republic of Mexico, to be used by him in the event that said treaty when signed by the authorized agent of the two governments, and duly ratified by Mexico, shall call for the expenditure of the same, or any part thereof.' The object of asking this appropriation was distinctly stated in the several messages on the subject which I communicated to Congress."

Vote him the men and money he now asks, and what will he tell you at the next session? Why, that Congress intended to overrun all Mexico! He will say,—you meant that I should carry destruction throughout the whole of that country—that > "I should dip my sword in blood, and write my name

> On desolated lands and cities."

And he would have a right to say so! Vote him the men and the money he wants—let him have ninety thousand troops there, and he will enact scenes, that perhaps we little think of; and at the next session, he will come and tell us, that that was what we meant, and he will have a right to do so, because actions speak louder than words. We certainly, in giving our votes, must be supposed to have some object to attain—that object, the President can construe for himself.

In regard to the amendment which has been proposed to this bill, instead of making it better, it leaves it more ambiguous still. It leaves it to the President's discretion whether to embody these troops or not; but that is the very thing we ought not to do. He has had discretion enough. Was it not at his discretion that our troops were marched to the Rio Grande? It seems to me that the true course is to take the discretion into our own hands, and make specific appropriations for specific objects. Then we shall know for what objects they are made.

But the President says now, he does not want the conquest of the whole of Mexico, but he wants indemnity and security. Well, these are words easily pronounced. But we had a good old lesson in New England, requiring the definition of words to be given. Indemnity for what?—Security for what?—I find the indemnity he wanted was not only indemnity for our claims, and for all the expenses of the war, but in addition to all this, he wanted to drive a bargain with them—he was not willing to make peace unless they would sell him a part of their country with its inhabitants, for I read in the 5th and 6th articles of the treaty proposed by our government to Mexico, as follows, viz:

"ART. 5. In consideration of the extension of the limits of the United States, as they are defined by the preceding article, and by the stipulations which are further contained in article 9, the United States abandon forever against the United Mexican States all reclamation on account of the costs of this war; and, besides, agree to pay to the United Mexican States, in the city of Mexico, the sum of ———.

"ART 6 In full consideration of the stipulations contained in Articles 4 and 8 of this treaty, the United States agree to assume and pay all sums at present due to claimants, and those which may be hereafter established, according to the convention concluded between the two Republics, in the city of Mexico, on the 20th of January, 1843, to provide for the payment of what shall be decided in favor of the claimants, according to a convention between the United States and the Mexican Republic, on the 11th of April, 1839. And the United States equally agree to assume and pay all reclamations of citizens of the United States against the Government of the United Mexican States, not previously decided, to an amount not exceeding three millions of dollars. Which have arisen prior to the 13th of May, 1846, and which shall be adjudged to be due by a commission established by the Government of the United States, whose decision shall be definitive and conclusive: Provided, always, That in deciding on the validity of the said demands, the commission shall be guided and governed by the principles and rules prescribed by the first and fifth articles of the unratified convention, concluded in the city of Mexico on the 20th of November, 1843, and in no case shall they give judgment in favor of any claim not embraced by these principles and rules. And the United States, for the present and future, exonerate the United Mexican States from any of the said demands whatsoever, which may be admitted or rejected by said board of commissioners."

He requires payment of our unliquidated claims—he requires the expenses of the war, and in addition to these, he requires that they shall sell him just as much territory as he sees fit to buy at his own price—this is the indemnity and security he wants. Are Senators prepared to sanction these views? Can they face the indignation of the world, after having insisted on them? Here is a government enfeebled—broken down—a people distracted—having a natural attachment to the homes of their birth—to the soil beneath which moulder the bones of their fathers—and because they do not choose to sell their country and themselves, the President says the war must be prosecuted and carried into the vital parts of Mexico. Well now, the course of the President seems to me decidedly reprehensible. Perhaps I have commented upon it in a manner not quite becoming to this place—I hope not.

I cannot help remarking in justice to him, that he has not shown a disposition for war in all cases. I think in the management of the Oregon treaty he exhibited a Christian meekness to a surprising degree. But he did not inherit the blessing of the meek. He did not get the land. He would not submit to arbitration. Well, how did he settle it?

Let Mr. Pakenham, the British Minister, tell his own story:

"WASHINGTON, June 13, 1846.

"MY LORD: In conformity with what I had the honor to state in my despatch No. 68 of the 10th instant, the President sent a message on Wednesday last to the Senate, submitting for the opinion of that body, the draft of a convention for the settlement of the Oregon question, which I was instructed by your Lordship's despatch No. 19) of the 18th May, to propose for the acceptance of the United States.

"After a few hours deliberation on each of the three days, (Wednesday, Thursday and Friday,) the Senate by a majority of 38 votes to 12, adopted yesterday evening a resolution advising the President to accept the terms proposed by her Majesty's government. The President did not hesitate to act on this advice, and Mr. Buchanan accordingly sent for me this morning, and informed me that the conditions offered by her Majesty's government were accepted by the government of the United States, without the addition or alteration of a single word.

"I have the honor to be, &c.,

R. PAKENHAM

The Right Hon. the Earl of Aberdeen"

He takes it just exactly as it was cooked up for him, very much as sick children are directed to do when they have an unpalatable dose of medicine to take—"shut your eyes, and open your mouth, and down with it." Now, I have not a word to say against the settlement of the Oregon question; but it seems to me that it would have read a little better in history, if it had not been preceded by so much blustering and bragging. And it was a little amusing, to see the effect it had on our eastern democracy. The man who did not go for 54° 40', was a federalist, a traitor; and some were so zealous that they even got up to 54° 49'. Upon them the treaty came like a thunderclap, and they had to reverse the steam so suddenly that it came nigh producing a fatal collapse in the party.

But, sir, the President is not so entirely warlike in his nature as his conduct to Mexico would indicate: he has other and milder qualities; he merely has none of that ferocious spirit characterised by the poet as—

> "That stern joy which warrior feel
> In foemen worthy of their steel."

It is a colder country at 54° 40'. Now, if right in the position I have taken here, the question is, what is the duty of the American Senate? What are they to do? To go on and vote these ten regiments? The honorable Senator from Kentucky, the other day, said he did not know why regulars were preferred to volunteers. I do not know that I do. But Yankees guess sometimes.

War is to be made, sir, not only upon Mexico, but on the free laborers of the country, and the first onslaught is to be made in the shape of a tax on tea and coffee; and it is the patronage which the creation of these ten regiments is to give him, which he thinks will enable him to effect it, and the President has probably come to the conclusion taught by the experience of the past, that with the patronage of ten regiments at his command, "some things may be done as well as others."

I think the Senator from Kentucky, with his great acumen, if he looks through his glasses, may discover why the President prefers regulars.

Well, why cannot Senators who think with me, that the war is wrong, radically wrong, come out and declare so by their votes? Why sit here denouncing the President, and then be guilty of the inconsistency—with all due deference I say it—of voting men and money to carry on the war? Why, it is said it would be unpopular to withhold the supplies. Are we afraid to trust the people with a great question of right? Sir, I think those who are afraid to trust the people, underrate them. Are men afraid to do that which is right because it may not be popular? Sir, it is this ghost of the unpopularity of opposition to the war, which seems to sit like a nightmare upon American statesmen. Sir, I think there was more truth than poetry in what was said by a western man.

He said he got caught by opposing the last war, and he did not mean to get caught again—he intended now to go for war, pestilence, and famine. And I think there is a good deal of that feeling in the country now. Men are afraid to take a bold stand.

It is said the people have already decided the matter, that we have settled that the war shall be prosecuted. I do not so understand it. I do not believe it. The people have settled it? I never met among the people, one in ten, who thought the war was right or thought that it would be right further to prosecute it.

I believe, sir, that the heart of this whole people is sick of this miserable, temporizing policy, which is putting justice, and right, and truth out, in order that expediency may walk in and assume, and control, and direct our actions. I wish that the experiment might be tried by Congress of acting and voting on this matter according to the convictions of their own understanding as expressed by themselves when they speak of the character of the war. I listened, the other day, with great pleasure, to the remarks of the honorable Senator from South Carolina. I trust I heard with pain the suggestion which he threw out, when speaking on his resolutions. But I confess that I was somewhat astonished that a mind of his great experience, and of such keen observation, could really think that there could be any virtue in the passage of these resolutions. I would like, indeed, to see those resolutions passed, not that I think their passage would do any good in the world in the present emergency. But they might be adopted by way of land-mark, showing with what rapidity and velocity we have traveled the road to ruin. But that there would be any virtue in them I have not the least idea. Pass these resolutions unanimously, in both branches of Congress, and let the President append to them his usual declaration that the war was commenced by Mexico; nay, you may go beyond that, and with all the terse and accurate verbiage which you could embody them, you may make them part of the written fundamental constitution of the land, and what would they be worth? Not the paper upon which they are written; for the very moment that they stand in the way of a popular majority they would be utterly set at naught. He that is not persuaded of that, has not read, it seems to me, the first primer of our history. I think that the resolutions themselves contain much that is just and true, and that the passage of them might be of some consequence in the way which I have suggested. But that their passage would check the downward tendency of affairs is altogether out of the question.

I believe that the people desire us to go right, and that we have not faith enough in the people. Nothing is more common than to find aspirants for public favor, flattering the people and continually praising their intelligence and patriotism, and everything which gives value and dignity to the human character. But you do not find these eulogists of the public virtue at all prepared to venture a little upon the intelligence which they vaunt so much. There is faith in expediency, in policy; in everything but justice, truth and right.

The present is, I believe, a critical period in our history. I believe that it is presumptuous in us to affirm, as the President has affirmed in his message, that the great question of the capability of man for self-government has been settled. It is not settled, sir. We are now settling it. Whether the manner in which we are settling it will favorably or unfavorably affect the condition of mankind hereafter, yet remains to be seen in the future. We are settling the question not only for ourselves, but for all who are to come after us. If here the experiment of self-government should fail, who can estimate the consequences to our race? We are today writing our history. We are impressing that little space which we occupy between the past and the future, with footsteps which will be indelible. Whither are those footsteps now tending? Shall those who are to succeed us, find that the course which we are now pursuing, led to the broad fields of liberty, of peace, and of prosperity? Or shall it be, that we are only erecting monuments marking the bye-paths that lead to the pitfalls of destruction? These are questions that must come home to the heart of every man who loves his country, and prizes its free institutions, and sees the dangers which now threaten them. Are we so blind, so fanatical, so stupid, as to believe that the great laws of the physical and moral world are to be reversed in our favor? Are we emphatically the children of destiny? Can we take our destiny in our own hands, and control it? Not so. It seems to me that there is a light streaming down the pathway of ages, illuminating the destiny of nations, and that it is written in glaring characters—retribution. It is a law in operation all around us—in the physical, moral, and political world. It is true of nations as of individuals, "whatsoever a man sows, that shall he also reap." I would ask those disposed to look at this question in the light of history, to go back, and by its aid, trace the long vista of ages that have elapsed. Let them go back, if they will, to the morning of creation, when all the sons of God shouted together for joy that Almighty Power had spoken a new world into being; and they will not find it recorded in any page of that history, that any nation ever sowed the seeds of war and slavery, and reaped the fruits of peace and liberty. No! that passage remains to be written; and it requires no very great effort of the imagination to fancy that we can now hear the voice of all nations of the past sounding a solemn warning in our ears. Let us beware, lest that fate which has constantly followed such a course of policy may not soon be ours.

I have thus endeavored to discharge my duty. I am quite aware of the imperfection of the effort. But before I conclude, I wish to say a single word personal to myself, and to let you know, sir, and the Senate know, that if it be fanaticism which I have uttered, I am not alone responsible for it. It is not peculiar to myself, sir, nor those with whom I act. We had, a year or so ago, in the State of New Hampshire, a pair of democratic organs, and it was rather doubtful whether they were entirely harmonious. But in May, these New Hampshire patriots came together—they had an annexation—and when they came together, they undertook to define the true democratic faith upon this very doctrine of slavery. I read from the "New Hampshire Patriot" of 27th May, 1847.

[MR. HALE here read extracts from the "New Hampshire Patriot," contending that the democrats of slave States were friendly to abolition, and would ultimately effect it.]

That is "New Hampshire Patriot" democracy—about twelve months old. So, if I am fanatical, I am not without authority for my fanaticism; and a man may, it seems, entertain all the sentiments which I have advanced without being cast out of the pale of the democracy as it is now organized. But I leave the subject. I thank the Senate for the patience, kindness and candor with which I have been heard. It is no pleasant duty that I have performed. It is not agreeable to my feelings to occupy the place of an Ishmaelite here; my hand being against every man's, and every man's hand against mine. If any remarks have fallen from me, offensive to the feelings of a single Senator, of which I am wholly unconscious, I can assure him from the bottom of my heart that they were altogether unintentional. I have endeavored to deal with principles and measures, not with men. I believe that the institutions of the country are endangered. I believe that the course in which we are proceeding, unless our career be arrested, will most inevitably conduct us to destruction; and I have thrown out these suggestions, in the hope of doing something, however feeble the attempt, in order to excite correct public sentiment on this all-vital question.

The question being then on the passage of the bill,

Mr. BALDWIN inquired if the yeas and nays had been demanded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER replied in the negative.

Mr. BALDWIN then called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland rose to move an adjournment, in order to allow opportunity for further discussion of the bill, but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. CASS, who stated there was some executive business which demanded attention.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After a short time so occupied, the door was opened, and

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 10, 1848.

NATIONAL ARMORIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, made agreeably to law, accompanied by a statement of the expenses of the National Armories, together with an account of the arms made and repaired therein during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1847.

CLERKS IN THE OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE SENATE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Senate, made in compliance with the 11th section of the act of the 26th of August, 1842, showing the persons employed in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, during the year 1847, and the amount paid to each.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from James A. Houston in relation to the publication of the reported proceedings and debates of the Senate; which was read.

On motion by Mr. MANGUM, it was Ordered, That it be referred to the select committee on the subject.

PETITIONS.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a memorial of the Representatives of the Religious Society of Friends for the States of New York, Vermont, Michigan and other places adjacent, praying the adoption of peaceful measures for terminating the war with Mexico.

Mr. CLAYTON moved that the memorial be read and printed.

The memorial having been read, the question was stated to be upon the motion to print.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I believe sir, that, under the rule, the memorial goes to the Committee on Printing. If not, I move that it be so referred.

Mr. CLAYTON asked for the reading of the rule.

It was read by the Secretary.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I perceive that it must go to the Committee under the rule.

The motion to print was accordingly referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ATCHISON presented the petition of Charles Findlay, representative of P. Chotean, Jr., praying payment of certain monies due him under the treaty of August 8, 1831, between the United States and the Shawnee Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial of Pilots of the Bar and Harbor of Charleston, South Carolina, praying the repeal of the act of March 2d, 1837, concerning Pilots; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FELCH presented the petition of citizens of Washtenaw county, Michigan, praying the repeal of all laws of Congress which in anywise sanction the existence of slavery in the United States; the motion to receive which was laid upon the table.

Mr. FELCH presented the petition of citizens of the county of Washtenaw, Michigan, praying the adoption of measures to prevent the acquisition of additional territory, unless on condition that slavery be prohibited therein; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FELCH presented the memorial of Catharine Hoffman, widow of Lieut. Col. William Hoffman, deceased, late of the army of the United States, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented a memorial of the Governor, members of the Legislature, and other citizens of the State of Florida, praying that compensation may be made to Tony Proctor, a free colored man, for services as an interpreter to the Seminole Indians in 1823 and '24; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WESTCOTT said: I ask to be indulged in one or two remarks in relation to this petition at this time. It is not signed by the individual for whom relief is asked. The application is in behalf of an old free negro who, for seventy years past, has been the faithful interpreter for the Spanish government and that of the United States with the Seminoles; and the petition is signed by the Executive and Legislative authorities of the State of Florida.—Tony Proctor, the interpreter, was long in pay of the United States, but for some cause sixteen months pay has been withheld from him. He is now upwards of one hundred years old. I hope my friend, the Senator from Missouri, Chairman of the Indian Committee, [Mr. ATCHISON] will notice this fact, and he will see that if the relief asked is not granted forthwith, it will probably come too late. I hope the delay, too usual in Congress, will not be allowed in this case.

Mr. DAYTON presented the memorial of Mary Brognard, widow of John Brognard, a non-commissioned officer attached to the Allied French corps in the revolutionary war, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAYTON presented the petition of Aaron Carman, praying that letters-patent may issue to him for an improvement invented by him in the construction of the plough; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. BREESE presented the petition of John H. Kinzie, and others, assignees of certain Pottawottamie Indians, praying the relinquishment of the reversionary interest of the United States in the lands purchased by them; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MASON submitted additional documents relating to the claim of Richard G. Dove, which, with his petition, on the files of the Senate, were referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of Archibald Williams, and Charles Griffen, praying compensation for supplies furnished the Florida militia in the Seminole war; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of LeRoy Hammond, praying compensation for the use of his wagon and team in the military service of the United States during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of John H. Williams, praying to be allowed the bounty granted by the act of 1833, on his reenlistment in the Marine Corps; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MASON submitted a document relating to the claim of John H. Williams, for pay due him as a private in the Marine Corps; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of Abel Gray, a Sergeant in the Marine Corps, praying compensation for extra duty performed by him; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of John H. Williams, praying compensation for services as schoolmaster on board the United States' ships Java and Delaware; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER presented an abstract of the report of a committee of the Chamber of Commerce, of Charleston, South Carolina, recommending the establishment of a branch mint at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the petition of D. C. Buell, praying compensation for a horse lost in the military service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BELL presented the petition of Mary Connelly, widow of a deceased revolutionary soldier, praying a renewal of her pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRADBURY presented the petition of Patrick Walker, praying an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of the Philadelphia Female Anti-Slavery Society, praying the adoption of some plan for the immediate peaceful dissolution of the Union; the motion to receive which was laid on the table.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of John Stanert, a sol dier in the last war with Great Britain, praying arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BADGER presented a memorial of merchants and others, and a memorial of masters of vessels and others, engaged in the navigation and commerce of the port of Wilmington, North Carolina; also, a memorial of Pilots on the Cape Fear river and bars, severally praying the establishment of additional lights and buoys in the Cape Fear river; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the documents on the files of the Senate relating to the claims of the State of New Hampshire against the United States.

On motion by Mr. MANGUM, it was Ordered, That the petition of Michael Hanson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Thomas H. Noble, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. BRADBURY, it was Ordered, That the petition of William Davis, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. BRADBURY, it was Ordered, That the petition of Ebenezer Whitten, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. CORWIN, it was Ordered, That John P. Converse have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

NOTICE OF BILLS.

Mr. FELCH gave notice that on to-morrow, or at some early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill to apply certain alternate sections of the public domain towards the completion of works of internal improvement in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes.

Mr. RUSK gave notice that on to-morrow, or at an early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill to establish an additional District Court in Texas.

Mr. DOUGLAS gave notice that on to-morrow, or at an early day, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill to establish the Territory of Minesota.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

Mr. HANNEGAN submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

Resolved, That no treaty of peace can be made with Mexico having a proper regard to the best interests of the United States, which does not establish as a boundary, between the two nations, the most suitable line for military defence.

Resolved, That in no contingency can the United States consent to the establishment of Monarchical Government, within the limits of Mexico, by the intervention of European power.

Resolved, That it may become necessary and proper, as it is within the constitutional capacity of this government, for the United States to hold Mexico as a territorial appendage.

The resolutions having been read,

Mr. HANNEGAN said—I ask that the resolutions be printed; and as it would not be strictly in order, I shall refrain from saying anything in relation to them at present. I ask that they be made the order of the day for this day two weeks, inasmuch as by that time the bills will have been disposed of which are now before the Senate. I will only add that the resolutions are not entirely abstractions. They propose something definite and pointed.

It was then ordered, that the resolutions be printed for the use of the Senate, and that they be made the special order for this day two weeks.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

On motion by Mr. ASHLEY, it was

Ordered, That the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Martin Fenwick; and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of La., it was Ordered, That the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Anna J. Hassler; and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Charles M. Gibson, and from the further consideration of the memorial of A. H. Cole, of Florida: and that they be severally referred to the Committee of Claims.

LAND PATENTS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. JOHNSON of La. asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the issuing of Patents in a certain class of cases, and for other purposes; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

INDIANA BONDS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BRIGHT asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill authorising the Secretary of War to surrender certain bonds of the State of Indiana, held by the United States, to the Agent of the State for said State of Indiana; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. HANNEGAN said:—Several days ago I gave notice that I would ask leave to introduce a bill to establish a Territorial Government in Oregon. Upon reflection, I thought it proper and just to my friend, the Senator from Illinois, that he should have charge of the bill; and I have given it to him, and I believe he is now prepared to present it.

Mr. DOUGLAS then asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to establish the Territorial Government of Oregon; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

PRE-EMPTION SYSTEM.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to establish a general permanent pre-emption system in favor of actual settlers on the Public Lands, reported it without amendment.

NATHANIEL HOGGATT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Land Claims, to whom had been referred the petition of Nathaniel Hoggatt, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to a second reading.

HALF-PAY OF WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom had been referred so much of the President's message as relates to the subject, reported a bill amending the Act entitled "An Act granting half-pay to widows or orphans, where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States, in cases of deceased officers and soldiers of the militia and volunteers," passed July 4, 1836; which was read and passed to the second reading.

JOSEPH NOURSE, DECEASED.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom had been referred the petition of Maria L. Nourse, reported a bill to authorize the settlement of the account of Joseph Nourse, deceased; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

EDWARD BOLON.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom had been referred the petition of Edward Bolon, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

LOOMIS AND GAY.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee of Claims, to whom had been referred the documents relating to the claim of Loomis and Gay, reported a bill in addition to an Act for the relief of Walter Loomis and Abel Gay, approved July 2d, 1836; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BALWDIN also submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH WATSON.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee of Claims, to whom had been referred the petition of Joseph Watson, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

ERRORS IN SURVEYS.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom had been referred a resolution relating to errors and defective returns in certain surveys, plats, and field notes, reported the same without amendment; and submitted a special report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom had been referred the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Illinois respecting the Saline Reservations, reported a bill confirming former sales by the State of Illinois of the Ohio Saline Reservations, and authorizing the sale of the residue of such reservations; which was read and passed to the second reading.

GEORGE S. GAINES.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom had been referred the petition of George S. Gaines, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM MARVIN.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom had been referred the petition of William Marvin, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

BROOKLYN DRY-DOCK.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill making an additional appropriation for the dry-dock at the Brooklyn Navy Yard; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. YULEE said: I would ask the immediate action of the Senate on that bill. A communication has been received from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting one from the Chief of the Bureau of Construction, in which Congress is informed, that the appropriation for the dry-dock at Brooklyn is entirely exhausted, and that they are without the means of making payments for the work during the present month. I believe that the communication states, that there is not enough to carry them through the month of December, which has just expired. They ask an appropriation of $150,000, in order to go on with the work. The Committee on Naval Affairs in the House have reported a bill precisely similar to that reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate. It is necessary that action should be immediate on this bill, in order to prevent detriment to the structure, and to meet the public engagements contracted already, and daily occurring. Will the Secretary have the goodness to read the communication to which I have referred, as it will inform the Senate of all the facts in the case?

The SECRETARY read the communication.

The bill was then read a second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said that he feared that very partial attention had been directed to the bill before the Senate. It was one of very considerable consequence, and yet for one he did not exactly understand its objects.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The bill will be read.

The bill was then read.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I have no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON.—At the last session, we passed a bill making an appropriation for this work, when the merits and demerits of the subject were fully discussed, and the whole policy gone over and approved.

The bill was then read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

ASSISTANT PURSERS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill providing for the appointment of Assistant Pursers in the Navy.

The amendment heretofore submitted by Mr. BADGER to strike out the words "by warrant," and insert "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE said, that as he was desired by Senators near him to explain the nessesity of this bill, he would do so very briefly.

There were eighty-one vessels attached to the Naval establishment a year ago. This number has been increased during the past year to meet the necessities of the service on the Mexican coast. There are sixty-four Pursers in service, of whom there are

Now at sea, - - - - - -	33
On duty at shore stations, - - - -	14
Unfit for active sea service from age and infirmity,	4
Recently returned from sea and settling accounts,	4
Detailed for vessels now fitting for sea, - -	3
Waiting orders, - - - - - -	6

There are fifty-four vessels in commission at the present time, so that there are in fact now twenty-one vessels without Pursers, the duties being performed by their commanding officers.

This consequence is detrimental to the service and unjust to the officers obliged to act as Pursers of their own vessels, who are generally not conversant with accounts, and whose appropriate duties totally conflict with the functions of a Purser. Several very hard cases have grown out of this deficit in the number of Pursers. Several officers of the Navy, whose brilliant achievements on the coast of Mexico entitle them to the thanks of the country, and would have brought to them high promotion in most other countries, where the rule of lineal promotion is less rigidly observed, have returned home to be mulcted in damages, instead of being rewarded for their meritorious conduct. Some of them have balances of one or two thousand dollars found against them for the want of formal vouchers, although there can be no doubt of the actual expenditure. And the monthly pay to which the law entitles the officers thus situated is subject to be abstracted from the support of their families, and carried to the credit of the government.

This is all wrong. Now, what is the remedy? The most economical and advantageous mode of supplying the deficit in the number of Pursers, is that recommended by the Secretary of the Navy and reported by the Committee. The Assistant Pursers will receive a less salary than the Pursers are allowed, and will fully answer the necessities of the service in the class of smaller vessels. The alternative is between the increase of the number of Pursers, or the addition proposed by this bill to the corps. There can be no question that this is the preferable measure; for, besides the advantage on the score of economy, the Executive will be able to make his selections for the grade of Purser, after a trial of capability and according to the relative merit of the persons filling the grade now proposed.

Mr. WESTCOTT offered the following amendment to first section:

Provided, That no person shall be nominated or appointed an assistant Purser, until he shall have first passed an examination before a board of Pursers of the Navy as to his qualifications for such office, in like manner as assistant Surgeons of the Navy are now required by law to pass such examination.

Mr. WESTCOTT observed, that he offered this amendment at the suggestion of several Senators who coincided with him in opinion as to its importance. The first object of it was to decrease the Executive patronage. It prevented the selection of mere office hunting political partizans without qualification, and in reward for political services; and if such are chosen it would ensure, at least, that they have the necessary education and intelligence. This law provides that all Pursers are to be appointed hereafter from these assistant Pursers. These assistant Pursers should have mercantile knowledge—skill as accountants—both of which attainments are professional, and in fact, may be called scientific. They should be examined as to these and other qualifications by a board of Pursers before they are selected. No man can then become a Purser or an assistant Purser, unless he possesses at least, the qualifications I have alluded to. The effect of a similar rule as to Surgeons in the Navy, and as to Surgeons in the Army, and as to Cadets at West Point, and Midshipmen seeking promotion, has been salutary. I hope this amendment will be adopted before the bill is sent to the House.

Mr. YULEE.—I hope that my colleague will consent to withdraw this amendment, or else that it will be voted down. I do not think it at all important that the bill should be thus amended; and I trust, upon re-consideration, my colleague will withdraw it. Sir, it may be very proper that the surgeons and assistant surgeons of the army and navy should be subjected to an examination as to their professional and scientific attainments, inasmuch as perhaps it may not be in the power of the President, without the aid of a board of gentlemen, schooled in the profession, to decide upon their qualifications; but in respect to pursers, sir, there is no necessity for any other qualification than the ordinary one of being a good accountant, and the higher, and more important qualification of integrity, which the board cannot decide, but which is very properly committed to the President and the Senate to decide. My colleague is mistaken in regard to the duties of these pursers. They do not make purchases, they simply distribute the articles purchased, and disburse the money that is placed in their custody for the payment of the officers and men of the navy. That is all; the highest and most important qualification is integrity. I do not conceive that it is at all necessary that the bill should be amended as proposed by my colleague, and I trust he will withdraw his motion.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, it was decided in the negative.

No further amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment concurred in.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill on its third reading, to raise for a limited time an additional military force.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, said:

My purpose, Mr. President, in now addressing the Senate is to give my opinion upon certain points connected with the present war, which I assume to be connected may be properly discussed upon the present bill.

They are these—

First. Is the war a just and honorable one, or is it unjust and dishonorable.

Second. Has it been heretofore properly prosecuted.

Third. How should it hereafter be prosecuted.

Fourth. What end, consistently with the good name of the nation, should be attained by it.

Mr. President—Upon each of these propositions I propose to present my views with the frankness and freedom which become a Senator, and at the same time with the deference which I sincerely feel for the opinions of those upon both sides of the chamber with whom I shall be found to differ.

Nothing, sir, is more annoying to me than to refer at any time to any thing personal to myself, and it is especially so, to do so in the presence in which I stand. But there may be circumstances which render it a duty. I feel myself in that condition, and I therefore ask the kind indulgence of yourself and the Senate to say a word or two of a personal character.

To those who know me, Mr. President, it is I am sure unnecessary to disclaim that I am actuated on this occasion neither in what I shall say or do, by any other motive than the single motive of duty to my country. If I could be mad enough to desire any other political post of honor than the one which I now hold (sufficient one would think, to satisfy the cravings of any ambition) I hope I know myself well enough to be able to say with truth, that I should scorn to obtain it by pandering to popular passion or official power. But, sir, I am proud to state, that I have no such desire, that I have no condition in the gift of the present Executive which I would accept, and none in the power of the people to give that I would take. In the school of political ethics in which I have been taught, I have imbibed as my first and last lesson, the duty to do what you believe to be right, and confidently abide the result. Be it the approbation of your fellow men, or not, you have then the approbation of your own conscience, transcending infinitely transcending in true value, any reward that can flow from human source.

As to popularity, sir, I estimate it as nothing if it is sought after. Its real worth is when it follows good ends, accomplished by good means. It becomes disgrace when catered for.

I would not avow any political opinion, which I did not sincerely entertain, nor conceal one which I did entertain, to win any honor which my countrymen could bestow. Honor so won, if I was capable of so winning it, would be to me but hourly abasement.

Sir, I need not say that I came into this body differing with the administration upon almost every subject of our public civil policy. This difference, decided as it was in the beginning, so far from having been diminished, has been but more and more strengthened and confirmed. I believe they mis-apprehend the true policy of the country, and fundamentally err upon great and vital points of constitutional power. I may be mistaken, but I believe as sincerely as I believe in my own existence, that the day will come, and is rapidly coming, when this will be seen to be the general opinion of the people, and that until then the country will be deprived of many a blessing which the constitution was intended to bestow. But, sir, new questions have arisen, and are now agitating the nation. We are at war, and upon one of the questions growing out of it, I find myself differing perhaps with most of the Senators on this side of the chamber, not I hope with all, with whom it is my pride and pleasure generally to agree. I need not say, Mr. President, to you or to them, that this difference exists, if it does exist, because I am unable from a sense of duty to have it otherwise. Party ties, party prepossessions, party associations, strong as they ever are and should be, can never be sufficiently strong to make an honorable man violate what he feels to be his duty to his country: And when in that duty is involved his country's reputation, they should be and are weaker than the spider's web.

Nor upon this occasion do I feel any other concern than that which the mere fact of difference creates, because I know so well the Senators who are around me, that whatever may be they may feel, that our opinions are not upon all points identical, I should cease to have, what I am sure I now have, their respect and esteem, if I surrendered my own judgment, and faltered with my conscientious [illegible] in that judgment to the true fame of our common country. We differ, sir, but we differ as friends. We differ, sir, but we differ as patriots. We have alike at her honor—we disagree, if we do disagree, as to the true mode of vindicating and maintaining it. Mr. President, all of the good and liberal of my countrymen will, I have no doubt, when they shall have seen what I am about to say, do me the justice to believe that my motives are pure and patriotic. There may be, and perhaps are, many followers of the party camp, who hope it is to feed on the spoils of the contest, who may profess to doubt it; but none such do I drop a syllable to satisfy. Bred in the corruption of the motto of the political free-booter, that the spoils belong to the victor—fighting not for principle, but for plunder, they are as feculent as their motto, and beneath the notice of honest men. Only, indeed, to be shunned as you would shun any loathsome toad that might be in your pathway.

Is the war just and honorable or not?

I think it is, and I hope for the good name of my country, that such will be the judgment of Christendom. Sir, I wish to be clearly understood. I am not inquiring into the conduct of the Executive, into its prudence, or its constitutionality. My single proposition now is, that as between the United States and Mexico, the former had just cause of war on the 15th May, 1846, when the war act of that date was passed, and that on that day war in fact existed by means of the unjust and illegal act of Mexico. Sir, I repeat before going further, that I sincerely trust, as I love the fair fame of my countrymen, that I may be able to make this plain. Sir, I should bow in deep and heartfelt mortification for that fame if I did not believe it to be plain. I would not have it even to be involved in the slightest obscurity or doubt, from the dread of the judgment which the civilized world would then be compelled to pass upon us. We live in an age when nations, as individuals, lose their power and usefulness, and sink into degradation, if they perpetrate acts of wrong and injustice. We are, thank God, surrounded by a moral atmosphere as necessary to healthful national existence as the atmosphere we breath is necessary to individual life. If we discard it, if we sink below it, if we substitute for it that which is inseparable from violence and injustice, the punishment is at hand. The decay begins and progresses, until we are involved in hopeless ruin.

National character is national power, and the purer, the more elevated, the more spotless that character, the greater the power. I trust, therefore, in God, that I am right in the opinion that this war is upon our part just and honorable. If not, if not clearly just and honorable, then will we be pronounced by the judgment of the world a band of murderers. No other sentence can then be passed upon us. If we are right, we are worthy descendants of sires who knew no moral blemish, who estimated the national honor above all price. If we are wrong, we have disgraced the inheritance of freedom they have left us, brought dishonor upon our land, and aimed a fatal blow at constitutional freedom itself.

If I speak strongly it is because I feel strongly. I wish to give offence to none. I take no offence if others hold a different opinion. I am here to justify my own before the Senate and the country, and I propose to do it with the freedom that belongs to each of us.

I have an instinctive repugnance to believe my country wrong in any war in which she can engage, and I rejoice that in this instance my feelings and my judgment are one. I now proceed with the attempt to maintain that judgment. I have not time, sir, nor health to state all the facts which our difficulties with Mexico have developed applicable to this question. Nor if I had, should I deem it necessary to trespass so much upon the time of this body. My purpose is to refer only to such as I am sure cannot be successfully denied, and which are of themselves, in my judgment, conclusive of the controversy.

In 1834, the Mexican Congress passed a decree, requiring all citizens to surrender to the government their arms. The legislature of Coahuila and Texas by decree remonstrated against it and other acts repealing the constitution of Mexico of '24, by which they had changed the government from a Federal to a Central one.

For this General Cos, under the order of Santa Anna, at the head of his army, broke up the legislature of Coahuila and Texas, and arrested all the officers of the government, marched over the Rio Grande and established his head-quarters at San Antonio, leaving a garrison at Lipauttilan on the Nueces, and one at Goliad. The Texans then commenced the revolution, retook Goliad, Lipauttilan and San Antonio, in '36.

The boundaries of Coahuila and Texas as these departments were laid off into one State by the constitution of '24, was the Nueces, running far upward of one hundred miles up that stream, and then by a line across from that point to the Rio Grande. The territory below that line, between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, was a part of the State of Tamaulipas. Tamaulipas granted it to various individuals by what were called colony-grants, under which many settlements were made. These colonists, or the greater portion of them, so entitled to this portion of the territory, joined in the Texas Revolution, and were represented in the convention of Texas, which subsequently declared the independence of that Republic. The day after the battle of San Jacinto, 31st April, '36, Santa Anna surrendered as a prisoner. In about six weeks afterwards he entered into a treaty with the government of Texas, acknowledging the Rio Grande as their south-western boundary, upon condition that General Felisolea, then at the head of five thousand troops, being all that were left to the centralists to maintain their power, should be permitted to retire west of the river, and that he, himself, should be released. These conditions were complied with, Felisolea being permitted to retire with all his force to the west of the river, and Santa Anna in October afterwards, released. The treaty contained, also, various stipulations about the release of prisoners and the surrender of property. General Rusk, then at the head of the Texian forces, and under the order of the Texian government, transmitted a copy of the treaty to General Felisolea, who recognized it, and at once complied with all the obligations it imposed upon him.

In 1836, 19th December, the Texian Congress passed a law describing the Rio Grande as their south-western boundary. In the summer of 1836 Felisola was superseded in command by the appointment of Gen. Urea, who immediately commenced raising an army to re-invade Texas. Gen. Rusk, who was still at the head of the army of Texas and stationed at the Gaudaloupe, ordered the families between that part and the Rio Grande to retire to his rear, or to remove to the western bank of the river. The most of them did retire to his rear, but many of the Mexicans elected to cross the river and settle on the opposite side. For the purpose of facilitating the removal of those occupying the country and of watching the movements of the Mexican army, and preparatory to an advance upon Matamoras, he dispatched General Felix Houston with a sufficient force to take possession of Corpus Christi, and that was done. General Houston exercised more authority between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, than Urea did, who was stationed at Matamoras, with a force of about ten thousand men. At one period Urea crossed the river with the greater part of his command and encamped a few miles east of the river, but in a very short period he re-crossed to the western side. In this condition things remained until 1843, the Mexicans having no army to the east of the river, and the Texians having a few troops at Corpus Christi and San Antonio. With these troops, however, the Texians frequently made excursions to Lacido, a place upon the Rio Grande, and several times crossed it. The Mexican troops made two incursions, crossing the river both times, coming as far as San Antonio, and upon each occasion were immediately driven back to the west bank. In '43, also, an armistice was agreed upon under which the Mexican Army was to remain on the west and the Texians on the east side of the river. This armistice was in the same year revoked and the war declared to be renewed. The proclamation of General Wool, who was then in command of the Mexican force, issued by direction of Santa Anna, declared that all Mexicans found within three leagues of the river, would be considered as "favoring the usurpers of that territory," meaning by the territory, the whole of Texas, be tried by court martial, and capitally punished. There were during this period, at a post called Lacido on the east side of the river, some citizens under a military organization, and organized simply with a view of defence against the Indians, mustered only upon such occasions, but claiming to be citizens when Hays or McCullough was there with the Texian Rangers. From the commencement of the revolution in '34, to the Independence declared by Texas in '36 — from that period to the admission of Texas into our Union in '45—and from '45 up to the present hour, no Mexican document can be found, military or civil—no Mexican officer, military or civil, has ever been known to contend that the territory lying between the Nueces and the Rio Grande belonged to Mexico by any other title than that which she maintained to the whole territory between the Sabine and the Rio Grande. Under the colony contracts granted by Tamaulipas, the settlers, at an election in Texas in '41 or '42, of members of congress, voted at Corpus Christi, claiming to be citizens of Texas, and their votes were received and recognized by the government. The evidences to the title, too, to the lands so settled upon, including all transfers from the time of the revolution of '34, to the present time, are recorded amongst the land records of Texas. On the first of March, '45, the alternative resolutions for the admission of Texas into the Union were passed. On the 29th of December, '45, Texas was admitted, and on the same day an act was passed to extend the laws of the United States over the State of Texas. On the 31st December, '45, Texas was constituted a revenue district, and the city of Galveston, the only port of entry, having annexed to it, amongst other ports, as ports of delivery, the port of Corpus Christi, a port on the west side of the Nueces. Under that act a revenue officer of the United States has been appointed for Corpus Christi. On 2d February, '47, congress, by an act establishing additional post-roads in the State of Texas, established, amongst others, one from Brazos Santiago via Point Isabel to Fort Brown, opposite Matamoras; and one from Corpus Christi to Brazos Santiago, a point south of Point Isabel, near the mouth of the Rio Grande.

Now, as before stated, Texas was annexed under the first of the alternative resolutions of the 1st March, '45.

[The first resolution provides, That Congress doth consent that the territory properly included within, and rightfully belonging to, the republic of Texas, may be erected into a new State, to be called the State of Texas, with a republican form of government, to be adopted by the people of said republic, by deputies in convention assembled, with the consent of the existing government, in order that the same may be admitted as one of the States of this Union.

That the foregoing consent of Congress is given upon the condition, that the said State be formed, subject to the adjustment by this Government of all questions of boundary that may arise with other governments; and the constitution thereof, with the proper evidence of its adoption by the people of said republic of Texas, shall be transmitted to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress for its final action, on or before the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and forty-six.

The second resolution provides, That if the President of the United States shall, in his judgment and discretion, deem it most advisable, instead of proceeding to submit the first resolution to the republic of Texas, as an overture on the part of the United States for admission, to negotiate with that republic, then that a State to be formed out of the present republic of Texas, with suitable extent and boundaries, and with two representatives in Congress until the next apportionment of representation, shall be admitted into the Union, by virtue of this act, on an equal footing with the existing States, as soon as the terms and conditions of such admission, and the cession of the remaining Texian territory to the United States shall be agreed upon by the governments of Texas and the United States; and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated to defray the expenses of missions and negotiations, to agree upon the terms of said admission and cession, either by treaty to be submitted to the Senate, or by articles to be submitted to the two Houses of Congress, as the President may direct.]

Immediately upon the annexation the Minister of Mexico, General Almonte, demanded his passports, upon the ground that the annexation itself was a state of hostility to Mexico, and from that period to the march of General Taylor from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande, the frequent efforts of the American Government to terminate the controversy by negotiation, failed; and before that march, the Mexican government were collecting their forces upon the Rio Grande, with the avowed design, not of taking possession only of the territory between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, and conceding to the United States that portion of Texas which lay west of the Nueces, but of disputing with the United States the title to the whole of the country between the Rio Grande and the Sabine, and upon the ground that the whole and every part of that territory was still a portion of Mexico by virtue of her original and paramount title. Now the proposition which I seek to maintain is this, that as between the government of the United States and the government of Mexico, the former had in this condition of things a perfect right, and the same right for the purpose of repelling the threatened invasion, to march her troops into the territory between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, as into any territory situated between the Sabine and the Nueces. The question is not, whether such a movement of the troops was under all the circumstances judicious and prudent. It is not, whether by a different course an actual conflict might not have been avoided; but whether, as a matter of right—as a matter of self-defence, the United States had not, under the law of nations, full and perfect authority and justification to make such a movement.

Now what are the clear and indisputable facts? The U. States had received the republic of Texas into the Union without antecedently defining her boundaries, and under a constitution which reiterated what had been, as far back as '36, a part of her original constitution as an independent republic—that the Rio Grande, from its source to its mouth, was her southwestern boundary. The United States extended all her laws over the State of Texas, as so admitted. They had assumed actual jurisdiction at Corpus Christi. They knew that there were citizens between the Nueces and the Rio Grande who claimed to be citizens of the State of Texas so admitted. They knew that for nine years the State of Texas had existed as an independent nation.

Who proposed withdrawing Taylor on the 13th May? Who denied then, that we had good right to repel the Mexicans and to invade, for the purpose of avenging the outrages, any and every part of Mexico? She had refused to negotiate; she had considered annexation as war; she had terminated all diplomatic relations; she had refused to receive our Minister upon a mere quibble of the then President, because he was afraid of his own power, threatened with downfall because it was believed he was willing to negotiate at all. She had mustered an army on the Rio Grande with the declared object of invading all Texas and recovering the whole to her own sovereignty. Her then Government owed its existence to this very determination. She had never maintained any peculiar title to what is now called disputed territory. What, in this state, were the United States to do? Were they bound to remain still and await the invasion, or were they not authorized to meet the threatened invasion, even upon the admitted territory of the invader? Who doubts, that with nations as with individuals, the right of self-defence gives the right to strike the first blow? To prevent an injury is easier than to repair it. Sir, where is the writer on the law of nations, who holds a different opinion? There are some propositions so plain, that they admit of no illustration; they furnish their own best illustration, and this is one of them. We had a clear, undeniable right to meet Mexico upon the very uttermost limits of Texas, and repel her there, or if we deemed it advisable, an equally clear and undeniable right to anticipate her by striking the first blow on her own admitted territory. But it is said that the place of conflict was on Mexican territory. If it was, the argument in our behalf would not be in the least enfeebled. She was there intending to go further. She was there to drive our army back to the Sabine. She was there to re-conquer Texas, the whole and every part of Texas, and not to retain a portion only, upon the ground that such portion was not Texas.

But even the fact is not as alleged. Whether this portion of the territory was or was not rightfully a part of Texas was, at least, a matter of dispute. Texas claimed it; Texas, over a portion of it, exercised jurisdiction. Citizens residing on it, claimed to be citizens of that government. Mexico had in vain attempted to recover it. The Constitution of Texas included it. The United States had exercised, after the admission of Texas into the Union, sovereignty over part of it—the highest act of sovereignty, the taxing power. She had received Texas into the Union without any other definition of boundary, reserving the right only as between themselves, Texas, and any other power, who might question the justice of the boundary, to settle it by negotiation. Without a breach of honor to Texas, the United States could no more have surrendered, without enquiry and negotiation, to an absolute and armed demand this portion of the territory, than they could have surrendered to such a demand the entire State.

All then that can be said is, that the title of Texas to this part of her territory was open to dispute. Such a dispute is to be settled but by two means, by negotiation or by force. If the negotiation was refused, if Mexico elected the other alternative, force, can she complain if we meet her with force? But suppose her design was not actual force, but to get possession only of the disputed ground. Had not the United States the same right to take possession, and hold whatever they possessed, until the question of title was decided by negotiation? The very question of title might have been affected by the fact of possession. Mexico might have relied upon it as conclusive of the inability of Texas, and the United States as their successors, to prevent it, and as demonstrating that the original sovereignty had not been lost by the revolution. This, the United States had a right to guard against; their own honor bade them guard against it. If actual possession, by Mexico, could weaken the title of Texas, it was their duty to strengthen it by also taking possession. Pending a question of disputed territory, not actually possessed by either, who ever contended that it was the duty of one of the parties to suffer the other to take possession, and then try the title? No sir, no lawyer would give such advice. No statesman would so act. Things should in such a case, be suffered to remain in "statu quo." Neither should seek to get advantage of the other. If I am right in this, and Mexico designed taking possession, then she cannot complain if we also take possession; and, especially not, if she knew that notwithstanding such possession, we were willing at any time to negotiate on the question of title.

Sir, it has been said, that to march into the disputed territory is an act of hostility. I concede it. But then to threaten to march—to prepare to march—to muster an army to march, and with the avowed purpose of taking forcible possession and holding, is also an act of hostility. This Mexico did first, and we had then a clear right to anticipate her upon every principle of the national law, by marching ourselves, and placing ourselves in a condition successfully to meet and repel her. Between nations, as between individuals, aggression may be met by aggression—assault may be met by battery. But it is said revolution gives no title unaccompanied by actual and undisturbed possession and jurisdiction. As a general principle the proposition is true; but what is actual and undisturbed possession? Does it mean that the revolutionary government is to have a soldier on each foot of her asserted domain? Does it mean that every inhabitant within her territory is to acknowledge and submit to her sovereignty? or does it not, only mean, that such government is to have possession, claiming exclusive title to the whole of her asserted bounds, and possess the power and determination to make that title good by force, against the original sovereignty? I say it means this and nothing more.

See the result of a different doctrine. We declared our independence in '76; the war continued seven years. Suppose no treaty of peace had been made recognizing our limits, but England had simply retired from the contest in disgust with the struggle, as she might well have done, would not our title at that moment have been as good to every foot of our glorious Thirteen, as it was to the very battle-fields of Saratoga and Yorktown? And yet, how inconsiderable a part of our country was ever trodden by the American soldier or within actual reach of his arm! And yet, how many hearts throughout the contest beat high with true loyalty to England, and were striking or were burning to strike for her standard! No, sir, the proposition is not true as it is sometimes understood. It means only the ability to make the usurpation good by force of arms, when the usurper's title is by force of arms assailed. Subject to this test, who can doubt that Texas had the ability to maintain her title to any part of the territory claimed by her between the Nueces and the Rio Grande? Let the facts give the answer. After her declaration of independence, and after she had by force driven the Mexican troops across the latter river, they afterwards returned but twice and were each time driven back; and from the period of the last incursion, in 1843, no Mexican soldier ever crossed the river, and no civil officer of Mexico ever exercised jurisdiction over it. Texas then claimed the territory—Texas drove Mexico from it—Texas had apparently the power, and certainly the will, to drive her from it whenever she invaded it. If these were the facts, and I appeal to the honorable Senator from Texas for their truth, what doubt is there, that to that part of her constitutional limits she has a perfect title? Sir, a word or two more, and upon this point I have done. What Senator, what American, would be now content to abandon the territory, make the Nueces the boundary, and fight only for that boundary? For peace, to put an end to the war, to spare the further effusion of blood, some might be found who would by negotiation agree to that limit of Mexico—would surrender all title to the rest of Texas. But who is there who would now propose to fall back to the Nueces, and abandon at once the intermediate territory, the very fields of Palo Alto and Resaca la de Palma to Mexico, and fight her only to the banks of the Nueces? I believe, I hope for the honor of a common allegiance, that there is not one. I have said that I trusted for the sake of our heretofore stainless character, that the opinion I have thus fully endeavored to maintain was correct—that the war is on our part a just one.

If not, sir, why is it not? It is because without justification we invaded Mexican soil. It is because without justification we caused Mexican blood to be spilled upon Mexican ground. It is because they were met at their own homes, which we invaded; upon their own fields, dear to them as love of country is dear—consecrated to them by all the associations which bind man to the soil of his birth; in the holiest of all duties—the defence of home and country; and have, without right, without excuse, without palliation, given them to the sword—slaughtered them by hundreds and thousands, and driven the survivors away. Sir, would not such a tale of wrong, of itself, cover our country with ignominy? But it is not yet half told. What else have we done? We have seized upon it as a pretext for other, and if possible, yet deeper enormities. We have published to the world a falsehood. We have endeavored to conceal the true character of our outrage. We have stated that the contest was of their own seeking—not ours; and upon this degrading perversion, have pursued them with still more frightful outrage. We at once called into the field 50,000 soldiers—placed the whole naval power of the government at the disposition of the Executive—entrusted him with ten millions of dollars, and carried on the war thus begun—took possession of their towns, bombarded Monterey—carried it almost by storm, slaughtering men and women by hundreds and thousands. Still the story is not told. The damning dishonor is not yet as dark as the truth. Another Congress assembled—we of the Senate composing it in part. We authorized additional troops to be raised—we placed additional funds in the hands of the President.

We hear of an intention to strike outraged Mexico in yet more vital points—we do not arrest it. We suffer the expedition to go on. Before the Mexican blood is yet dry upon the fields of Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, Monterey and Buena Vista, Vera Cruz is bombarded. Her churches fall under the dreadful aim of the mortar—the blood of her women and children runs in streams through her before peaceful and happy streets—her almost every thoroughfare is obstructed by the mangled bodies of her slaughtered citizens, until at last, her valor can hold out no longer before the mighty and crushing power of our arms. She surrenders. Yet still, our vengeance is not glutted objection of an unsettled and unjust boundary. It looked to negotiation as the remedy to avoid all difficulty either with Texas or Mexico. It looked to annexation, without the hazard of war, and was designed for the pure and patriotic purpose of maintaining the peace and honor of the United States. Now, sir, I do not allege that this was the ground of their support, and still less that they had any assurance from the President upon the subject; but I do allege that I can conceive no other reason for their vote upon the resolution at all in keeping with their characters for high intelligence, firmness of purpose, and patriotism, than that they thought they had an assurance that their mode of annexation would be pursued. Sir, how did it turn out? The ink was hardly dry with which the resolution was recorded, and the name of the President attached to it, before, without going through the form even of a moment's subsequent deliberation, a messenger was despatched to the government of Texas, inviting her into the Union, under the first alternative—and under the first alternative, she came into the Union.

Now, sir, I charge upon the President, that this hasty and ill-advised step was the remote cause of the present war. I charge it upon him, that if he had acted prudently, and cautiously, and wisely, he would have proceeded under the other alternative, and have saved the dreadful effusion of blood the world has been compelled to witness.

I charge it upon him that the course which he did pursue was inconsistent with that uniform policy of his predecessors to avoid, or to seek to avoid, by every possible and honorable means, that direst of almost all national evils—war.

Sir, it is no defence that Congress authorized the step he did take. They to be sure authorized it, but did not command it. They left with him, unwisely, I think—certainly I would not have done it—the discretion to adopt it. But he knew—must have known—that some of the wisest and purest of statesmen predicted that it would end in war; and that some of the wisest and purest of the statesmen belonging to his own political party, entertained that opinion. He knew that a majority of the Senate, his constitutional advisers, were firmly of that opinion. He knew they had promptly rejected a treaty upon that very ground, and that alone; and yet in defiance of all this, he headlong takes the obnoxious step, and the war ensues. The responsibility is upon his head, and heavy, and overwhelming is that responsibility.

Sir, annexation of itself would not have been war—Mexico had no right to make it a cause of war. Texas independence had been too long established and undisturbed, to have her absolute right of sovereignty called in question—acknowledged by the principal powers of the world, all had a right to say, that revolution had ripened into title, and especially had the United States, the neighbor of the new government, that right. Nor do I believe, Mr. President, that Mexico, proud and arrogant as she then was, would have dared on account of the treaty of annexation to make war upon the United States. No, sir, it was the manner, not the fact. It was the rashness, and under the circumstances, in my opinion, the utter rashness of the President's course. I repeat, therefore, my settled conviction, that the President is on this account answerable for the war. But, upon the second ground to which I have referred, his liability is even yet more manifest, and without a shadow of justification or excuse. Sir, I need not say that I impute no improper motives to the President. He has no doubt, I hope acted under a mistaken sense of duty. But in my opinion, sir, the order to march our army to the Rio Grande was a flagrant violation of that duty—was ill advised, reckless and clearly against the spirit of the constitution.

Sir, he could not but have known that such a measure was likely to bring on hostilities. He could not but have known that such hostilities would be in the judgment of the nation, war. The war making power is exclusively vested in Congress, for wise, high and vital reasons of public policy. No man would be mad enough to repose such a dreaded power in the executive. The security of freedom and peace demands, that those who are to pay the expenses of war, should alone have the right to declare it. Congress was then in session, why were they not consulted? Was it apprehended that they would not by such a step hazard the peace of the nation? Was it because it was believed that they would resort to every possible effort before taking a step so likely to involve us? Sir, I hope not, I am bound in respect to the President to believe not. But, sir, the fact remains. Is there a citizen in the United States of any intelligence who can doubt it, that Congress never would, in the then condition of things, have suffered, if they could have prevented it, much less ordered that march.

I charge therefore upon the President that as far as the United States and himself are concerned, he is the author of the war. He and he only, and upon his hands rests the blood which has crimsoned its many glorious battle fields. But this, sir, is a question between the country and the President. Mexico had no right on that account to assail our flag.

To her it made no difference under what authority of this government our troops were on the Rio Grande. We had, I repeat, and hope I have shown, a right to send them there, and her attack upon them was, as regards him and ourselves, war actually begun by her.

Sir, our flag has waved in proud glory over every field of conflict. The nation's heart has beat high with pride and gratitude to the brave spirits who have carried it, for their matchless gallantry and skill. Upon the nation's brow no blush need to be seen. They were not permitted to avoid the horrid strife. Their President, without their knowledge, rashly involved the nation's honor. That honor was then illegally assailed. They had no choice but to vindicate it. Theirs is all the glory which has been achieved. The President hereafter, when in the retirement of private life, and reviewing the scenes of these bloody conflicts, however it may be now, will take no joy in the remembrance of our triumphs. The voice of conscience will tell him that all the blood of the battle was of his shedding. The tale of its glory to him, will be lost amidst the agonizing cries of the widows and the orphans it has made.—Sir, I repeat it, I allege no improper motive to the Executive, but as I believe that I am now addressing you, do I believe that upon the President rests the blood and expenses of the war, and upon him, therefore, I charge them.

Without concluding, Mr. JOHNSON gave way to a motion to adjourn, and

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1848.

REPORT FROM THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a Report of the Secretary of War, made agreeably to law, exhibiting the expenditures from the contingent funds of the Department, its Bureaus and Offices, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1847.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BRADBURY presented the memorial of John O. Means, praying compensation for services as Purser on board the United States brig Dolphin, in the year 1843; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MASON presented the memorial of Thomas Jefferson Randolph, executor of Thomas Jefferson, deceased, formerly President of the United States, praying Congress to purchase the manuscript papers of said Thomas Jefferson; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of I. C. Montague and others, citizens of Memphis, Tennessee, praying that bounty lands may be granted to the soldiers of the regular army who served in the battles of Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, and Monterey; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. CASS, it was Ordered, That the petition of Shadrach Gillet and others, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

NOTICES OF BILLS, ETC.

Mr. HUNTER, Mr. BREESE, and Mr. DIX, severally gave notice that on to-morrow they would ask leave of the Senate to introduce certain bills.

Mr. DICKINSON stated, that the discussion on the Military Bill had extended farther than he had anticipated, and he thought it proper that he should notify the Senate that he would call up his resolutions to-morrow, during the morning hour; not for the purpose of having a general discussion upon them; but merely in order to submit some remarks which he had intended to make upon them at an earlier period.

CONTRIBUTIONS IN MEXICO.

Mr. DAYTON submitted the following resolution for consideration.

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish to the Senate, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public service, copies of the letter referred to in his Message, of General Scott, of 20th May, 1847, and of the letter of General Taylor of 28th October, 1846, on the subject of "forced contributions in Mexico," and of all other correspondence on that subject, (if any,) not heretofore communicated.

Mr. DAYTON asked that the resolution be now considered.

Mr. SEVIER objected, and it was laid over, under the rule.

MR. TRIST'S CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. BALDWIN submitted the following Resolution for consideration.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate for the information of the Senate, the correspondence between the Commissioner from the United States and the Commissioners appointed by the government of Mexico to negotiate with him, during the suspension of hostilities, after the battles of Contreras and Churubusco; and any other information which may enable the Senate to understand the views, progress and state of that negotiation, a treaty he may deem the same not incompatible with the public interests.

Objection being made to the consideration of the resolution at this time, it was laid over under the rule.

ISAAC VARNES, SR.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was

Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Isaac Varnes, senior, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

CREED TAYLOR.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. ASHLEY asked, and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Creed Taylor; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

ALTERATION OF THE JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. ASHLEY asked, and obtained leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend the judicial system of the United States; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GRANT OF LAND.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. FELCH asked, and obtained leave to bring in a bill to apply certain alternate sections of the public domain toward the completion of the Clinton and Kalamazoo Canal, in the State of Michigan; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SUSAN E. GORDON.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom had been referred the bill for the relief of Susan E. Gordon, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MASON also submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

INCREASE OF THE MEDICAL STAFF.

Mr. CASS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for an increase of the medical staff of the army for a limited time; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

JONES AND BOKER.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom had been referred the petition of Jones and Boker, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom had been referred the bill authorizing persons to whom reservations of land have been made under Indian treaties to alienate the same in fee, reported the same without amendment.

DONIPHAN'S EXPEDITION.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolutions submitted by Mr. BENTON, on the 3d instant:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate ——— copies of the tour or memoir of Dr Wislizenus, through the northern parts of Mexico, as physician to Col. Doniphan's column; being a history of the expedition of Col. Doniphan, with scientific observations upon the face of the country. Also, that there be engraved or lithographed for the use of the Senate, ——— copies of the superficies map which accompanies the same. Also, the same number of the barometrical map of the profile of elevations above the level of the sea from St. Louis in Missouri, on the line of march of said expedition to Santa Fe, in New Mexico, and thence by Chihuahua, the Bolson de Mapim, Parras, Saltillo, and Monterey to Reynosa, on the Rio Grande. Also, the same number of the geological map, and the same number of the table of meteorological observations, which accompany the same.

Also, Resolved, That ——— copies of the said memoir, with the accompanying maps, be printed for the use of Dr. Wislizenus.

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Printing.

EDITORS OF THE UNION

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MASON on the 6th instant:

Resolved, That the Editors of the Union, as newspaper printed at Washington, and who were late printers to the Senate, be hereafter entitled to the same access to the floor of the Senate, which is now extended to others who were formerly the printers.

The resolution having been read, and the question being upon its adoption—

Mr. MANGUM said: I hope the question will be postponed until another day. The matter seems to attract no attention whatever on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WESTCOTT, (from his seat.)—The Senator mistakes the subject of the resolution.

Mr. MANGUM.—What is the resolution, then?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—It does not refer to the reporters of the Senate. It is to admit Ritchie & Heiss to the privilege of the floor of the Senate. I believe they are not now officers or printers of the Senate. I would inquire of the Senator as to this fact. I think the resolution proposes to give the same privilege as former printers to the Senate now have. I did not hear the reading distinctly, but I believe this is the purport.

At the request of Mr. CAMERON, the resolution was again read.

Mr. CAMERON then moved that the resolution be amended by inserting the words "and publishers" after the word "editors." He believed that Mr. Heiss was known not as editor but as publisher of the Union.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Before any question is taken on the resolution, I would suggest, that as the Senator who introduced it is not now in his place, it would be as well that it be permitted to lie upon the table for the present.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I wish to say one word. I am not opposed to this resolution. Regarding it as an act of clemency—a pardon by the Senate—a mere act of grace—I shall vote for it, and I presume on that ground no Senator will oppose it, and if considered now it will be adopted.

Mr. SEVIER.—The resolution is very clear and explicit in its terms, being intended merely to extend to those gentlemen the same courtesy as others in a like situation are entitled to claim.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to; and the question then being on the adoption of the resolution as amended—

Mr. BERRIEN said: I suppose that the purpose of the mover of this resolution might be accomplished by rescinding the resolution of last session. I am not aware, myself, what are the privileges which are referred to; but I am perfectly content that the purpose of the resolution shall be accomplished. I think that the sense of the Senate, regarding the occurrence which induced the resolution of the last session, was expressed by the passage of that resolution. That purpose being accomplished, I am perfectly willing to see the resolution of this session attained. But I think, though I will not urge it, I think it would be more pertinently accomplished by rescinding the resolution of last session.

Mr. MASON, having returned to his seat, said: When I introduced the resolution, I had hoped that it would be met by those who voted for the resolution of last session, in the spirit in which it has been met by the distinguished Senator from Georgia. I am gratified with it. The resolution is drawn with an earnest desire not to provoke discussion, and although I should acquiesce cheerfully in a proposition to rescind the former resolution, yet I had thought, and still think, and I am still further strengthened in this opinion by conversations which I have had with gentlemen around me, that the resolution will be more acceptable in the form in which it now stands.

Mr. DAYTON.—If the question be put upon the resolution as it now stands, my impression is, that it will be adopted.

The question was then put on agreeing to the resolution as amended, and it was decided in the affirmative.

WIDOW OF COL. McREA.

The bill for the relief of Mary McRea, widow of Lieut. Col. William McRea, late of the United States army, deceased, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TURNEY called for the reading of the report in this case, and it was read by the Secretary.

Mr. CASS sent to the Secretary's table a letter from Mrs. McRea, which was read.

Mr. PEARCE said: When this bill was before the Senate at a former session, I felt it my duty to oppose it, and I shall be compelled to do so now. I think the report contains a very erroneous statement. I find it stated, that if an officer of the navy dies in the service his widow will be entitled to a pension, and that as both military and naval pensions are now paid out of the Treasury, there is no good reason for discriminating between widows of officers of the army, and those of officers of the navy. Well, all this is a mistake. The widow of a naval officer, as I understand it, if the officer be killed in battle, or die from exposure in the service, receives a pension; but not where the officer spends a life in the service, receiving its honors and emoluments, and dies from old age. It is true that when the naval pension fund, created from the earnings of the navy, had accumulated to a large amount, Congress very improvidently passed a law, by which all widows of naval officers were entitled to pensions from the time of the death of their husbands, without reference to the cause or the manner of their death, and so great were the arrearages which were granted to widows under these circumstances, that one of them, I know, received the amount of about twenty thousand dollars. By means of these heavy arrearages being granted the fund became exhausted; and Congress then repealed the act, and now there is no general provision on the subject. This bill is the introduction of a new principle, and one which I think entirely indefensible. Why do we give pensions to the widows of officers of the army or navy? I think it is to repair to them in some degree the injury sustained by them in the loss of their husbands, which has been brought on by exposure in the service. It is partly for this object, and partly to stimulate officers in the performance of their duty.—

Mr. DIX.—Will the Senator allow this subject to pass by informally, as the honorable Senator, who was Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs last year, and who made this report, is not now in his place.

Mr. PEARCE acquiesced, and a motion being made to that effect the bill was laid upon the table.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration, on its third reading, of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have said all that I proposed to say upon the part of the subject to which I called the attention of the Senate yesterday. It is possible, however, that in what I am about to offer to the consideration of the Senate, I shall incidentally refer to it again.

I rise this morning, sir, to speak in the first place, of the actual conduct of this war under the management of the President of the United States. The war was recognized as existing on the 13th of May, 1846. We are now in the month of January, 1848, and to all appearance, the restoration of peace is as far off, and even farther, than it seemed to be on the 13th day of May, 1846. The whole power of the nation, so far as he has deemed it advisable to ask to have that power devolved upon him, has been placed in the hands of the Executive. Not an occasion—although there have been so many and such glorious ones—has presented itself in which the American arms have not been triumphant. And yet there is no peace. My opinion is, and has been throughout, that the reason is to be referred exclusively to the want of vigor with which the war has been prosecuted. We have had an ostentatious and asserted vigor, but we have had nothing else as far as the President is concerned.

I am very far from imputing—because I am incapable of making a charge which I do not believe to be true—I am very far from imputing, that this want of actual vigor has been intentional on the part of the Executive. So far from it, I believe that he has been deluding himself from time to time, with the idea that peace was to be obtained without the effusion of blood—a sad delusion—one which must hereafter constitute a great and overwhelming account of responsibility against himself.

I said yesterday, that it was the march of our troops from the Nueces to the Rio Grande, that was, in my opinion, the immediate cause of the war. I say to-day what I have had occasion to say in other places, over and over again—that I believe that that march of itself, if it had been made with a proper force, would not actually have led to such a result. I have no doubt that if, instead of sending the small but gallant band—the heroes of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma—to the Rio Grande, he had sent from 5,000 to 8,000 men, not a drop of blood would have been shed, and no Mexican ever have ventured to have trodden the soil on this side of the river in hostile attitude. But sir, the war commenced, was recognized, and 50,000 troops, with an unlimited amount of treasure, were freely placed at the disposal of the Executive, together with an implied promise such as to give the President the assurance (if such were needed,) that this unlimited amount could, if the expression may be excused, be made still more unlimited. And yet what has he done? Instead of calling out twenty or thirty or forty or fifty thousand men, as he was authorized to do by the act of the 13th of May, 1846, he and the officers at the head of the War Department called them out by driblets—and announced to the country from time to time that they had a sufficiency of force to conquer a peace. What has been the consequence? That which every man of intelligence who speaks as he thinks must acknowledge—that great and mighty and extraordinary as have been the triumphs of the American arms, they have hardly furnished us anything but the glory attending them. They have, to be sure, illustrated the American character for valor and military skill; but they have served no other purpose. And why, Mr. President? Because each struggle has been at such fearful odds, that the gallant officers in command have been unable to follow it up or profit by the result.

Sir, look at the history of the campaign on the Rio Grande. General Taylor, who, with a few thousand men, marched to Monterey, and succeeded, after a dread and fearful conflict, in carrying that almost impregnably fortified town—was so far crippled that he was unable to hold even the prisoners that he might take. What happened afterwards? The plan of the campaign is changed, some new light dawns upon the mind of the Executive, and Mexico is to be stricken in a different part. There is a point still more vital to be assailed—a point still more certain, if assailed, to lead to the restoration of peace, and of the vindication of our outraged rights. What is done? General Taylor is stripped of what was supposed to be the very flower of his command. The enemy approached. Eight or ten millions of the public property were exposed to be lost, unless preserved by the gallantry and indomitable valor of the few soldiers left behind to guard it. Almost with electric speed it became known at the city of Mexico, and an army such as she had never before marshaled into the field, was organized, amounting to some twenty or twenty-five thousand troops, and led on by their greatest chief.

Mr. President, much as his previous successes had satisfied every American that Taylor, and the officers and men under his command, were competent to accomplish almost any triumph that human power could accomplish, none there was who did not then tremble for their fate? And the fact that they were not utterly annihilated, may be considered almost a military miracle. Disparity of force was comparatively nothing before the energies of American soldiers, and in the annals of former military triumphs, the proudest of them as was accustomed to regard us nothing in comparison with the victories of Buena Vista. They are all thrown in the shade by the brilliant light of an exploit, which, whilst it electrified the American heart, astounded the world.

Let us look now, for a moment, to the conquest of last year. General Scott was compelled to assail the city of Vera Cruz with between 12,000 and 14,000 troops, and to carry at all hazards a castle supposed to be impregnable. He succeeded in accomplishing it, but he has done little or nothing beyond that. Every battle which was fought between Vera Cruz and the capital of Mexico was fought with a disparity of numbers actually appalling. That noble leader was forced to march a distance of 150 or 200 miles, (I forget the exact distance,) into the enemy's country, and for a great portion of the way through a dense population, to assail a city containing 180,000 or 200,000 inhabitants, surrounded by fortifications, which were supposed to be impregnable, and without even the means of keeping up his communication with the seaboard for the purpose of getting supplies. These supplies found their way to him from time to time by the gallantry of the escort, who were obliged to fight foot by foot almost every mile of their progress. And at the end of all his great and extraordinary triumphs, Scott finds himself in the city of Mexico with only some 6,000 soldiers. Now, sir, who does not believe that, if he had started with an army of 30,000 men, although he might then have been deprived of the glory of his many victories, we might have been in possession of the city of Mexico perhaps without the shedding of a drop of blood—American or Mexican? Who can doubt that it is the duty of an Executive managing a war declared to exist by a Christian people, to do what the honorable Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. DAVIS,) said it would be the effect of this bill to accomplish—not to insure a triumph on the battle field, but to avoid a battle by accomplishing success by force of numbers—to break down the moral power of the enemy—to conquer a peace by demonstrating to that enemy that resistance is in vain. All at once (I find no fault with it; on the contrary, I rejoice at it,) the eyes of the Executive have been opened. All at once it seems to be perceived by him, that the war heretofore has not been rigorously prosecuted except on paper. Well, whose fault is it, Mr. President? Who would have borne the dread responsibility, if our gallant little army on the Rio Grande had been sacrificed? Who would have had the equally tremendous responsibility, if those gallant spirits now in the halls of the Montezumas had been sacrificed. The nations of the world would have said, with one accord, the Executive of the United States. Upon him the responsibility for the useless and cruel expenditures of blood and of treasure would have rested. Sir, I make bold to say, in speaking in the presence of those who know infinitely more upon such subjects than I do, that if the President had called out the 50,000 volunteers after hearing of the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, there never would have been another blow struck in Mexico; and peace long since restored. The Mexicans, to be sure, have a high and indomitable spirit, (I speak particularly of that portion of them who have in their veins the true Castilian blood;) but they know there may be a point at which resistance ceases to be a virtue, and they would have seen that that was their condition when they saw a determination on the part of the United States to exert their whole power in the accomplishment of the purpose for which war had been declared.

Who can doubt, that if the Executive of the United States had announced that the purpose of the war was merely to procure indemnity for wrongs, and to vindicate outraged character, and to maintain the honor of our flag; and had placed fifty thousand troops in Mexico, as he might have done, it would have led to a cessation of hostilities? Sir, I think we have no peace, because the President of the United States has not exerted the power which Congress placed in his hands, and which was intended to be exerted. I think, and I therefore charge upon him, that the American blood which has been so freely poured out, has been thus freely poured out because of his error. I think, and I therefore charge upon him, that the millions of money which have been spent, and have yet to be spent, have been and are to be spent, because of his error. This is all that I propose to say, Mr. President, on the manner in which this war has been conducted.

And this leads me to consider very briefly what should be, in my judgment, the mode of its further prosecution. There are only three modes to be resorted to. The first is, to withdraw the troops altogether, if not to the Nueces, to this side of the Rio Grande. The second, to withdraw them to what is termed a defensive line; and, the third, to carry on the war in the heart of the Mexican territory, until Mexico agrees to treat of peace. I prefer the last.

Mr. President, in saying that I prefer the last, I do not wish to be misunderstood. I prefer the last if the end to be obtained is not one which, in my judgment, would tarnish the American name. I prefer the last, if the object to be accomplished is merely the vindication of our violated honor, and indemnity for our heretofore violated rights. But if the purpose of this war with the President of the United States, is to annihilate the nationality of Mexico—if it is the forcible dismemberment of her territory, then I say on my responsibility as a Senator and a man, I would not give him a dollar.

Sir, we live at a time when character is of immense value with nations, as we know it to be with individuals; and if there be any one thing which more than another stains national character, it is using national power to inflict national injustice. And if there be any national crime, more crying and enormous in the opinion of all Christendom, than any other, it is the forcible dismemberment of the territory of a weaker nation.

When I say, Mr. President, that I am for fighting the war out—I mean that I am for fighting it out in order to "accomplish the purpose which we seek to have accomplished," that is to have American rights recognised, and American honor vindicated, and so recognised, and so vindicated as to furnish full and complete security against any subsequent violation.

The two first points to which I have referred, the proposition for withdrawing the troops, and that for taking a defensive line, I have already said, I cannot concur in. To withdraw the troops altogether in my judgment would be national dishonor, and I cannot therefore entertain the idea for a moment. To take a defensive line would not in my judgment lead to peace, but would on the contrary be perpetual war, and so far as expense is to be mentioned in any comparison with the other calamities of war, it would be attended with infinitely greater expense than that of fighting it out. Now sir, the objection to carrying the war on, is the expenditure of money with which it will be necessarily attended, and the consequent derangement of the whole financial condition of the country. My impression is, from some examination which I have given the subject and with an anxious desire to arrive at a satisfactory result—that the war may be carried on in Mexico, without the expenditure of a single American dollar; and of course without affecting the pecuniary condition of the American people, or the pecuniary condition of the government itself. The resources of the Mexican government, Mr. President, even under all the disadvantageous circumstances under which that government has existed, are infinitely greater it seems to me, than is generally supposed. The fact is that until a comparatively recent period, indeed until a short time before the commencement of the war with ourselves, the expenditures of their government have been about $21,000,000 annually. And it has been appropriated to these purposes. They have had an army of 30,000 men, always on pay, costing the government about $10,000,000. They have had a civil list bill of about $6,000,000, and interest to be paid on the public debt to the amount of $5,000,000, making $21,000,000. Their army has been punctually paid, their civil list punctually met, and the interest on the public debt, until, as I have said, a comparatively recent period, has been met with equal punctuality. From what resources, sir? The products of their mines, when they are in full operation; and for a series of years, when in such full operation, they have produced $27,000,000 per year. They charge what is termed a transit duty on all the bullion that is drawn from the mines until it reaches the port of exportation. This transit duty is paid in the form of a permit, granted on the part of the government, to convey the bullion from town to town, the permit being renewed at each terminus until it reaches the place of exportation; and when it gets there, it is subject to an export duty of one per cent. The average amount of these transport duties, until the bullion reaches the place of exportation, is about two and a half or three per cent. The gross amount of bullion drawn from the mines, as I have said, is about $25,000,000. The Senate will easily perceive then, the amount derived from this source, with an average of two and a half or three per cent. as transit duty, and with a specific export duty of one per cent. upon the value of every pound of bullion exported. The next source of revenue and the amount that it raises, it is almost impossible to calculate, or rather to speak more correctly, the amount it would raise if peace was restored to Mexico, if that country was restored to quiet, and business operations were permitted to go on in their ordinary course. This source is the stamp tax. They charge what is termed a stamp tax on every description of contract transferring every description of property, of, or exceeding the value of $300. That is to say, every contract between man and man relative to property worth $300, is to be written upon stamp paper, for which the parties pay to the stamp officers six dollars. But according to their laws, contracts of this description are left in the hands of a Notary and are recorded among the official transactions of the Notary, making it necessary for the parties to the contract, if they desire to have in their possession evidence of the contract, to obtain official copies, and the result is that each one of the parties almost invariably takes a copy of the contract. The copy is also written on stamped paper, and for the copies there is paid six dollars each.

There is another source, and that is a duty on the sale of everything that is sold. Nothing passes from hand to hand by way of sale that does not pay a specific duty, regulated by the amount of the value of the articles so passing. Now, I will not estimate the amount thus derived; it is sufficient for my purpose to state the fact as I understand the fact to be, that the amount of revenue received from these sources has been abundantly sufficient to enable the government of Mexico to meet punctually its disbursements to the amount of 21,000,000 dollars. This amount would support any army which we might put into the field; and this we would have a perfect right to appropriate. Not to seize and confiscate individual property, which is abhorrent to every sense of justice, which would be an act of barbarism—a dishonor to the age in which we live, and a stain upon our national character; but to appropriate the public revenue of the country so as to enfeeble the power of their government, to reduce the military to the same standard as private citizens, and prove, by the fact that we are thoroughly able to enforce it, that the restoration of peace depends on their submission. Now, I believe as confidently as I can anything of which we have any certain knowledge, that by pursuing a course of this description for the purpose of enforcing a termination of this war, we shall not only obtain money as much as is necessary for the support of our army, but that of the money so spent, no portion of it will come from the people of the United States.

Now, I know the objection that may be raised as to the consequence that may result from taking possession of the whole country. I think I can see almost as clearly as does the honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) the result of incorporating the whole of Mexico into this Union; and, if I believed that the object was the incorporation of the whole of Mexico into the Union by the further prosecution of the war, much as I should hang my head in mortification and shame for the honor of my country, I would willingly submit to the withdrawal of the troops, rather than prosecute the war an hour longer. But I do not believe that such is to be the result. I do not believe that the people of the United States would suffer an Executive officer to perpetrate such a wrong, if the Executive even had it in contemplation. I do not believe that they would ever themselves assist an Executive to accomplish such an object. I would have much less confidence in them than I have, if I thought it possible, that the mere lust of rapine, the mere lust of territory, would lead them to dishonor the American name by blotting from existence a neighboring and feebler nation.

I am for prosecuting the war, because I believe the consequence will be to bring Mexico the earlier to her senses, and to prompt her cheerfully to accept terms of peace. And this brings me to say a word or two on what should be, in my opinion, the terms of such a peace.

Now, sir, I speak for myself, though I have no doubt that I speak the sense of most of the friends around me. My honorable friend from South Carolina the other day, in the speech which he did us and the country the honor to deliver, said he believed the people of the United States were irrevocably determined on taking indemnity for the wrongs which we have suffered from Mexico, in territory. I hope he is mistaken. I believe he is mistaken. I believe the people of the United States would be to-morrow contented by a treaty which would make the Rio Grande the boundary. I believe they would be contented with such a treaty, for the purpose of terminating the war, rather than that Mexico should be compelled by the force of our arms to dismember herself. Now, in expressing this hope, and in expressing the opinion that the war might be honorably terminated by taking the Rio Grande as the boundary, I wish it not to be supposed that I am opposed to the acquisition of additional territory. I am against the acquisition of territory by force. I am not opposed to the acquisition of territory of itself, but for one consideration which weighs in my judgment, and which has had heretofore and still has a controlling operation. Mr. President, I fear—I greatly fear, the conflict to which such an acquisition would lead. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. HALE) told the Senate the other day that the true origin of this war lay in the settled purpose on the part of the South to perpetuate and extend slavery. I am not alluding to this now with any design to try conclusions with the honorable Senator on the question of slavery. Sir, he will pardon me for telling him that that is a subject which no Southern man on this floor, when he can avoid it, desires to discuss. He will permit me to tell him, (and I do it with all good feeling, and with all the respect which I hold him as a Senator of the United States) that it has been owing to the exciting discussions on this subject in the North, that slavery now exists in many of the Southern States. He will permit me to tell him, that as far as I know, it has been his course, and that of those whose sentiments he speaks, on this subject, which has done more than anything else towards its perpetuation.

The greatest practical advocates of slavery have been the Senator himself and his particular constituents. Sir, I have my opinions upon this subject as deeply instilled, as can have the Senator from New Hampshire. They were almost born with me; they have been confirmed by the experience of every day of my life. They have been strengthened by the experience of all I have seen around me. I do not choose to express them on this floor unless the question is pressed home. But whilst I have fixed and unalterable convictions as to the mere institution of slavery itself as a political or civil institution, I have another conviction as deeply and irrevocably fixed, and that is a conviction, that the Southern States owe it to themselves, one and all of them, to stand on their own rights, to vindicate their own equality, and exclusively at their own time, and without the interference of others, to meddle in their own way with this peculiar institution. Notwithstanding this, Mr. President, I cannot be blind to all the indications of the times. I cannot but say that the opinions entertained in the North, however erroneous I may think they are, are still honestly entertained. I cannot but say that the Senator from New Hampshire would be false to the implied promise which he has given to the State which sent him here, if he were not to make this condition; I cannot but perceive that it is a popular feeling, which is sweeping like a whirlwind at the North; but there is an equally determined and steady feeling at the South. If these feelings be further excited, there can be but one result; that is deadly conflict, or amicable separation. And when I look at either, Mr. President, my heart sickens at the reflection. Sons of a common ancestry, bound together by common ties, glorying in a common renown, looking in common to a still more glorious future, I cannot but feel my heart sink within me, even at the possibility of such a result. And it is because I believe it will follow if the state of things to which I have alluded shall be brought into existence, and not because I am opposed merely to the acquisition of territory, that I gave my cordial support to the resolution offered upon that subject by the distinguished Senator from Georgia at the last session.

Sir, I am not to be driven into a different course by being told that such a course leaves us a pecuniary loss. With me, Mr. President, loss of money is nothing to the loss of character. With me the boundless wealth of the world would be as nothing, compared with what I should esteem the incalculable loss attending the destruction of our national character. But, sir, it is not true that a peace accomplished on the terms to which I have referred, would leave us without indemnity. Sir, we have indemnity in the history of this war. It is to be found in the many glorious battle-fields which it has presented to an astonished world. It is to be found in the delight which electrified every American heart at the result of every battle. It is to be found in the security which it furnishes against the disturbers of our peace hereafter. A few hundreds of millions, even if it should go to hundreds, that may be expended, will be forgotten even while spoken of—while the glory and renown which it has heaped upon the American character, will be remembered as long as time itself shall endure. I am not, therefore, to be told that peace on such terms would leave us losers, in the true, high and moral sense of the term.

A word on another subject and I cease to trouble the Senate. I have already indicated, Mr. President, my preference of a regular over a volunteer force. Now sir, that preference is founded, (and I have but a word or two in the way of reason to assign for it,) on the opinion which information in my possession has enabled me to form, that the expense of a regular force is much less, and their efficiency infinitely greater; above all, that the sacrifice of human life is less.

Mr. Secretary Poinsett in his letter 21st March 1838, to the Honorable Mr. Speaker Polk, now President, speaking of the comparative expense of the two description of forces, says that "The difference of expense between the employment of this description of troops, (militia, volunteers and indian,) and regulars is at least as 3 to 1; by a fourth, or the wastage attending their ignorance of every administrative branch of the service, the number is reduced to 2 to 1; and by one hundred more, for short periods of service, and the great incapacity that will be made to the Pension List under the provisions of the act of the 14th March, 1836."

Now, sir, the Senate will find how inefficient this description of force is—I mean as compared with regular forces—by turning to Document 297, of the 2d Session 25th Congress. They will there find that volunteer forces were called out in the years '32, '36, '37, and '38, to serve in the Florida War, in the Black-Hawk War, in the War against the Cherokees, and in the State of New York at the time of the Border difficulties, to the number of 55,324. They will find, I am satisfied, that aside from the additional expense attending the employment of these forces, and for the purpose now in view—the superior efficiency of the regulars—that the mortality among volunteers and militia, compared with regulars, is as ten to one. Sir, to what is this owing? It is owing principally to the fact that the officers are unable to subject them to the same state of discipline, and to prevent the exposure which leads to disease.

From the statements to be found among the papers from the War Department, it appears that the number of men enlisted for the line of the regular army, (the old establishment,) for the first five months of 1847, and from January 1st to January 1st, was 4605, the number offering to be enlisted during the same period and rejected, by the recruiting officers, because of physical infirmity, was 4847—more than twice the amount actually received.

Now, I do not mean to underrate the volunteers. God forbid that I should! but I make bold to say, that at least one-half of those who were rejected as unfit for the regular service may be found in the ranks of the volunteers. The chances of mortality in that corps are of course very much increased.

I have said, Mr. President, all I intend to say upon this point; and I ask the attention of the Senate only a moment or two longer, while I add a word or two by way of conclusion. Sir, I have heard it said by some, that this war should be prosecuted because its tendency was to ameliorate the condition of Mexico. I have heard it said that we were constituted missionaries by Heaven, even by fire and by sword and by slaughter, to carry the light of civilization into that benighted land. I have heard that it has been stated even in the pulpit, that we have been selected by Divine Providence, to purify a dark and false religion—to break down their old, ancient and degraded superstitions—to bring them into the blaze of the true faith, and to substitute for it the holier and purer light of the Protestant religion. I have heard it stated, Mr. President, that the war is to be prosecuted in order to enlarge the "area of freedom." I hold to no such doctrine. No, sir.

We need not for the sake of enlarging the area of freedom become propagandists. No physical force is on our part called for to break the bands which bind other people in subje[illegible] There is a silent, but potent moral power progressing through the world, rapidly tending to that consummation. It has its origin in the lesson which our example is teaching. Here is seen perfect personal and political freedom, combined with unexampled national happiness, prosperity, and power. Here is seen that individual equality which nature stamps upon the heart as a right, protected and enjoyed amongst ourselves to an extent never before known, and shielded by a national arm that the nations of the world would in vain attempt to strike down. Yes, sir, our institutions are telling their own story by the blessings they impart to us, and indoctrinating the people everywhere with the principles of freedom upon which they are founded. Ancient prejudices are yielding to their mighty influence. Heretofore severed, and apparently permanent systems of government are falling beneath it. Our glorious mother, free as she has ever comparatively been, is getting to be freer. It has blotted out the corruptions of her political franchise. It has broken her religious intolerance. It has greatly elevated the individual character of her subjects. It has immeasurably weakened the power of her nobles, and by weakening it in one sense has greatly strengthened the authority of her crown, by forcing it to rest for all its power and glory upon the hearts of its people. To Ireland too—impulsive Ireland—the land of genius, of eloquence, and of valor, it is rapidly carrying the blessings of a restored freedom and happiness. In France, all of political liberty which belongs to her, is to be traced to it, and even now, it is to be seen cheering, animating, and guiding the classic land of Italy, making the very streets of Rome itself to ring with shouts of joy and gratitude for its presence. Sir, such a spirit needs no inactivity, and needs no incentive. It admits of neither enlargement nor restraint. Upon its own elastic and never tiring wing, it is now soaring over the civilized world, everywhere bearing its magic and abiding charm. I say, then, try not, seek not to aid it. Bring no physical force to succor it. Such an adjunct would serve only to corrupt and paralyze its effort. Leave it to itself, and, sooner or later, man will be free. Sir, as to this war and its influence upon ourselves, there is much to rejoice at and be proud of. The struggle of '76 demonstrated the deeply seated love of freedom in our sires, and their stern and indomitable purpose to enjoy it or die. The war of 1812, demonstrated the capacity of our institutions to bear such a trial, and nobly was the test borne and the capacity illustrated. The present war has again demonstrated, not only that such mere capacity continues, but that no nation exists endowed with greater military power. Mr. President, the result cannot but redound to our future peace and happiness. It furnishes ample indemnity for all the wrongs and obloquy we have heretofore suffered, and ample—ample security against their recurrence. Such a result has won for us national glory, and that is national power, stronger than thousands of fortresses, and as perpetual as, I hope in God, will be our nation's love of virtue and of freedom.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Before I give my vote on this bill, sir, I desire to know from the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, whether either of the commanders-in-chief of the American army, General Scott or General Taylor, has requested such an addition as he proposes to make to the American army; whether either of them has desired the Department to recommend to Congress the raising of thirty regiments, these ten regiments of regulars, and the twenty regiments of volunteers.

Mr. CASS.—Before answering the specific question proposed by the gentleman from Delaware, I desire to correct some erroneous opinions which have been advanced respecting the amount of the force which we have now in the field, and the number to which the proposed augmentation would carry it. The Senator from South Carolina, in his remarks the other day, carried the force we should have, if the proposed bill pass, to 70,000, and the Senator from Kentucky carried it still higher, to at least 90,000 men. These estimates are far beyond the amount we shall have in the field, as the following statement will show:

Under General [illegible] in the Department of New Mexico, [illegible]
Under General [illegible] in California, [illegible]
Under General [illegible] in Missouri, [illegible]

Total, [illegible]

The following statement will show the amount of force we shall have under General Scott, in the event of the passage of this bill, and of the volunteer bill:

[illegible] Regulars, on the date of the Adjutant General's Report, which includes officers and men sick and disabled, and the garrisons of Tampico and Vera Cruz, there were under General Scott's command in Mexico, [illegible] 15,101
volunteers, 15,055

Total, 32,156

[illegible] regiment of Volunteers from Michigan, and [illegible] from Arkansas, not [illegible] Mississippi, which [illegible] to 2,500 men. But, as stated by the Adjutant General, they cannot be full; and he estimates that they will probably [illegible] Volunteer establishment to a [illegible] number.

[illegible] opportunity to relieve the regulars on guard [illegible] that duty, as the honorable Senator from Kentucky, respecting the regiment of volunteers from Michigan, by assuring him, that I have received a letter from the colonel, written upon the route, and that he is [illegible] Cincinnati or upon the Ohio, with six companies of his regiment; and, I trust, the others have already followed him.

The Adjutant General, agreeably to a table in my hand, estimates the number of fighting men, or in military language, bayonets, including the garrisons at Tampico and Vera Cruz, and sick and disabled, at 28,862
Of this number, the Adjutant General calculates that there are not more [illegible] 24,000

[illegible] supposed to be [illegible]

Ten regiments of Infantry, the legal establishment of each being 1,000 men. But this can never be kept full, and experience shows that there must be a deduction from it of about 25 per cent. making this force, say 7,500
A volunteer force of 12,500 to supply vacancies in the existing volunteer establishment, which, subject to the same deduction, would give, say 9,500

[illegible] 11,000
Or an actual total, including the garrisons of Vera Cruz and Tampico, and the [illegible] 45,362

How many of the above are twelve months volunteers the returns do not show. [illegible] and they cannot, therefore, be calculated upon in the [illegible] campaign.

The proviso for raising 20,000 new volunteers is not included in the above, because the measure is a more precautionary one, which ordinary prudence suggests, and the force is not to be called out but in the event of some unforseen occurrence which may render it necessary.

It will thus be seen sir, that if these bills pass, the force they will enable the Government to add to the troops under General Scott will probably bring the number of fighting men to about 41,000, and that no reasonable calculation can be made on more than between 45,000 and 46,000.

The error of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky consists in this, that he assumes as he did in his remarks on this subject a few days since, the number of the legal establishment if it were full, as the number which the Government can keep in the field. Now sir, all experience shows, that such a result is not practicable. Large deductions must be made, and, it appears from the Reports of the Adjutant General, that the actual force maintained is, as I have already stated, about twenty five per cent less than the full number allowed by law. Recruiting depots cannot be kept filled, even by the most strenuous exertions, and the perpetually recurring casualties of war, occasion a constant drain, which must be as constantly supplied. And a considerable deduction must be at all times made on account of sickness. I need not enter into any particular detail upon this subject. The considerations cannot escape the most casual observer.

If therefore all the men raised under these two bills are sent to General Scott, they will give him the force I have already indicated. It is obvious that the force under General Wool can under no circumstances be diminished, for it is barely sufficient to protect the country subjected to us upon the Rio Grande.

To come now, sir, to the question asked by the Honorable Senator from Delaware, I have to say that the Government has received from Gen. Scott an estimate of the force he deems necessary to carry into effect the plan of operations which is recommended by the Secretary of War. I will read so much of his projet as relates to this subject.

An army [illegible] to enable them to occupy at the same time nearly all the State capitals and other principal cities; to drive guerilla and other robbing parties from the great highways of trade; to seize into our hands all the ordinary revenues of the country internal as well as external, for the support of the occupation, and to keep the central government in constant motion and alarm, until constrained to [illegible] peace."

Having thus answered the question of the Honorable Senator from Delaware, I yield him the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Md.—What is the date of that letter?

Mr. CASS.—I do not believe that I have got the date. But the letter says that if the operations should be continued till October the augmentation of the forces would be necessary. I presume, therefore, that the letter was written in September.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Is the letter to be found amongst the documents which have been published?

Mr. CASS.—No. The government did not deem it prudent to publish the letter, but it is now thought proper to make known the portion of it which has been read.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I understand that the honorable Senator from Michigan endeavors to show that in the opinion of General Scott, on the communication of the project of the government to him—I do not ask for particulars farther than they are disclosed in the portion of the letter read—for the further military operations of the army of the United States in Mexico, there will be needed an augmentation of that force to the amount of fifty thousand men.

Mr. CASS.—An augmentation making the force amount to fifty thousand men.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I understand—that the force be augmented till it amount to fifty thousand.

Mr. CASS.—That is the amount at which he estimates the force necessary to carry on the military operations.

Mr. WEBSTER.—In other words, that is the force which the projects of the government will render necessary.

Mr. BADGER.—Will the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs allow me to ask on what plan of a campaign—on what system of the future prosecution of the war, does General Scott say that fifty thousand men will be necessary?

Mr. CASS.—If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not believe it to be necessary to state any thing farther. I have read all that has a bearing on the question before the Senate.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—With the permission of the honorable Senator from Delaware, who is entitled to the floor, I would now take the opportunity of correcting a slight misapprehension under which I labored on a former occasion, when I stated the amount of military force now in the field in Mexico, by making the statement as I derive it from public documents, and in regard to which I am happy to find, that as far as it goes, I have the pleasure of agreeing very much with the honorable Senator from Michigan. There are now in Mexico, when the regiments from Michigan and the two battalions now on the way shall have reached the army, 45,700 men. In addition to that, the Executive is now invested with the power of enlisting upwards of seven thousand regulars, besides 12,500 volunteers to supply the place of those who have not engaged for the war—making in all 65,000 men. If you add to that, upon a conjectural estimate—I suppose not far from the truth—five thousand seamen and marines also engaged in the war, you will then have a numerical force, naval and military, amounting to 70,000 men. If, again, you add to that, the proposed increase of the army by the whole amount of these two bills, 20,000 volunteers and 10,000 regulars, you will have an army of an hundred thousand men; besides the numerous employees of one character or another, following the army—making an aggregate of at least 110,000 men. At this moment, including the sailors and marines and followers of the army, you are paying and feeding not less than from 55,000 to 65,000 men. This is the statement, sir, on which, as I conceive, the Senate has to vote upon this bill.

Mr. CASS.—If the honorable Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I must repeat the correction which I made the other day, and at the same time refer him to the statement presented but a few minutes since. I repeat, sir, that the provision for raising 20,000 new volunteers does not bear upon the question before us. Not a man will be raised, nor a dollar expended, unless a state of things should happen which cannot be reasonably anticipated. And in such an event prudence requires that the Government should be enabled to act and to call out an arriere force, which is the object of that portion of the bill Why the honorable Senator includes 5000 seamen and marines in his estimate of the means for prosecuting the war in the interior of Mexico, I cannot conjecture. Surely they will add nothing to the force to be employed by General Scott in the subjugation of the Mexican government and people. I repeat, sir, the error of the honorable gentleman consists in his considering the legal establishment and the aggregate force as the same thing. I have shown the deduction it is necessary to make from the former. in order to exhibit the real amount of the latter. After this is done, the Senator will find that the force I have stated of from 41,000 to 46,000 men is the true one, which will be placed at the disposition of General Scott, and which is less by some thousands than the force he considers necessary to carry on the plan of operations commended by the Secretary of War. The Executive, therefore, in calling upon Congress to pass the bills under consideration, has had the best authority—that of the commanding general himself, for the amount of force recommended.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I am well aware of the casualties to which the army in the field is subject, and especially when exposed to such a climate as that of Mexico, which renders it very difficult to know what portion of the troops is efficient, and I only stated, that from the official returns, there appeared to be 45,000 men now in Mexico.

Mr. CASS, (in his seat.)—Forty-three thousand.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—And the two regiments from Michigan, which the gentleman supposes I will be very happy to hear are on the way, besides the two battalions also on the way to join the army.

Mr. CASS.—Will the Senator pardon me if I interrupt him one moment? These twenty-two hundred men will no more than suffice to fill up the volunteer forces.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Still there would be left in round numbers 45,000 men, together with the 5,000 seamen and marines, actually engaged in this war, making an aggregate force of 50,000 men in Mexico. Now what is to be deducted from this number on account of the casualties of battle, and of climate, to which the gentleman referred? I cannot well make a calculation; but I am startled at the estimate which the Senator presents, that one fourth of these are to be struck down! Why that cannot be; and, sir, the gentleman must recollect that under these inevitable casualties, which I admit—you have been all the time endeavoring to supply the ranks of enlistments throughout the country. Enlistments have been continually going on. You can hardly take up a newspaper in which you do not find a notice of the sailing of some detachment of troops for Mexico. Not a week passes in which a vessel with soldiers does not sail from some port in the United States. That has been the case throughout the war. Now is it possible that this devouring war consumes men faster than you can ship them thither? Why, when I was journeying to this place there were some hundreds of regulars going on from Newport on the Ohio river; and I see in the newspapers frequent notices of the transportation of troops to Mexico. We have been all the time diligently recruiting, and will not the deficit be supplied in that way? Another thing is to be borne in mind. Nearly the whole amount of those troops which have been thus despatched, have not encountered the casualties of the field. The casualties which battle brought upon the forces occurred before the arrival of these reinforcements. The twenty thousand men that have gone there lately have not been engaged in a single battle. They arrived in the healthy season. They were healthy and robust men that went. Is it indeed true, that twenty-five per cent. of all these fresh troops have fallen under the influence of the climate and disease? No—I trust not. We have not less than 35,000 men making every possible deduction, besides those sick and temporarily disabled. Is not that a sufficient force? Mexico, sir, will be conquered in six weeks, and we shall all know it and admit it. The question will then no longer be about defensive lines, and about diplomacy, and negotiation, and treaty, but about the conquered prize lying at our feet. Beyond all doubt, the question then will be, "what shall we do with this conquered prize?" Sir, San Luis Potosi and Zacatecas, I venture to say, will be taken, from every account, in less than six weeks from this day. Will Mexico then be conquered? She is now conquered as every body knows.—There is nothing left, then, but Queretaro—our conquests are becoming so spacious that I can scarcely describe them by their proper names, and I dare say, I am not correct in the pronunciation now—and Querataro is spared only because there glimmers the last flickering light of a government which exists in the country. There is the phantom of a congress and a government, and Querataro remains uncaptured, not from any want of power, but because you would there nurse that government into something with which you can make a treaty! Why, I see that General Scott has been giving passports to the legislators who constitute this government to go safely to what they call their new seat of government! This is the condition of things in Mexico. Surely, surely we may now safely assume that Mexico is conquered.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I have not yet obtained from the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the precise information which I sought. I did not desire to excite a discussion on the question as to the amount of military force at present in Mexico, but I put the question, whether our military commanders in Mexico had recommended this measure on which we are called upon to vote. In reply to the inquiry, as I understand, the honorable Chairman of the Committee says that one of them—General Scott—did, some time during the last year, write a letter recommending, that in a certain event the military establishment in Mexico should be increased to 50,000 men. Will the honorable Senator tell me the date of the letter?

Mr. CASS.—It was written after the arrival of its writer in Mexico, but how long after, I do not know.

Mr. CLAYTON.—After the capture of the city?

Mr. CASS.—Certainly; he distinctly alludes to that event.

Mr. CLAYTON.—It was written, then, after the capture of the city of Mexico. There is no intelligence, as I understand, from General Taylor that any additional forces were requisite. Am I right in the conjecture?

Mr. CASS.—What did the honorable Senator ask?

Mr. CLAYTON.—Did General Taylor on any occasion recommend such an addition to the military force?

Mr. CASS.—I understand the Senator as inquiring whether General Taylor had made the same recommendation as General Scott. I have told all I know about the recommendation of General Scott, and do not know whether General Taylor made a similar recommendation.

Mr. CLAYTON.—There is nothing, then, from General Taylor. He has made no recommendation to add to the troops in Mexico; and as to General Scott, the honorable Chairman is able to inform me, that some time last year, as he thinks, "after the capture of the city of Mexico," General Scott wrote to the department informing them, that if certain things intended to be done by the Administration were attempted, 50,000 men would be required to be added to the army.

Mr. CASS.—I beg your pardon, sir—raise the forces to 50,000 men; not add that amount.

Mr. CLAYTON.—That's the very understanding I had and was corrected in it. Well, that increase of the army to 50,000 men, as I understand from the reading of the letter from General Scott, was to be made in case the Administration should design to subjugate—to reduce all Mexico.

Mr. CASS.—Oh! no.

Mr. CLAYTON.—That is the amount of it, as I understand. If in error, I will be happy to be corrected.

Mr. CASS.—The Senator is at liberty to put his own construction on the letter; but the object was stated to be "to keep the central government in motion." I will read the passage again.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—We shall be glad to hear it again.

Mr. CASS then read the passage already given, and added: The substance of the letter has been given in a St. Louis paper which came here within the last few days.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Well, that is what I call reducing or subjugating the country. Others will put their own construction on it. This increased force then, is not recommended by General Scott; but, he says to the Department, "if you propose to take all the capitals of the States of Mexico—if you intend not only to put down the guerillas and bandits, but to keep the central government of Mexico constantly in motion, allowing it no fixed place in which it can treat with you—if you purpose also, to take possession of the revenues of the country, then you will require such an addition to the army now here as will raise it to 50,000 men."—General Scott, it will be perceived, does not recommend that such an addition shall be made to the army; he only says to the War Department, that if they design to adopt a certain course of procedure, that it will be necessary to increase the army to that amount. Pray, sir, what do you call keeping the central government in motion—occupying the State capitals—and seizing the revenues of Mexico? I call it subjugation of the country and annihilation of the government of Mexico. Well, now, the President of the United States disavows that in his message. He declares that he is opposed to the annihilation of Mexico as a republic. Yet the proposition now is to augment the forces in Mexico, on the ground that such an increase is necessary in order to attain objects which are, as I consider, tantamount to the entire subjugation of the country.

It has been stated by my friend from Kentucky—and I think he has fully sustained it—that the force at present under the command of Scott and Taylor, or Wool, in the absence of Taylor, amounts to 45,000 men; and we are now called on to increase the army to 30,000 more in order to overrun all Mexico, in order to occupy the capitals of all the States of Mexico, and to seize upon the entire revenues of the country. In other words, as I understand it, to annihilate Mexico as a nation, and to destroy her government, does not require any thing like the force which the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs now asks the Senate to vote. If you add thirty regiments—twenty regiments of volunteers and ten regiments of regulars to the troops already in the field, you will have a vastly greater force than the commanding general of the army considers necessary for all the purposes specified in the letter. It is well known to my brother Senators here, that during the last session and the previous one, I voted upon all occasions, when bills were presented to this body to increase the army of the United States, or to furnish supplies for the army, in favor of those bills. I took the ground that whether the administration of the country was right or wrong in the inception of this war, I should vote more troops and more supplies for our armies in order to sustain the honor and interests of the country, so long as my vote might be needed to sustain that honor and those interests. Nor shall I, in the course which I am about to take with regard to this bill, in the least change my purpose in regard to this matter, as originally formed. If the same issues were now before me which were presented at the last session, I should vote precisely as I voted then. But totally different is the question now presented. On all former occasions the President of the United States, and his friends on this floor, disavowed any intention of conquest, or acquisition of territory by conquest. They invariably declared that their object was not to obtain Mexican territory by robbery or conquest. They fought, it was declared, for a fair and honorable peace, and for indemnity for the injuries which we had received at the hands of Mexico. But what now is the issue, presented to the American Senate, by the bill upon your table? Allow me here to read from the Message of the President, so that there may be no ground for any allegation of misstatement or misapprehension. Let us hear from the President himself, the objects which he has in view, and the purposes for the accomplishment of which he desires these additional troops. The President says:

> In the same manner, as Mexico refused to indemnify us, we should adopt means to enforce exact justice. Accordingly, instead of one, we took possession of two provinces, and instead of a small, we added a large territory. Both were conquered by the arms of New Mexico and the Californias were taken possession of by the land and naval forces under orders to conquer and hold them as conquests, pending the negotiations of a treaty of peace.
> These provinces are ours, to the exclusion of all foreign powers, and have been so for many months, and on this point Mexico has long ceased within their limits. I suppose that they should never be surrendered to Mexico.

And, again, he says on the same page:

> Besides New Mexico and the Californias, those are other Mexican provinces which have been reduced to our possession by conquest. These other Mexican provinces are now governed by our military and naval commanders, under the general authority which we could not obtain a right over by the mere act of war. They should continue to be held as a means of securing Mexico to accede to just terms of peace.

The question then arises, what are these "terms of peace"—what the President considers to be "just," and on which he means to insist? By turning to the eighth page of his message you will find an answer to this inquiry. You will there discover the views of the Executive with regard to "just terms of peace." It has been said in the progress of debate, that the President attempted to negotiate after the battles of Contreras and Cherubusco—that he made an effort to treat with the Mexican commissioners—having sent Mr. Trist to Mexico for that purpose. In his message he communicates the purport of the instructions given to Mr. Trist, and his own "ultimatum."

> The commissioner of the United States was authorized to agree to the established point of the Rio Grande as the boundary from the entrance into the Gulf to the intersection with the southern boundary of New Mexico, in north latitude about thirty-two degrees, and to obtain a cession to the United States of the provinces of New Mexico and the Californias, and the privilege of the right of way across the isthmus of Tehuantepec. The boundaries of the Rio Grande and the cession to the United States of New Mexico and Upper California constituted an ultimatum which our commissioner was, under no circumstances, to yield.

Here we have the President's "just terms of peace," as he calls them;—his "ultimatum" is definitely announced, and we are no longer left, as during the two last sessions, to conjecture—to guess at the objects and intentions of the President of the United States in regard to Mexico. It is now certain that he has demanded as an ultimatum, and means to demand hereafter as his ultimatum, the cession to the United States of the Californias, and the whole of New Mexico—a territory embracing, at least, 690,000 square miles of land—more than twice the entire territorial extent of the "old thirteen States" at the time of the American Revolution! And I am called upon to give a vote which shall enable the President to enforce these "terms of peace!" I am called upon to give a vote that shall enable him to compel Mexico to cede the whole of New Mexico and the Californias to this country. I have no choice left. I must at once, take up my position, and say whether I am in favor of the acquisition and conquest of all this vast region, or whether I am opposed to it.

I must confess that I do not understand the argument of my honorable friend from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON.] He concluded, as I understood, with an expression of his resolution to vote for this bill. He told us to-day, that if the people of the United States were consulted, he verily believed, the great mass of them would decide against the acquisition of any territory on the western side of the Del Norte. The Senator thought that the people of the United States would go with him for acquisition of territory by way of indemnity and not by way of robbery, but in payment of the debt which is justly due us by Mexico. He thought that the people would go with him so far as to defend the country between the Nueces and the Rio Bravo; but he had no doubt that the people of the United States were clearly opposed, and would so declare themselves whenever called upon, to the acquisition of any territory on the other side of the Rio Bravo. Now, I cannot understand how my friend, having arrived at these conclusions, being thus satisfied as to the popular will, can reconcile it to himself to vote for this immense addition to the army of the United States, when the object of the augmentation of the military establishment is plainly avowed by the President to be the extension of his conquests over the whole of this country on the other side of the Rio Bravo, and the acquisition of both the Californias and New Mexico. If my honorable friend can reconcile that by the exercise of all his ingenuity, I should like to hear him do so. For my part I cannot comprehend it. Without reflecting on his course, however, my business is to point out my own.

Before I proceed farther in the argument on this question, I desire to say, for one, that I never have been, and I am not now willing to acquire one acre of ground from Mexico, or any other nation under heaven, by conquest or robbery. I hold that in all our transactions with the other nations of the world, the great principle ought to be maintained by us that "honesty is the best policy;" and that an honorable negotiation is of more value to a country than land or money. I hold that any attempt on our part, merely because we happen to possess superior strength, to compel a weaker nation to cede to us all that we choose to demand as indemnity, whilst we at the same time admit that we ask for more than she owes us, is nothing else but robbery. If a man owes me a sum of money, and if when I meet him on the highway, he replies to my demand that he has not wherewithal to meet it, and I should insist with a pistol pointed to his breast, that he should deliver to me a deed of his farm at the estimate which I choose to put upon it, I think there could not be much difference of opinion as to the nature of that transaction. I should like to know how my friend from Maryland, who is an able lawyer, would defend under an indictment the man guilty of such conduct. Would it be any palliation, or excuse, or justification of the conduct of his client, in such a case, that the money was justly due him? Could there be found in Christendom, a court and jury that would hesitate as to the verdict in such a case? And what, let me ask—as a friend near me (Mr. WEBSTER,) suggests, what would be the value of the deed obtained in such circumstances? If the possessor of it should even go "unwhipt of justice," would he not be the object to which the scornful finger of every honest man would be pointed, so long as he lived upon the earth? I hold,—and however old fashioned the notion may be, I shall maintain it so long as I have a seat here—that character is as valuable to a nation as it is to an individual; and inasmuch as I would scorn as a private citizen to despoil my neighbor of his property in these circumstances and with these avowals, so as a public man, I never can sanction in the slightest degree such a course of conduct on the part of the government of the country.

We are one of the strongest nations of the earth. We have been amongst the weakest. In times gone by we have suffered from the cruelty, the tyranny, and injustice of other nations, and have uttered loud complaints. We have now waxed strong, and can put the foot upon the neck of a sister republic, and compel her to yield to the terms we ourselves dictate. The question now comes up, and it addresses itself to every genuine lover of his country, whether the acquisition of all this territory in those circumstances, would compensate us for the loss of the reputation—that high national character which we have hitherto sustained? Do not understand me as opposing the just claims of my own country. I would go as far to enforce those claims consistently with the honor of the country, as any man living. So far as the prosecution of war for the purpose of securing just indemnity for these claims might be concerned, I would go as far as he who, on the other side of the chamber, goes farthest. But the President distinctly tells you, that when Mr. Trist made the proposition to the Mexican Commissioners to negotiate, the terms were to be defined by him, and that they were to be submitted to by Mexico at "the cannon's mouth."

Here the Senator yielded to a motion to adjourn, the usual hour of adjournment having arrived.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 12, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of Eliza A. Mellon, widow of a deceased army officer, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. YULEE submitted additional documents relating to the claim of Isaac Varnes, senior, which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. YULEE submitted an additional document relating to the claim of Gad Humphreys; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. YULEE presented a memorial of citizens of Florida, praying that the Land Office for the Alachua Land District, may be located at Flemington in Marion county in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Mary Willington and others, praying the adoption of pacific measures for terminating the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Indiana, praying the immediate withdrawal of the troops of the United States from Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Indiana, praying that all further supplies for the prosecution of the war with Mexico may be withheld by Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of female inhabitants of Kennebunk, in Maine, praying the immediate withdrawal of the troops of the United States from Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of female inhabitants of the counties of Carroll, Harrison, and Tuscarawas, Ohio, praying the adoption of pacific measures for terminating the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of female inhabitants of Leominster, Massachusetts, praying the adoption of measures for the speedy termination of the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of ministers and laymen of the Unitarian denomination, praying the adoption of pacific measures for terminating the war with Mexico, and the reparation of all wrongs that may have been done by the United States to that Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HALE said:—Mr. President—I have been requested by the gentleman from whom I have received this last memorial, to say a word in explanation of its character, and in order to obviate an exception which may arise in some minds from an inspection of the petition itself, that it is of a sectarian character, coming only from a single denomination. The answer to this is, that it originated with that class who were desirous of doing what they might for arresting what they considered a great and alarming evil. They had neither the time nor the means for associating with themselves the various other denominations which divide the Christian world, and therefore did not feel authorized to speak in the name or on behalf of the Church universal. This alone accounts for the apparent sectarian character of the petition on its face. But, Mr. President, it will be seen, on examining the substance of the petition, that it is far from being obnoxious to such a reproach, but on the other hand asks for measures eminently Christian in their character, and in which all of every name and sect may unite, who believe in that original test of discipleship laid down by the Author of our religion, who, when arraigned before the Roman Governor, said, "if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight."

Mr. President, having so recently declared my sentiments in my place in the Senate concerning the objects and character of this war, it is unnecessary for me to add a word at this time, and I leave it in the hands of the Senate, simply remarking, that among the marks of public favor with which I have been honored, the being selected as the agent to present this petition to the Senate, is most grateful to my feelings, and that, whether I look to the character of the petitioners or the objects for which they pray,

Mr BRADBURY submitted an additional document relating to the claim of John O. Means; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. NILES, it was Ordered, That the petition of Mr. S. W. Chilson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. DICKINSON, it was Ordered, That Joseph Roby have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. CAMERON, it was Ordered, That Henry W. Andrews have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

CLAIMS ON MEXICO.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom had been referred the Resolution to create a Board to ascertain and determine the amount of each of the claims of the citizens of the United States against Mexico, reported the same with an amendment.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom had been referred the petition of William Pumphrey, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Jacques Moulon; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom had been referred the memorial of the heirs of Abner L. Duncan, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom had been referred the petition of Nahum Haskell, reported a bill for the relief of Richard Bloss and others; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom had been referred the memorial of George Petty, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom had been referred the document relating to the Claim of Fernando Felhany, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, also submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON of La., from the Committee on Pensions, to whom had been referred the documents relating to the claim of Peter Engles, senior, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of La., from the Committee on Pensions, to whom had been referred the documents relating to the claim of Elizabeth Pistole, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Elizabeth Pistole, widow of Charles Pistole deceased.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom had been referred the memorial of Jesse Turner, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom had been referred the petition of Jesse D. Elliott, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Jesse D. Elliott; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom had been referred the memorial of William M. Glendy, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, it was Ordered, That the Committee on pensions, be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Mary D. Wade, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill for the relief of William B. Slaughter, late Secretary of the territory of Wisconsin; and no amendment being it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

U. S. COURTS IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom had been referred the bill to change the times of holding the District Courts of the United States for the western district of Virginia, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendments.

CONICAL VENTILATOR.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom had been referred the bill directing the Secretary of the Navy to purchase from Dr. James P. Espy, his patent-right for the Conical Ventilator, for the use of the United States, reported the same without amendment.

FORWARD OFFICERS OF THE EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom had been referred the memorial of the forward officers of the late exploring expedition, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for their relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

JUDGE OF THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

On motion by Mr. ASHLEY, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of George H. Lee, and others.

ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. DICKINSON:

Resolved, That true policy requires the government of the United States to designate its political and commercial relations upon the continent by the annexation of such contiguous territory as may conduce to that end and consistent with the principles that neither in such acquisition nor in the territorial organization thereof can any conditions be constitutionally imposed, or institutions be provided for or established, inconsistent with the right of the people thereof to form a free sovereign State, with the powers and privileges of the original members of the Confederacy.

Resolved, That in organizing a territorial government for territory belonging to the United States, the principles of self-government upon which our federative system rests, will be best promoted—the true spirit and meaning of the Constitution be observed, and the confederacy strengthened, by leaving all questions concerning the domestic policy therein to the legislatures chosen by the people thereof.

Mr. DICKINSON said:—

We are admonished by the exigencies of the times and the prevailing sentiment of the American people, to stregthen our political and commercial relations upon this continent and the annexation of such contiguous territory as can be justly obtained, as well for the positive benefits the acquisition may confer, as to shut out forever, as far as practicable, the pernicious influences, and impertinent intermeddings of European monarchy: and while the circumstances under which this policy may properly be enforced, are too varied and contingent to be enumerated or suggested, the state of our relations both foreign and domestic, demand that it be fully declared before the world. We have been compelled by misguided Mexico, to resort to the ultima ratio of nations for an adjustment of grievances. With her capitol, her ports, her fortifications and principal towns in our possession, she spurns all proposals for accommodation, and we have no alternative left consistent with national spirit or self respect, but to retain of the possessions allotted us by the tribunal of her own selection, ample indemnity for the wrongs she has heaped upon our government and people. But should she in some sane moment consent to negotiate, she can furnish indemnity only in territory and this government can accept of no terms but such as give full compensation; so that whether we have peace or war, treaty or no treaty, the question of territorial acquisition cannot be avoided. Had we remained at peace with Mexico, the same policy of acquisition would sooner or later have been presented, and should a treaty of peace be negotiated, and a full indemnity be paid in money, of which there is no prospect, the question of extending our possessions could not long be postponed. Although clearly demanded by national interests and almost universally favored by the American people, this policy has been embarrassed by an element of irritation calculated to arrest if not defeat it altogether. Some who profess to favor it, do so only upon condition that domestic slavery shall be prohibited by Congress in any acquired territory—other swith marked determination oppose any increase with such restrictions, and both these classes propose to co-operate with the opponents of acquisition unless their peculiar views respectively are adopted.

Believing that a policy so eminently national, should not thus be defeated, or put at hazard—that the legislation of Congress can have little influence over the domestic regulation of territory, that its temporary government is a matter of secondary importance compared with the policy of acquisition, and that its domestic regulation may be safely entrusted to those most deeply interested in the institutions they may establish, I have introduced these resolutions. They were presented that the Senate might form and pronounce its judgment before the country, upon the two great questions embraced therein, which engage so large a share of the public consideration. They do not, as is supposed by some, bring here with its proitless discussions and exciting consequences, the vexed question of slavery, for it was here before them, but they propose to transfer it hence, and leave under the constitution all questions concerning the erection or prohibition of this institution in the territories, to the inhabitants thereof; that its intrusion may not hereafter arrest the policy, defeat the measures or disturb the councils of the nation. They were offered in the hope that all who believe in the great cardinal principle of freedom—the capacity of man for his own government, would harmonise conflicting opinions and unite upon this common ground of justice and equality.

The people of the original States declared that to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity, they established the Constitution. Although the articles of confederation which gave place to this instrument, provided for the admission of Canada to the Union, and the comprehensive terms employed to explain the objects of the Constitution, show that no narrow territorial boundaries were contemplated, it is apparent that few statesmen at that early period foresaw the early growth we were destined to attain. The wisest and ablest of the time, timidly negotiated for years. at the close of the last century, for the right of navigating the Mississippi, and proposed to fix upon that river as the western boundary of the United States forever.

And in negotiating for the territory of Louisana, our government sought to procure only a portion, and the greatest share was virtually taken upon compulsion. The policy which from one acquisition, has already given to this Union four sovereign States, and holds others in reserve, was at the time assailed with a virulence and denunciation, and threats of disunion, which may be profitably consulted rather than copied by those who are alarmed by, or propose to repeat the cry of territorial aggrandizement.

Louisana, too, was a Spanish province, contained a foreign population, strangers to our form of government, and was transferred with its people from Spain to France, and from France to the United States within a few hours; and yet, what State has been more faithful to the Union, or more ably represented!

Territory beyond the Mississippi was then regarded as almost without the pale of probable civilization, and the expedition of Lewis and Clark to the mouth of the Columbia, where the mail of the United States is now regularly distributed, was hailed as an epoch in the history of North American enterprise and daring.

But the tide of emigration and the course of Empire have since been westward. Cities and towns have sprung up upon the shores of the Pacific, and the river we essayed to fix as our western, now passes nearest to our eastern boundary. From three, our population has increased to twenty millions—from thirteen, to twenty-nine States, with others in the process of formation and on their way to the Union. Two great European powers have withdrawn from the continent, yielding us their possessions, and from the Northern Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico—from the St. Lawrence to the Mississippi, numerous aboriginal nations have been displaced before the resistless tide of our prevailing arts, arms and free principles; and whoever will look back upon the past, and forward upon the future, must see, that, allured by the justice of our institutions, before the close of the present century, this continent will teem with a free population of upwards of an hundred million souls. Nor have we yet fulfilled the destiny allotted us. New territory is spread out for us to subdue and fertilize, new races are presented for us to civilize, educate and absorb new triumphs for us to achieve for the cause of freedom.

North America presents to the eye one great geographical system; every portion of which, under the present facilities for communication, may be made more accessible to every other than were the original States to each other at the time they formed the confederacy—it is soon to become the commercial centre of the world. And the period is by no means remote, when man, regarding his own wants and impulses, and yielding to the influences of laws more potent than those which prescribe artificial boundaries, will ordain that it shall be united in political as well as natural bonds, and form but one political system, and that a free, confederated, self-governed republic, represented in a common Hall in the great valley of the west—exhibiting to an admiring world the mighty results which have been achieved for freedom in the western hemisphere. Then will a more perfect Union be formed, and justice be established upon enduring foundations—the domestic tranquility insured—the common defence be provided for—the general welfare promoted, and the blessings of liberty secured to posterity.

Our form of government is admirably adapted to extended em-place. Founded in the virtue and intelligence of the people, and deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed, its influence was as powerful for good at the remotest limits as at the political centre.

We are unlike all communities which have gone before us, and illustrations drawn from comparing us with them, are unjust and erroneous. The sacred order which [illegible] unlike the military republics of other times, as is the religion of the Savior of men to the impositions of Mahomet. Our system wins by its justice, while theirs sought to terrify by its power. Our territorial boundary comprehends [illegible] quadrupled, and the number of our States be doubled, without inconvenience or danger. Every member of the confederacy would still sustain itself, and contribute its influences for the general good—every pillar would stand erect, and impart strength and beauty to the edifice. In matters of national legislation a numerous population, extended territory, and diversified interests, would tend to reform abuses which would otherwise remain unredressed, to preserve the rights of the States, and to bring back the course of legislation from the centralism to which it is hastening. One-half the legislation now brought before Congress would be left undone, or [illegible] large portion of the residue would be presented to the consideration of State legislatures; and Congress would be enabled to dispose of all matters within the scope of its legitimate functions without inconvenience or delay.

The present political relations of this continent cannot long continue, and it becomes this nation to be prepared for the change which awaits it. If the subjects of the British crown shall consent to be ruled through all time by a distant cabinet, Mexico cannot long exist under the misrule of marauders and their pronunciamentos, and this was as clearly apparent before as since the existence of the war. If, then, just acquisition is the true policy of this government, [illegible] would be pursued in connection with a yielding purpose, and characterised by the sternest principles of national justice. It should not rashly anticipate the great results which are in progress, or thrust aside the fruits when they are produced and presented. The national existence of Mexico is in her own keeping, but is more endangered at this time by her own imbecility and stubbornness—her intrigue, ignorance and brutality, than from the war we are prosecuting and all its consequences.—She has been hastening to ruin for years upon the floodtide of profligacy and corruption, and if she is now rescued and her downfall arrested and postponed for a season, it may justly be attributed to the salutary influences of the chastisement she has received.—But a majority of her people belong to the fated aboriginal races who can neither uphold government or be restrained by it—who flourish only amid the haunts of savage indolence, and perish under, if they do not recede before, the influences of civilization. Like their doomed brethren who were once spread over the several States of the Union, they are destined, by laws above human agency, to give way to a stronger race from this continent or another. What has been the national progress of Mexico? When our population was three millions hers was five, and when ours is twenty hers is eight, and while we have attained the highest rank among the nations of the earth, she has fallen so low that there is little left to wound her feelings or degrade her character. She has existed as an independent government, if her fretful and confused being may be thus dignified, almost a quarter of a century, and has changed her government by military revolution during that period as many times as she has existed years. She has an extended and somewhat populous territory, without an authorized government or the means of instituting one, or the virtue or intelligence to uphold it. The rights of her people are illy defined and worse protected. She has now neither army or navy, or means of national defence—no treasury nor system of revenue. She has national antipathies and resentments, but neither national spirit nor national virtue; and has thus far dragged out her wretched existence like the eagle of mythology chained to the rock—gnawing at her own vitals. Her valuable mines, rich agricultural regions, and Pacific harbors, present a tempting occasion for European rapacity to revive upon this continent their execrable proposal to regulate the balance of power, in furtherance of which England has already commenced seizing upon South American possessions.

And should our army now be withdrawn, leaving her deluded people the prey of the ferocious spirits who have hastened her downfall, we may expect to see some supernumerary of the house of Bourbon placed at their head to play automaton to the British cabinet. The policy of extending our jurisdiction over any portion of Mexican territory, is a question between Europe and America, between monarchy and freedom, and not between the United States and the Republic of Mexico; and we should not hesitate to extend our protection to such provinces as are held by us in undisturbed possession now, and patiently await the development of the future. Should the progress of events, without injustice on our part, open to the enterprise of our citizens the rich mining and agricultural districts of that country, and infuse among this semi-barbarous people the blessings of civilization—should the valuable trade which has been monopolized by England be enjoyed by the States, and our mint coin the money of the world; and should a passage across the Isthmus be obtained, placing the mouth of the Columbia within two weeks sail of New Orleans, and valuable Pacific harbors permanently secured, so indispensable to the protection of our vast trade in that sea, and our settlements upon that coast, there would be no occasion for lamentation or alarm. The day is not far distant when all this and much more will be realized, through a process as fixed and unyielding as the laws of gravitation. And whenever the period which determines whether entire Mexico shall come within the jurisdiction of the United States, or become a colonial dependent upon European power, the duty of this government will admit of neither doubt or hesitation.

But we have the question of territorial extension directly presented for our consideration. The President, in his annual message, recommends that the provinces of New Mexico and California, now quietly held by us, be permanently retained as indemnity, and subjected to the civil jurisdiction of the United States. Upon this just recommendation of the Executive we shall soon be called to act, and while the great mass of the American people will approve the suggestion, some will crave our sympathies while they mourn over what they are pleased to term the "dismemberment of Mexico." Let those who may, indulge this misplaced and sickly sentiment. Such of the Mexican people as may have the good fortune to fall within our jurisdiction, should it be the entire population, will be objects of envy rather than of commiseration, and may regard it as a special interposition of Providential favor.—They will find a repose which they have never experienced, and a protection for life, liberty and property, to which they are strangers. They would exchange a lawless and irresponsible despotism for a government of opinion—wild and debasing habits for rational civilization—the precarious subsistence of savage life for the wholesome rewards of productive industry—the devastations of war for the arts of peace. Our government would rear in their midst the genial influences of equality, and secure to the hand of industry the bread of its earning. It would elevate their condition in the scale of moral and social being and infuse amongst them the vigilance and manly spirit which actuates our people. It would leave them with all just relations to each other, enjoying the religion they venerate and the altars where they are wont to worship. To them, the consequences of a "dismemberment" would be such as were experienced by the inhabitants of Louisiana and Florida, when France and Spain were respectively "dismembered" of these fertile territories. Russia "dismembered" Poland that the order of despotism might reign at Warsaw. But America "dismembered" monarchy, that the blessings of civil liberty might be extended upon the continent. While the object of the government is not "dismemberment," our troops cannot be withdrawn without fatal consequences, and deep and lasting dishonor; and if Mexico persists in her course of blind injustice, the results are easily anticipated. The war with Mexico is not a war of conquest. Conquests were not its objects; and yet, they may be amongst its fortunate incidents. A nation engaged in war may, by the law of nations, rightfully conquer all the territory it can subdue and hold it as its own. So much are conquests deemed the property of the conqueror, that when a treaty of peace is made, the territory conquered is deemed the property of the conqueror, unless the treaty stipulates for the surrender, nor does this conqueror relinquish a debt due the conqueror before the commencement of the war. The conquests we have gained in Mexico, are ours without yielding to her any equivalent. We have won the sovereignty over them honestly, fairly, and legally, by the law of nations; and in treating with her, she is entitled to just what we may think proper to give her for relinquishing her right to re-conquer them, and it is worth just what good judgment may dictate. And whenever she proposes to treat upon this principle we are morally bound to treat with her. We cannot virtuously continue the war for the mere purpose of making further conquests, but we can virtuously continue it to the subjection of the whole of Mexico, if she will not make peace with us upon just and honorable terms, or, if we chose, upon such terms as shall have due reference to the territory we have acquired by conquest The question of boundary was a fair subject of negotiation. We proposed negotiation, which she refused. She proffered war which we accepted, and she has no right to complain of the result of it, because she herself rendered us, and we have a right to enjoy what the chances of war have thrown into our hands. The disparity of force has been in her favor. What we could have brought into the field has had no influence in producing results. The strength was immeasurably on her side, when, upon her own soil, her population or even her forces in the field, are compared with our invading army. Under like circumstances, when we were only three millions strong, we contended successfully, against the power of Great Britain; and Spain contended, in like manner, against the forces of Napoleon.

Neither national justice nor national morality require us tamely to surrender our Mexican conquests; nor should such be the policy of the Government, if it would advance the cause of national freedom, or secure its enjoyment to the people of Mexico. But whatever may be the policy touching Mexican conquests, we cannot, if we would, restore New Mexico and California to that government, for the reason that they will not be restored. The laws, which control the policy of territorial acquisition, are beyond the control of legislation. Fountains of tears may be shed over the dismemberment of Mexico; supplies to our gallant army may be refused, and it may be called back from its field of glory, or compelled to retreat therefrom to a "defensive line," or be disbanded and dismissed, and the people holding these provinces will not consent to go where there is only anarchy, violence, and oppression. Give back those provinces! As well return to Great Britain what was once her colonial possessions—give back Louisiana to France, Florida to Spain, Texas to Mexico.

Neither the solemnities of legislative enactments, nor the sanctions of the treaty-making power, can compel them to return; and if it be attempted by strength of arms it will require a greater provinces are ours by every principle of justice and of international by a bravery which finds no parallel in the history of mankind. The consideration has been too dearly paid, and our title deeds are written in the best blood of our sons. Let, then, the laws of ever the cause of freedom.

The principle declared by the last clause of the first resolution, torial acquisition, inconsistent with the right of the people thereof, to form a free, sovereign State, with the powers and privileges of argument. Whatever laws Congress may constitutionally enact for the regulation of the territories of the United States, are subject to be altered or repealed at pleasure. The ancient Medes and Persians declared their edicts unalterable; but no such power is vested in the American Congress, and those who propose to have it enact "unalterable and fundamental" laws, employ terms, which, if they have duly considered, they do not comprehend. Every State admitted to the Union, from the moment of its admission, enjoys all the rights of sovereignty common to every other member of the confederacy. The State constitution carries along with it its own definitions of sovereignty, and if any State is prohibited from all the rights of every other, then it is not a sovereign State. If it is admitted with a constitution authorizing domestic slavery, it may change its constitution so as to prohibit it at its pleasure. If its constitution at the time of its admission prohibits slavery, it may change so as to authorize it, and this too, regardless of any legislation upon the subject by Congress or otherwise, before its admission to the Union. In other words, every State, after its admission, may in virtue of its own sovereign power, establish or abolish this institution, whatever may have been the conditions imposed, or attempted to be imposed upon it during its territorial existence.

The second resolution declares that the principle of self-government upon which the federative system rests will be best promoted—the true spirit and meaning of the constitution be observed, and the confederacy strengthened by leaving all questions concerning the domestic regulation of territory to the legislatures chosen by the people thereof.

It must be conceded by all, that Congress has no inherent power over this subject, and no more right to legislate concerning it than the British Parliament, unless such authority is delegated by the constitution. The only clause of the constitution which is supposed to confer upon Congress the right to legislate for the people

In providing legislation for the District of Columbia, and for places occupied by the government of the United States for fortifications, and other erections required by the public service, the constitution thus confers the power upon Congress:

By the clause of the constitution first above cited, it is evident that territory is mentioned in its material, and not its political sense, for it is classed with "other property," and Congress is authorized to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting both. In the other section they are separated, and Congress is authorized to legislate over all places occupied for public structures; but, no such authority is extended to territ-free from repetition, and every word was well weighed in its positive and relative sense. And if its framers had supposed the phrase "needful rules and regulations" authorized legislation over places belonging to the United States, and used for public service, they would scarcely have authorized legislation over such places in express language in another section. Again, in providing legislation for the District of Columbia, Congress is authorized to "exercise exclusive legislation" over it. Now, if the words "needful rules and regulations" were deemed proper and apt language to confer legislative authority over the internal affairs of a territory, why were they not employed to authorize legislation over the District? And to reverse the order of the enquiry, if it was intended to confer upon Congress the power to legislate over territory, why was it not given in the same express terms as in authorizing legislation for the District? From this view there is little doubt that a strict construction would deny to Congress the rights to legislate for the domestic affairs of the people of territory without their consent.

Congress has however upon various occasions exercised legislative power over the subject, especially in incorporating into the law organising territories the provisions of the ordinance of 1787; and this has been acquiesced in by the people of the territory. This ordinance was framed under the old confederacy, for the government of the North Western Territory, and the sixth article forbade slavery or involuntary servitude therein. Its validity has often been questioned, and its passage was pronounced by Mr. Madison [illegible] "a mere usurpation, flow" But, whether authorised or not, having been passed before the adoption of the constitution, the act has no authority as a precedent for like practice under it. In erecting territorial governments since the adoption of the constitution, the action of Congress has not been uniform. In organising the North Western Territories, the provisions of the ordinance relating to slavery have been extended to relation to the states, and such forms of organization as have been proposed by Congress have met with general acquiescence. But this has neither given the right to Congress, nor taken it from the people of the territory. The Missouri compromise cannot be regarded as an ordinary act of legislation, upon the majority principle. It was rather in the nature of a compact, not adopted as such to be sure, but assented to or acquiesced in by all the states through their representatives in Congress or otherwise. Whether it has force in the territories or not, depends upon the construction of the constitution already discussed, but it has no binding force upon a state beyond that of moral obligation. In the annexation of Texas, the Missouri compromise line was extended by a majority vote, but it was disregarded by that State in her domestic organization, nor has any department of the general government or any other power, save her own people, any control over it. This furnishes a practical illustration, of the value of "unalterable" provisions by Congress in the organization of territory. It is not denied that if the people of the territory acquiesce in, adopt the form of domestic government, proposed for them by Congress, it becomes their own, having all the force of law until they "alter or abolish it." But this gives to Congress no constitutional right to enforce its legislation upon the people of the territories against their will, and much less does it prohibit the people of the state in embryo, from exercising their own inherent right of sovereignty in their domestic affairs.

The resolution declares that the domestic policy of the people of a territory should be left with them, and if that power resides in Congress, as is contended, it should be delegated to the people of the territory and be exercised by them.

From the Declaration of Independence to the adoption of the Constitution, every act of those who erected our system of government indicates a prevailing confidence in the capacity and integrity of the people, and a lively distrust of delegated power; and if we permit ourselves to depart from the letter of the constitution, in search of its true spirit and meaning, we should keep steadily in view this great popular and controling feature. But it is not my purpose to discuss further the abstract right of Congress to legislate upon this subject.

Whatever power may or may not rest in Congress under the Constitution, that instrument could not take from the people of territories the right to prescribe their own domestic policy; nor has it attempted any such office. The principles declared by this resolution are older and stronger than written laws and paper constitutions—principles which lie at the foundation of free institutions, and from which laws and constitutions emanate—inculcating the doctrine that, the inherent, original power of self-government was derived by man from the Sovereign of the universe; and that government is the creature of man, and not man the creature of government.

The republican theory teaches that sovereignty resides with the people of a state, and not with its political organization; and the Declaration of Independence recognizes the right of the people to alter or abolish and reconstruct their government. If sovereignty resides with the people and not with the organization, it rests as well with the people of a territory, in all that concerns their internal condition, as with the people of an organized state; and if it is the right of the people by virtue of their innate sovereignty to "alter or abolish," and reconstruct their government, it is the right of the inhabitants of territories, in virtue of the same inborn attribute, in all that appertains to their domestic concerns, to fashion one suited to their condition; and if, in this respect, a form of government is proposed for them by the federal government, and adopted or acquiesced in by them, they may afterwards alter or abolish it at pleasure. Although the government of a territory has not the same sovereign power as the government of a state in its political relations, the people of a territory have, in all that appertains to their internal condition, the same sovereign rights as the people of a state. While Congress may exercise its legislation over territory so far as is necessary to protect the interests of the United States, the legislation for the people should be exercised by them, under the Constitution.

The mental and physical organization of man teaches that he is better fitted for self-government than for the government of his neighbor; and if he is incapable of discharging this duty to himself, he should not be entrusted with the destiny of others.

That system of government, whether temporary or permanent—whether applied to States, Provinces, or Territories, is radically wrong, and has within itself all the elements of monarchical oppression, which permits the representatives of one community to legislate for the domestic regulation of another to which they are not responsible—which practically allows New York and Massachusetts, and other Atlantic States, to give local laws to the people of Oregon, Minesota, and Nebraska, to whom and whose interests, wishes and condition they are strangers.

Nor is this objection raised here for the first time. Prominent in the catalogue of grievances alleged by our fathers against the British king and his ministers, was one "for suspending our own legislatures and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us."

Whenever or wherever a community of subordinate rights has been subjected to the dominion of some external authority, it has been upon the plea of necessity—the same plea by which tyrants and usurpers have justified their enormities from the foundation of the world.

The genius of the federative system is self-government. It is the fundamental upon which the acts of our political sages rest. Our fathers proclaimed, that to secure the inalienable rights vouchsafed to man, governments were instituted deriving their just power from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

All experience has indicated man's capacity for the exercise of this exalted attribute, and wherever civilized and intelligent men have been cast together without the benefit of conventional forms of government, they have proceeded to enact them. They who planted the germ of a powerful empire upon the pilgrim's rock before landing from the May Flower, drew up and signed the following model charter of liberty.

[illegible]

And, the inhabitants of Oregon, three thousand miles distant, in the absence of that guardian care which Congress has been wont to extend to other territories nearer the political centre, established and have in successful operation a provisional government in which, of their own volition, without the assistance of "ordinances," "provisos," or "unalterable fundamental articles," they prohibited domestic slavery throughout the territory.

The great experiment of self government has been fairly tried, and has either succeeded or failed. If it has taught that after all, man, by reason of inherent defects of character, is incapable of its successful exercise except in populous communities matured by age, and that he must remain in pupilage until that season has arrived, we should boast no more that the mysterious problem of human government has been solved, but read the Declaration of Independence backwards and erase the claim which proclaims that gratifying truth, to be expunged or amended by a "proviso." We should acknowledge the theory of free government to be a fable—that the darkness of the human intellect has been found to predominate, and that the gloomy sophisms of the timid and the malignant speculations of the curious have prevailed.

I have already shown that the whole structure of our system favored the idea of domestic government by the people of territories, that it was their right, and the question is fully presented, whether, in view of their capacity for its judicious exercise, it is expedient to leave their internal policy under the constitution with themselves. Any system which denies this in theory or in practice, or which seeks to withhold it from the primary settlements until they shall become populous and mature States, is founded in the same spirit of popular distrust by which the few have, from the earliest history of man, under the plea of necessity, been endeavoring to restrict the many in the exercise of freedom. It inculcates a system of slavery ten fold more abject than that it professes to discountenance. It is the same spirit which has murmured its distrust at the extension of our territorial boundaries, and trembled for the perpetuity of the Union on the admission of a new State—which looks upon free suffrage with consternation, and with holy horror upon the naturalization of foreigners—which would itself enslave one race lest they should tolerate a system which holds in bondage another. It is the offspring of bigotry and intolerance, and should have fulfilled its mission during the dark ages. All experience has shown that tens of thousands in the settlements are as competent to judge of their own condition, and are as much devoted to the support of law and order, as are the hundreds of thousands in populous towns and cities; and that all questions concerning their domestic policy may be safely confided to them. When our country has been disgraced by violence and disorder, and disregard of law, it has been confined to the populous towns and cities, and has not extended to the border settlements. Should the domestic legislation of territories be left with their local legislatures, it would transfer from the halls of Congress the bootless sectional struggles which have created bitterness at home and served to degrade our institutions in the eyes of the world. It would leave local communities, territories, as well as States, to consult their own interests, wishes, and sense of propriety, and to erect or prohibit, continue or abolish, such institutions as may not be repugnant to the principles of the constitution. It would leave the federal government free to pursue its onward course unembarrassed by matters of sectional moment over which its control is questionable, and must be partial and temporary. It would relieve the best-abused department from the strife and irritation which now beset him, and allow his energies to be devoted to the best interests of the nation, and the amelioration of the condition of man. It would harmonise with the genial spirit of the constitution and uphold its symmetrical frame work. It would practically acknowledge man's capacity for self-government and vindicate the integrity of his race. The same spirit by which freedom is nourished, would be nourished by it, and society be bound together by ties of amity and interest.

Then would our territorial soil be free—not by restrictions, provisions, and the threatening mandates of federal legislation, but free and sacred to the cause of freedom—free for its people to lay the foundations of its government on such principles, and organise its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness—freedom of opinion, of the press—of religion—of education, of commercial intercourse. Having vindicated for the people of territories the same rights of self-government enjoyed by every other political community I forbear to speculate whether they will be less discreet in its exercise, than would those who desire to subject them to the influences of an external government.

Let them who fear to intrust a free people with their own domestic concerns lest they should prove too weak or wicked to conduct them judiciously, resort to the mistaken and mischievous policy of restrictive legislation—a system founded in blind and selfish conceits, and as impotent in effect as it is narrow in design. Such territory as we acquire will be free, and thus I would leave its people, and its domestic government. Free as the people of New York or of Virginia to lay the foundation of their government on such principles, and organize its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. If they shall fail to do this, the experiment of self-government will fail with them.

It is nought to me how various, crude or inconsistent are the speculations upon the principles which these resolutions contain, and what would be their effect if established. They stand upon the immutable basis of self-government, and will ultimately be vindicated and sustained by the American people in every section of the Union. But they will be opposed upon grounds as various as the motives by which the opposition is induced. This is already evidenced by sections of the public press which I notice, not as newspaper paragraphs merely, but for the interests they rep resent. Already the Charleston Mercury of South Carolina, a paper of conceded ability and extensive local influence, declares that their effect would be to prohibit forever slavery in the acquired territory, and therefore as a guardian of the slave interest, calls for their rejection; and papers in other sections which employ the slave question as a stalking horse to minister to the appetites of the morbid and alarm the fears of the timid, discover in them not only the effect, but the design to propagate and extend slavery. But I leave the theories to be adjusted by those who are thus enabled to penetrate the future, and draw opposite results from the same premises; I leave the practical tests with those who shall be charged with the high responsibilities of their own government—under our glorious free system, under the constitution it has framed, and the Providence which has watched over it.

It would doubtless be well for these antagonisms who fear that all newly acquired territory may be pre-occupied and monopolised, either by free labor on the one hand, or by slave labor on the other, as the case may be, unless their favorite ideas are indulged, to remember that there are other dangers, either real or imaginary, to which we may be exposed if left to the free government of its own people. Our institutions invite the children of every clime to sit down under the wide-spreading branches of the tree of liberty, and we have no prohibitory, or even protective impost duties upon social manners, and customs, political opinions, or religious rites. It may be that the rugged Russian, allured by the gentle breezes of Mexico, may fall down from his hyperborean regions with his serfdom, and his military rule—or the Turk choose to regale himself there with his pipes and mocha—his Georgian Houris's sensual delights, and Mahometan divinity. Or what is equally probable, as our Pacific possessions place us in direct communication with Asia, that the plains of Mexico may be desecrated by the trundling of the car of Juggernaut, or the subjects of the celestial Emperor—the brother of the sun and moon may hurry thither and ruin all agricultural interests by converting it into an extensive field of hyson.

But let those who entertain them dismiss all selfish and idle fears, regard others as wise, and as virtuous, and as capable of their own government as themselves, and all will be well. The spirit of freedom will enlarge her own boundaries and people—the area in obedience to laws stronger than the laws of Congress. The rich heritage we enjoy was won by the common blood and treasure of the north and south, the east and the west, and was defended and vindicated by the same, in the second war of independence; and at the present, when with a reckless and unpardonable spirit of barbarous foe the brave sons of every section of the Union have fought and fallen side by side—the parched sands of Mexico have drank together the best blood of New York, and South Carolina. These recollections should renew and strengthen the ties which unite the members of the confederacy, and cause them to spurn all attempts at provoking sectional jealousies and irritations, calculated to disturb the harmony, and shake the stability of the Union. In the language of Mr. Jefferson, they who indulge "this treason against human hope will signalise their epoch in future history as the counterpart of the model of their predecessors."

Mr. YULEE.—I desire to propose a substitute for the resolution of the honorable Senator from New York. I do not intend going into a discussion of the subject now, but merely beg leave to remark, that while I feel thankful to the honorable Senator for the spirit of liberality in which he has discussed the subject, I find so wide a variance between the sentiments entertained by the Senator and myself, in respect to the relation which the territories of this Union, and the people inhabiting them, occupy towards the federal government, that I feel bound to vindicate my own opinions by the resolutions which I now offer.

The SECRETARY then read the resolutions as follows:

Resolved, That the territory hitherto, or which may hereafter be acquired by the United States is the common property of the Union, and the sovereignty over the same vests in the people of the several States composing the Union.

Resolved further, That the right of property in slaves is recognized authority, and the territorial community any inherent right, to exercise any legislative power within the said territories, by which the equal right of all the citizens of the United States to acquire and enjoy any such property, may be impaired or embarrassed.

Mr. YULEE moved that they be printed.

Mr. HALE gave notice that he would move the following, as an amendment, at the proper time:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following, viz:

That it should be one of the fundamental rules and conditions on which all territory hereafter to be acquired by purchase, conquest, or otherwise, that slavery and involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall be duly convicted, shall be forever prohibited in said territory.

On motion by Mr. CASS, it was Ordered, That the resolutions be laid upon the table, and that the amendments proposed be printed.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration, on its third reading, of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. CASS rose and said:—I can now furnish the honorable Senator from Delaware, as I promised, with the date of the letter to which he alluded yesterday. It is dated the 18th of September.

Mr. CLAYTON.—The resolutions of the Senator from New York, (Mr. DICKINSON,) and the various propositions for amending them which have been presented by others, and which have been the subject of discussion this morning, furnish a very extraordinary commentary, I think, sir, on this war; the objects to be attained by it, and the course we are now about to pursue. It seems to be taken for granted by gentlemen, that we are to acquire a great amount of territory; but before we obtain an acre, there is a violent contest what we shall do with it.

Mr. President:—Yesterday, when the Senate adjourned, I had adverted to the subject of the indemnity due by Mexico for the claims of our citizens. I had said, what I maintain now, and what I shall at all times hereafter maintain—that the just claims of my countrymen against Mexico ought to be asserted and supported in every suitable and proper manner. But I did not then state what I think it right to state now, in order to prevent any error in the public mind—that the amount of those claims has been greatly overrated. There has been an erroneous impression in regard to their amount, and I will state what I believe to be that amount, subject, of course, to be corrected, if in error, by gentlemen who may follow me in the debate.

I understand that the whole amount of claims presented to the Commissioners was $6,291,605 dollars. Of this sum, $2,260,140 were allowed by the Commissioners on the part of Mexico, and the Mexican government was providing to pay that amount without any controversy as to its justice at the time when the war broke out. It appears, then, that there was a sum of $928,628 claimed by the citizens of the United States, which was disallowed by the Mexican Commissioners. This was subject to controversy; and whether our claim for that amount was right or wrong, remains to be decided by the Commission appointed by both governments. Of the claims of our citizens, $3,330,837 had not been examined by the Commissioners. I make this statement, as I have said, in order to prevent an erroneous impression in regard to the amount of these claims.

Mr WEBSTER (in his seat).—Mr. Trist was authorised to claim $3,000,000.

Mr. CLAYTON.—It is true that Mr. Trist was authorised to negotiate, on the ground that the whole sum due to us in the aggregate was three millions. It will not be contended, I presume, that we went to war for the recovery of this claim. I have not heard that the true object of the war was the recovery of this money. Other causes were alleged for the war in which we were involved, on the 13th of May, 1846. The great cause assigned by the President for the war at that time was, that American blood had been shed upon American soil. I do not propose to go into the discussion of the question at this time, whether that assertion was or was not true. There are other matters which invite my consideration, and to which I think it important to call the attention of the Senate. But I desire, sir, in the progress of this discussion, to have it distinctly understood, as far as I am concerned, that I have been always ready and anxious to vindicate the honest claims of my countrymen upon Mexico, and that neither by the votes which I am about to give upon these bills, nor by any vote which I shall in future be called on to give in reference to this war, do I desire it to be understood that I am denying the justice of the fair claims of the citizens of this country upon Mexico for indemnity. What I meant to say yesterday and mean to repeat to-day, is, that the amount of these claims was small compared to the value of the enormous quantity of territory, which the President declares shall be ceded by Mexico to us before there can be a just and honorable peace between the two countries. It has been said that the proposition was made by the American Commissioner to give them twenty millions of dollars for the territory required to be ceded. I know not from any official information, how the President estimates the difference between the claims of our citizens and the value of the land which he intends to demand of Mexico at the cannon's mouth.

The honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs tells me to-day that he has ascertained the date of the letter from General Scott to our government, in which the suggestion is made, that in a certain event more troops will be necessary to be added to the army. That letter, he says, is dated so far back as the 18th of September, and I suppose the extract he has read from it is nothing more than the suppressed part of the General's official letter of that date, in which he recounts his victories. It is the part of that letter marked by the asterisks I suppose. It is clear, then, from the statement of the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that General Scott has never recommended to the administration of this country, or to any department of this government, the passage of these bills to raise thirty more regiments for the war. He has made no such proposition—upon his head none of the responsibility of these measures can rest. It must rest on the heads of those who have suggested it. Although the President has generally recommended in his message an increase of the army, he has not told us how many regulars, how many volunteers, or how many troops of all kinds should be added to the army. Sir, General Scott has never desired such an increase of the forces in Mexico, nor can he now desire it. It could only embarrass and distract him in his position at present, however useful such an addition might have been before he left Vera Cruz, and penetrated into the interior of Mexico. At this time these measures would add 30,000 more mouths to be fed in Mexico. Sir, it is not consistent with the known character of this great captain to ask for more troops than can be usefully employed in the service of the country. Before he left this place for Mexico, in conversation with him, I observed to him, that when he arrived in Mexico he would meet a very formidable enemy, and that he might perchance be defeated in the difficult mountain passes of that country; he smiled, and replied to my observation: "Sir, give me a column—a granite column of American regulars, consisting of 4,000 or 5,000 men, and I will whip any Mexican army that can be brought into the field, if it should rain Mexicans for a week." That was the fixed deliberate opinion of the then Commander-in-chief at that time. Well, sir, when he was fighting the battles of Contreras, Churubusco, Chepultepec, and Molina del Rey, it really seemed as if it did rain Mexicans for about a week. But he really vindicated the opinion he gave of the prowess of American soldiers by the brilliant victories which he gained in those ever memorable and glorious battles. He entered the city of Mexico, as he tells you, with an army of less than 6,000 men.

Let us look a little into the history of this most extraordinary campaign, after General Scott departed with the small little army from Vera Cruz, and led it into the interior of the enemy's country. Let us see the comparative amount of the American and Mexican forces that were engaged in those battles which were fought previous to the entry of the American army into the city of Mexico. It will show us that there is no necessity whatever for such an increased force to be added to the army of the United States.

The first great battle after the capture of Vera Cruz was that of Cerro Gordo.

The commanding General, in his despatch to the Secretary of War, says:

"Our whole force present, in action and in reserve, was 8,500; the enemy is estimated at 15,000 to 18,000. Also 3,000 prisoners, 1,000 stand of arms, and 43 pieces of artillery were taken. By the accompanying return, I regret to find our loss more severe than at first supposed; amounting in the two days' operations to [illegible] men—in all 431, of whom 63 were killed. The enemy's loss must have been from 1,000 to 1,200."

Of the next battle, sir, in which our army was engaged against the Mexicans, the General speaks in his despatch of the 18th September, from which I read the following extract:

"This army has been more disgusted than surprised that, by some sinister process on the part of certain individuals at home, its numbers have been, generally, almost trebled in our public papers—beginning at Washington.

"Leaving, as we all knew, many strong garrisons at Vera Cruz, Perote, and Jalapa—with much larger hospitals; and being obliged, most reluctantly, from the same cause, (general paucity of numbers) to abandon Jalapa, we marched [August 7–10] from Puebla with only 10,738 rank and file. This number includes the regiment of Jalapa and the 2,429 men brought up by Brigadier General Pierce, August 6.

"At Puebla, I should say, August 20, we had [illegible] men for duty, after deducting the garrison of Augustin, (our general depot,) the intermediate sick and the detail at the Molino del Rey. Supposing so far the [illegible] casualty, and artillery—making in all 4,361 men—we fought the battle of Contreras, September 12 and 13—our whole operating force, after deducting, again, the recent killed, wounded, and sick, together with the garrison of Mixcoac (the then general depot) and that of Tacubaya, was but 7,180; and, finally, after deducting the new garrison of Chepultepec, with the killed and wounded of the two days, we took possession [September 14] of this great capital with less than 6,000 men! And I reassert, upon accumulated and unquestionable evidence, that, in not one of those conflicts, was the army opposed by fewer than three and a half times the numbers present of them, by a yet greater excess.

"On the other hand, this small force has beaten on the same occasions, in view of their capital, the whole Mexican arms, of (at the beginning) thirty odd thousand men—posted, always, in chosen positions, behind entrenchments, or more formidable beg to take issue with him upon this point. The whole revenue of Mexico, as he said, was but twenty one million dollars, when in her best and palmiest state. It is now, as General Scott tells you, almost annihilated; he, who has the best means of knowing, gives you this information. But suppose the revenue to be twenty one million of dollars, would that be sufficient to support an army of 70,000 men? Sir, if you look at the official documents which have been sent to us by the Secretary of War, you will see that it will be entirely inadequate to defray half the enormous expenses to which we should be subjected. But what is meant by the honorable Senator from Maryland? Does he desire to take every dollar from Mexico, and prevent her from supporting any government? What policy would there be in that? We want to treat with the government of Mexico, yet we drive that government from time to time—keeping them as has been said, "in perpetual motion." We drive them continually from place to place, and yet we expect to treat with a government thus in motion, and from which we have taken every dollar of its revenue. Is there wisdom in this? Is it not in fact an effectual obstruction to the obtaining any treaty? It must end in the utter annihilation of the sovereignty and independence of that nation. You will have a mass of population scattered over an immense region without a government, because you will not permit them to have one, and yet you expect to obtain a treaty of peace! You are to beat them, drive them, shoot them, and in every way punish them; and you say you are to do it for the purpose of procuring an honorable peace. Now, sir, I have nothing to do with the question of humanity as involved in this matter, but I put it again to honorable Senators on the other side, is this good policy? Is it expedient? Are you resolved never to permit Mexico to have a government that can treat with you? If you send down thirty thousand more men, what these bills call for, it is in vain to say that there can be an independent government in Mexico.

[illegible] to upwards of that number more than 7,000 will [illegible] 2d instant, [illegible] Brigadier Generals, of [illegible] Major Generals, [illegible] more than 20 cents per day. [illegible] to [illegible] 30,000 men, [illegible] [illegible] New [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

In reference to the suggestion, sir, which held out the idea that Mexico can be annexed to this country as a province, I wish to say but a very few words. I think that every statesman who reflects on the subject, will agree with me that it is utterly impossible for us long to hold that or any other country as a province. If you annex it to the American Republic in any form its final destiny is fixed and certain. Your own institutions, your sense of justice, your love of the great principle of human liberty, will compel you to admit them finally into the Union. Hold it as a province like one of the despotic governments of Europe! Hold a country which was once a republic, sir, as a province, enslaved, and enslaved by a sister republic! It is vain, the idea is altogether impracticable. It cannot be entertained by an American statesman for a moment. Depend upon it, sir, you cannot evade the great question. Now is the time to say whether you will admit Mexico into the American Union or not.

I do not propose, Mr. President, to review the ground which was so ably taken by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, who preceded me in the debate in reference to the existing army in the field, the number of troops in Mexico and their sufficiency for all legitimate purposes in this war. I have here the report of the Adjutant General, and I presume that every honorable Senator has had the report upon his table. It appears by it, (and I will here read one or two extracts for the purpose of confirming what has been stated already) that the aggregate regular and volunteer forces in Mexico, independent of the Michigan regiment and the Alabama and Mississippi troops which have not gone to Mexico, amount to forty-three thousand, five hundred and thirty-six men. The Michigan, Alabama, and Mississippi troops will raise the number above 45,000 men. There was great propriety, I think, in the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky, to add to the number (45,000 men) the five thousand sailors and marines now in Mexico, to ascertain the entire effective force now in Mexico.

There are then, sir, by a fair calculation, already 50,000 men in Mexico. According to the letter which was read by the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, General Scott considered that force sufficient, not only for the legitimate purposes of the war, but also for holding all the Capitals of all the States of the Mexican Confederation, its ports, its towns, and fortified places; for the purpose also of seizing all the revenues of the nation, and of driving the Central Government from place to place, "keeping it in constant motion;" in other words, that the force was sufficient, according to the judgment of the Commanding General, to annihilate the sovereignty of Mexico. Why then do you want more? On what ground do you base the requisition for 30,000 additional troops, when you have already a force adequate, according to the Commanding General, for the subjugation of the whole country? If you send these 30,000 additional troops there, you will have 30,000 additional mouths to feed, greatly increasing the difficulties of the Commander-in-chief in the field, if not rendering them absolutely insuperable. You will thus raise the price of supplies by increasing the demand for them. At the same time, your army being inactive, occupying the garrison towns and fortified places of Mexico, you incur all the hazard of mutiny and insubordination in that immense mass of men, a great portion of them being kept in the great Capital of that Republic, and the others, diffused and scattered among the principal towns. Reflect, sir, on the difficulties which must inevitably surround an army in such circumstances; the danger not merely from disease and the climate, but from that military insubordination into which they would be so likely to fall, when they have no enemy to encounter in the field. As to the idea of fighting any more battles in Mexico, that I hold to be perfectly preposterous. Battles with whom? A single regiment, sir, of volunteers, would be sufficient, at this very moment, to defeat any Mexican forces that could, probably, be brought into the field. Who is there in Mexico that has under him, or has the least expectation of having under him, any considerable Mexican force? No one. Santa Anna has a few guerillas under him, assassins and cut-throats; but they, like assassins and cut-throats in other parts of the world, are fleeing before our regular forces, and dare not face them, and never will dare face any army there.

I conclude, then, Mr. President, that if a case could possibly be stated in which an American Congress would be justified in withholding its consent to an Executive application for more troops, that case is now before us. There are some individuals who seem to think that no possible emergency can arise in which a patriotic statesman can withhold his vote for furnishing supplies of men or money during a state of war. With all such persons I beg most respectfully to differ; and I am quite willing, if gentlemen desire, to measure patriotism with them on this very question. We are placed here as guardians, in some sense, of the lives of the American people, and from our age—as there are many gray heads to be seen in this chamber; it is expected of us that, as men in whom the "heyday of the blood is gone, and waits upon the judgment," we shall restrain the impulses which prompt men to rush to every battlefield when there is no occasion whatever for their services.

Sir, is it indeed true that a man cannot vote against a bill to send additional troops into the field, unless he be as some say, a Mexican Whig, or at heart an enemy to his country? No such assertion as that was made by my honorable friend from Maryland, (Mr. JOHNSON); but just the reverse. He did justice to the motives of those who vote against the measure. But such language I have heard from the lips of others, and never without despising it and its authors. I shall vote, I trust, from a high sense of public duty, and I say that in this case I might with more propriety retort upon the friends of the Executive that he desires, by the passage of this bill, to get a large army of military office-holders to electioneer for his party in the next Presidential campaign. I might make such a charge against him, with much more propriety than the charge to which I have alluded, can be directed against gentlemen not disposed to vote in favor of this bill. If this ten regiment bill passes, the President will have the appointment of five hundred and forty additional commissioned officers. The Executive has already exercised more patronage than any of his predecessors in office. This war, calling into existence a mighty army of 70,000 men, has given him more patronage, independently of other considerations, than any President ever exercised before him. Well, if patronage be an object to the Executive, may he not well be satisfied? I will not lightly make an accusation against the Chief Magistrate of my country. I make no charge against him that it is his object to carry this bill through the halls of Congress, in order that he may obtain this patronage; but, I am one of those who are very fearful and jealous of Executive power and Executive patronage. I have lived long enough and seen enough here to satisfy me, that there is imminent danger to our institutions from that very source. I will not, where there is the slightest danger to be apprehended from it, lend my aid to increase that Executive patronage. Sir, the fathers of the republic, when about to make the American Constitution had fears, and just such fears as I entertain on this great question. They had fears that the great temptations to which the Executive would be exposed, to increase his power and patronage, flagrante bello, might lead him to defeat the settlement of controversies with foreign powers and to protract any war in which we might be engaged, so as to prevent a peace. Reasoning upon that subject in the abstract, and without reference to any particular individual, the framers of the Constitution thought that such a danger existed; and James Madison was one of the very men who, apprehending danger from this source attempted in the Convention which made the Constitution, to guard against it by removing from the President even concurrent action with the Senate in the formation of treaties of peace, restricting that power to two-thirds of the Senate.

Let me read from the proceedings of that convention, the passages which bear on this point; as they are quite pertinent in the present connexion. You will find them under date of the — of September, 1787, page 524 of the "Madison Papers,

"Mr. MADISON moved to authorize a certain number of [illegible] of the Senate to make treaties of peace, without the concurrence of the President. The President, he said, would necessarily derive so much importance from [illegible] that he might be tempted, if authorised, to impede a treaty of peace.

"Mr. BUTLER seconded the motion.

"Mr. GORHAM thought [illegible] the power would not be in the hands of the Executive, [illegible]

"Mr. BUTLER was strenuous for the motion as a necessary security against [illegible] and bribes and corrupt Presidents. He mentioned the [illegible] of the Stadtholder in Holland, and the artifices of the Duke of Marlborough [illegible] which he had the management."

Sir, Mr. Madison's motion failed, and we have no resource against the evil he designed to prevent, but in the suggestion of Mr. Gorham.

It is evident, then, that the fathers of the Constitution contemplated the very step which we are now about to take; and unless in our hearts and judgments we can approve of the objects for which the war in Mexico is waged—unless we can agree with the President in his ultimatum as announced in that portion of his message in which he declares that he will make no peace unless it give him all the Californias and New Mexico—unless we concur in that proposition. We are bound as honorable men, to refuse him any more men for the purposes he has avowed. In so refusing to grant him any more men for the prosecution of the war with such objects, I hold myself as acting in the very spirit of the Constitution, and according to the requisitions of the fathers who made it.

Mr. President, the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, when he introduced this bill to the consideration of the Senate, submitted with it some remarks to which I desire to invite your attention. That I may not misquote or misrepresent the honorable Senator, I will read from his speech as published by the Reporter of the Senate.

[illegible] matted would be considered upon their military merits, taking it for granted, that the property of using the additional force required would not be controverted. I was well aware that we could not escape a full discussion of the origin of the war, its [illegible] Nor, indeed, did I wish to avoid it. However severe may be the attack, I trust it [illegible]

It sometimes happens, sir, in the affairs of this world, that a man by blowing a trumpet may invite an opponent into the field when there is none there before he did it. The honorable Senator has uttered this note of defiance, and I suppose it was intended for gentlemen on this side of the Chamber. He has thrown the gauntlet at our feet, and dares us to take it up. He says that the entire ground of the administration is "impregnable," that an attack upon it can be "easily repelled," and will be, he trusts, "as earnestly met." Now, sir, although one of the humblest of the members on this side of the Chamber, yet I will take up the glove, and I desire to see how easily the champion of the administration will repel one or two attempts on my part to question the propriety of the course of the administration in carrying on this war.

Many years ago there was a certain gentleman in our State of Texas, then a province claimed by Mexico, by the name of Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna. He met some American troops—if I recollect the history of times gone by—at a certain place called Goliad, and induced them to surrender to him under the promise that they would be fairly and honorably treated as prisoners of war. He took out every man of them, the next day, and shot them, one by one, deliberately, in cold blood! He violated his solemn pledge before God and man; and bloody ruffian—murderous villain as he is—he slew one hundred and seventy-nine of my countrymen, after pledging his honor to give them quarter. On another occasion this same Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna massacred some hundreds more of our countrymen at a place called the Alamo. These things are fresh in the recollection of every American patriot. There is not an honest American heart that did not burn with indignation against this ferocious ruffian on account of these atrocious acts. Well, sir, when this war was declared in May, 1846, the President of the United States—the head of the administration, and of the executive government—gave this same Santa Anna, with all his titles, a free pass through the American fleet, into Mexico.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, (in his seat.)—On the same day on which war was declared.

Mr. CLAYTON.—On the very day as my honorable friend remarks, on which the war was declared the President of the United States, issued his order to let pass the perjured assassin without let or hindrance into Mexico. This sir, is one of these points in which I desire to see the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs so easily repel the attack which he has invited. I am bound sir, to hold up the conduct of the President in this instance, not only to the Senate but to the American people, and I ask the champion of the administration or any gentleman on the other side of the chamber to demonstrate to us the case with which he can repel the charge of misconduct, gross misconduct on the part of the President of the United States, in admitting that murderous ruffian into Mexico. What, sir, have been the consequences of that act? Why let me in reply take up a newspaper which is good authority with my honorable friends on the other side. In the "Union" of this morning I find the following paragraph.

We have received a file of the "North American," printed in the city of Mexico [illegible] the followers in the [illegible] the New Orleans [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] or to point our cannon into the windows of New Orleans, and thus provoke a conflict? Did any such spirit as that which seems to rage here with an unbridled fury, pervade the Democracy of that party? No, sir; no, sir. The love of Justice had not abandoned the American bosom; the honor of the American character was still dear to American statesmen. Thomas Jefferson, with his friends, dropped the proposition of Mr. Ross to seize on the country on the Mississippi, sent an Envoy Extraordinary to join Mr. Livingston in France; and they negociated the celebrated treaty of 1803, by which Louisiana was ceded to this country, for the sum of fifteen millions of dollars. Negociation—treaty—these were the means resorted to by the Democracy of ancient days. Alas! sir; it seems to me as if there were a spirit now pervading a portion of my friends, on the other side of the chamber, which disposes them to seize and hold territory, without negotiation—without treaty—almost without regard to the consequences upon the character of the country. From all of this spirit I entirely dissent. But allow me to add, that I am not one of those who have denied, or mean hereafter to deny that indemnity may be received by my country from Mexico in the way of the acquisition of territory. What I have maintained is, that I will not agree to rob for it. Buy any territory that may be necessary for the good of the country. Buy the harbor of San Francisco, and the adjacent territory for the use of our people. Buy it on fair and honorable terms, and I shall not object to it. But take nothing by violence. If you intend to do that, I wash my hands of it, and have nothing to do with it. I refuse to acquiesce in any such procedure on the ground which I have already stated, that I hold the national character for justice, and honesty of far more value to my countrymen now, and in all ages to come, than all the lands, and all the money which could be acquired by a war of rapine, and all the military glory that could be achieved in the wars of a century. Lose that which excites in your own bosom, a proper feeling of self-respect, and you are a lost man. Let your country lose its self-respect by the folly or wickedness of its rulers, and your country is degraded to such a degree, that it will require the power of better men than we are, exerted for a century to come, to restore her to the position from which she has fallen.

Mr. SEVIER.—Will the Senator have the goodness to tell me the date of Mr. Ross's resolutions?

Mr. CLAYTON.—I shall send the book to the honorable Senator, so that he may examine the resolutions.

I have now consumed enough of the time of the Senate, and trespassed sufficiently on its patience. In concluding, I beg leave to tender to the honorable gentlemen here, my thanks for the kind and patient attention with which they have heard me, and to assure those on the opposite side of the house, as well as my friends here, that it is painful for me to differ from those for whose character as gentlemen and patriots I have high respect; and that although now impelled by a sense of duty to record my protest against their course, I shall always be ready to co-operate with them in sustaining the true honor and the solid glory of our common country.

The usual hour of adjournment having arrived,

Mr. PEARCE signified his intention of addressing the Senate to-morrow, on the bill before them.

Mr. BUTLER gave notice that he would to-morrow move to re-commit the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, asked for a reading of the amendment.

The SECRETARY read the amendment, which is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the regular army shall be increased as follows, to wit:

To each company of artillery, infantry, and regiment of riflemen, there shall be added [illegible] and to each company of the regiment of dragoons, [illegible] which shall be a fifth lieutenant; and to each of said companies [illegible]

Provided, That the said troops shall be required to serve during the war with Mexico, but may be sooner discharged by order of the President.

Mr. BUTLER.—I may, perhaps, without impropriety, now indicate the object of this amendment. I am very well satisfied, from all that I have heard here, that the President intends to carry on invasive operations in that part of Mexico, whether additional force be placed at his disposal or not. It becomes a question whether we shall be bound to raise such a force as is provided by the bill under discussion, or whether a different, and in my opinion, a better mode may not be adopted. It seems to me, that the question resolves itself into this simple proposition: The President has advertised both houses of Congress, that the only mode in which he proposes to bring this war to a conclusion, by a treaty of peace, is to reduce Mexico to such a state of coercion that she will be obliged to accept of the terms thus arbitrarily dictated. All other modes of settling the controversy with Mexico seem, by the recommendation of the President, to be discarded, and that single proposition to be assumed. If then, we are to carry on invasive operations in the heart of Mexico, I think we should pause, at least at this stage of the proceedings, and say, whether we shall accede to that proposition of the Executive.

For myself, I have consulted with no party on this subject, but I do feel that we have been from the commencement of the war, and are now, making materials for a most eventful history. I submit no other remarks at present, but give notice that to-morrow I propose to explain my views not only on that amendment, but perhaps, if I should be allowed, on some other topics involved in that discussion.

On motion, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after a short time had been so occupied, the doors were re-opened, when

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 13, 1848.

ARMY CONTRACTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, made agreeably to law, showing the contracts made under the authority of the Department, during the year 1847.

PETITIONS.

Mr. ASHLEY presented a petition of citizens of Polk county, Arkansas, praying the establishment of a mail route from Mount Ida to Ultima Thule in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DOUGLAS presented a petition of citizens of Illinois, praying a grant of public land to the State of Illinois to aid in the construction of a rail road to connect the Upper and Lower Mississippi with the Northern Lakes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a memorial of Frederick Dawson, James Schott and Elisha D. Whitney, praying the fulfilment of a contract entered into by them with the Government of Texas, previous to its annexation to the United States, for supplying that republic with a Naval Armament; which was referred to the Committee of Claims and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of George V. Mitchell, praying the reimbursement of a sum of money improperly collected from him by the United States on the settlement of his accounts as postmaster at Belleville, Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, presented the petition of Henry V. Keep, praying to be allowed pay and bounty land as a volunteer in the United States' service in the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. NILES, it was Ordered, That the petition of Nathaniel Knykendall, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Thomas F. Gordon, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Library.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, it was Ordered, That the petition of John McNeil, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. LEWIS, it was Ordered, That the petition of C. G. Gunter, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was

Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of George Center; and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. DOUGLAS gave notice that on to-morrow, or some early day thereafter, he will ask leave to introduce a bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way and a donation of public lands, for making a railroad connecting the Upper and Lower Mississippi with the chain of Northern Lakes at Chicago.

GENERAL SCOTT'S PLANS, ETC.

Mr. MANGUM submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public service, copies of the letter referred to in his Message of General Scott, of 30th May, 1847, and of the letter of General Taylor of 26th October, 1846, on the subject of forced contributions in Mexico, and of all other correspondence on that subject, (if any,) not heretofore communicated.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Campbell, their Clerk.

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of a register to the bark Union."

They have passed a bill entitled "An act for the relief of the owners of the bark Sarah and Eliza, to which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

BARQUE SARAH AND ELIZA.

On motion by Mr. DIX, the bill last mentioned, from the House of Representatives, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

PRIVATE EXPRESSES.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law, to prevent the losses sustained by the public, in consequence of information conveyed by the daily express established by individuals to and from New Orleans.

RETROCESSION OF ALEXANDRIA.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. HUNTER asked, and obtained leave, to bring in a bill supplemental to an act passed the 9th day of July, in the year 1846, entitled "An act to retrocede the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to the State of Virginia;" which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BREESE asked, and obtained leave, to bring in a bill to provide for the compensation of Samuel Leech, for services in the investigation of suspended sales in the Mineral Point District, Wisconsin; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public lands.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom had been referred the memorial of John Black, reported a bill for the relief of John Black, late Consul of the United States at the city of Mexico; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. SEVIER also submitted documents on the subject, which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom had been referred the bill for the relief of Creed Taylor, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of J. F. Caldwell, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

WIDOWS OF REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, making further provisions for surviving widows of soldiers of the revolution, reported it without amendment.

FORCED CONTRIBUTIONS IN MEXICO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted on the 11th inst., by Mr. DAYTON, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish to the Senate, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public service,) copies of the letter referred to in his Message, of General Scott, of 30th May, 1847, and of the letter of General Taylor of 26th October, 1846, on the subject of forced contributions in Mexico, and of all other correspondence on that subject, (if any,) not heretofore communicated.

MR. TRIST'S CORRESPONDENCE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted on the 11th inst., by Mr. BALDWIN; and it was agreed to.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate for the information of the Senate, the correspondence between the Commissioner from the United States and the Commissioners appointed by the government of Mexico to negotiate with him, during the suspension of hostilities, after the battles of Contreras and Churubusco; and any other information which may enable the Senate to understand the terms, progress and issue of that negotiation, so far as he may deem the same not incompatible with the public interests.

COLONIZATION VESSELS.

The bill exempting vessels employed by the American Colonization Society in transporting colored emigrants from the United States to the coast of Africa from the provisions of the acts of the 22d February and 2d March, 1847, regulating the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed, and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

JOHN M. MOORE.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to compensate John M. Moore; which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with an amendment.

The question being taken upon concurring in the amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands, it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved to amend the bill by striking out the proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—That is the amendment reported from the Committee.

Mr. BREESE—I would inquire whether the amendment has been concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—It has.

Mr. BREESE.—I move then to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I hope it will not be re-considered. This case of Mr. Moore presents, to my mind, one of rather a remarkable character. The foundation of the claim is, that the principal officer of the department for a number of years was incompetent to perform the duties, and Mr. Moore was called on as chief clerk to perform the duties of commissioner. There is no reason why we should pay him in both capacities. It seems to me the proper principle for the Government to act upon is, to require the whole time of the officers in the employment of the Government; and if he receives full compensation as chief clerk, I do not see why we should also pay him a commissioner's salary. I know there is one illustrious example to the contrary. I refer to the case of Mr. Butler, who received compensation as head of two departments, making his salary, instead of five or six thousand, amount to ten or twelve thousand. Congress, perceiving that this was a great abuse, legislated on the subject, and passed a law, if my recollection serves me right, in 1806 or '7, providing that thereafter this abuse of receiving compensation for two offices at the same time, shall not be practised. You have, therefore, on the statute book a legislative condemnation of the practice, which, by this bill, you are attempting to introduce again. If the law is wrong, why not repeal it, and go back to the old practice of allowing double salaries, or salaries for two offices at the same time? I hope the vote will not be re-considered.

The reading of the report accompanying the bill, was asked for by Mr. BREESE, and it was read by the Secretary.

Mr. BREESE.—The report goes fully into the merits of this case, sir. It appears that Mr. Moore has been Chief Clerk of the Land Office for about five-and-twenty years, and that an immense amount of labor has devolved upon him in consequence of his discharging the duties of Commissioner. It is not proposed that he shall have the salaries of the two offices given him, but that he shall have the salary of a Commissioner, deducting that which he would be entitled to receive as Chief Clerk. If this bill passes he will not receive compensation for the two, (although, as he performed the du-ties of both offices, he should receive compensation for both,) but as the service which he rendered as Commissioner was not continuous, but was performed at different times, a few days at a time, it is proposed to compute the amount of service rendered, and pay him accordingly. As Chief Clerk, Mr. Moore has been for years exerting all his energies to protect the interests of the government, and has been instrumental in one instance alone, without mentioning any other, of saving to the government several thousand dollars. I refer to the purchase of parchment for the use of the departments; he has saved more to the government in that one article than all the compensation which he has received, and all which it is proposed to give him. It seems but an act of justice that he should receive compensation as a Commissioner, and I am sorry to see any opposition offered to the passage of the bill.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I desire to obtain some information on one point, of the honorable Senator from Illinois, (Mr. BREESE.) The Senator has referred to precedents allowing the salaries of two different offices to the same person who had performed the duties of both, and if I heard correctly, those precedents were stated in the report of the Committee. I have been able to make but a cursory perusal of the report of the Committee, but I am under the impression that all the precedents there referred to are of allowances by the Departments in former years, and not by Congress.—There is a wide difference. I would inquire if there is a single instance in which Congress has sanctioned the allowance of double salaries? I have understood they have always refused it, and did so in President Monroe's case. If there is a case of such allowance by Congress, I hope it will be stated. So far from this being the case, I have understood that the practice of making such allowances as were made so improperly to Mr. Butler and others, had become such an evil—I was about to use a harsher term—such an iniquity, that in 1842, Congress passed an act positively forbidding such allowance. Congress doubtless acted on the principle that an officer owed all his time to the public in the office he regularly held, according to the usages as to the hours of service, and that it was incompatible for him to hold, permanently, and do the duties of another and a different office at the same time. He should doubtless receive the salary of the highest office that he did the duties of, but the law contemplates that each office is to be filled by different persons, and the respective duties done by different persons. It is a violation of law for one to fill both and do the duties of both. Officers are, and are intended to be, checks on each other. I think to make the allowance in this case, would be to base it upon a violation of law; and besides, it would repudiate and disregard the principles of the act of 1842, which I think Congress should rigidly adhere to. It was a wise and salutary law, and its principles should not be disregarded to meet a special case.

Mr. BREESE.—The honorable Senator is altogether mistaken. The act of 1842, to which he refers, was only meant to prevent the Treasury Officers from making compensation for the duties of two officers. It was all very right for Congress to forbid the Officers of the Treasury from doing it, but here is a case that rests upon its own merits—of an individual who has spent the best energies of his youth in the service of the government, and has saved to the government thousands and thousands of dollars, and who has performed the duties of Commissioner of the Land Office faithfully, and at the same time the duties of Chief Clerk. Laboring incessantly, and dragging out a miserable existence upon the mere pittance of Chief Clerk of that office. Sir, it seems to me to be a strong case, and one which appeals powerfully to our favorable consideration.

Mr. BADGER.—I feel bound to interrupt this discussion to ask the Senate to proceed with the special order of the day.

Mr. BREESE.—I hope the bill will be passed over informally then, so that it may be taken up at an early day.

The bill was then passed over informally.

DONIPHAN'S EXPEDITION.

Mr. BRADBURY from the Committee on Printing, to whom had been referred the resolutions submitted on the 3d instant by Mr. Benton, for printing the tour or memoir of Dr. Wislizenus, reported that there be printed for the Senate, five thousand copies of the tour—and that there be lithographed a like number of the maps accompanying the same; also two hundred for the use of Dr. Wislizenus.

The report was concurred in.

BARONE CANTON.

The Vice President signed the enrolled bill to authorize the issuing of a register to the barque Canton.

ADJOURNMENT.

On motion it was ordered that when the Senate adjourn it be to Monday next.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration, on its third reading, of the bill to raise for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. PEARCE.—It would have been agreeable to me if I could have deferred for a few days the remarks which I propose to make in reference to the subject now under consideration of the Senate. Like my colleague, however, I shall be compelled to be absent for a few days on business, and I have therefore to throw myself on the indulgence of the Senate.

With much that my colleague has said in that part of his remarks which he addressed to the Senate on the second day, I cordially agree, but there are other points in dispute, upon which his opinions and mine are wholly and widely variant. I regret this variance, not only because we represent a common constituency, but because I have long entertained for my colleague such high respect and regard, that it is painful for me to differ with him here on any subject, and particularly painful to have a collision of opinion upon a question of such fundamental importance.

I had occasion, sir, at the last session of the Senate to present to this body my views upon a part of this subject, and if it had been my colleague's purpose to controvert the position which I then assumed, and overthrow the arguments which I endeavored to sustain, he could not have addressed himself more directly to the purpose than he has done. Sir, I have no complaint of this. But it is a duty which compels me either to abandon the ground I have formerly taken, or to reaffirm it and sustain it as best I may. Besides, sir, the Legislature of my State is now in session, my term of service here is drawing to a close, and it is right that I should possess that body fully with the opinions I entertain upon this important subject, that they may be the better enabled to determine in whose hands to place the trust with which I have hitherto been honored. Sir, I do not shrink from the issue; and I am consoled by the conviction that in the opinions which I entertain, and which I am about to express, I have reflected the sentiments of those whom I represent.

Like my colleague, I am anxious to maintain the honor of my country, to vindicate her reputation from the least blemish, and particularly to prevent the just and probable charge of rapacious perfidiousness, of grasping cupidity, and lust of conquest. But, in my opinion, this cannot be done by merely affirming the justice of a war, in the justice and constitutionality of which I have no faith; much less can it be done by sustaining the President in a course by which, in my opinion, we should be practically subverting the constitution; wresting from Congress, to whom alone the constitution has confided them, the issues of war and peace, making him the supreme controller of affairs—making him in fact, if we look at the matter in view of its consequences, the master of our fate, and the more dangerously so, because he rules under the form of free institutions, in the spirit of a despot.

Sir, I do not pretend to deny that the United States has just claims against Mexico, for indemnity due to our citizens; but I do deny that those claims were the cause of this war, or that they would be the just cause of any war. I deny that they would have justified Congress in declaring war against Mexico. Sir, war is a last and direful alternative of nations, the ultima ratio regum, and the last resort of republics also. It should never be undertaken without an unavoidable necessity. All Publicists tell us this. The language of Vattel is, that there must be a clear right coupled with a sort of necessity, and this is consistent with the principles of common sense and humanity.

Now, let us see what are the causes which have produced this war. The President has paraded before us an exaggerated statement of these claims, as if they were the causes of the war; and yet he affirms that Mexico brought on the war by her illegal and unjust act by shedding American blood upon American soil. Sir, these claims against Mexico, for indemnity due to our citizens, have existed for a series of years, it is true—some for a longer and others for a shorter time. But, I ask, if Mexico has resisted pertinaciously, the payment of these claims; I ask, if the resistance or neglect to pay, on the part of Mexico, is even comparable to that which we have experienced at the hands of stronger nations; and, I ask, if it becomes us to adopt one rule of right, one measure of patience in regard to a weak nation and another rule of right and greater measure of patience in regard to a strong and haughty people. I trust there is no Senator who will not repel with scorn such an imputation. Yet, I fear, we are about to forget the rule of equality in regard to this particular transaction.

Now, in 1839, Mexico entered into a convention with us, by which she agreed to form a commission for the ascertainment of the claims due to our citizens. That commission sat, and adjudicated many of the claims, but being limited in point of time, they were not all decided. Some of them, not receiving the confirmation of the commissioners, were referred to an umpire, who had not time to decide, and some were not acted on at all. Well, Mexico did not withhold from us or refuse the payment of those claims which were admitted by the commissioners. On the contrary, she manifested a disposition to meet the payment by levying forced contributions upon her citizens for that purpose, and concluded another convention in 1843, providing for the organization of another commission for the adjudication of the claims not settled by the first. In consequence of her embarrassed condition and exhausted Treasury, Mexico was unable to make payment of the awarded claims as stipulated; but she entered into an arrangement with General Thompson, the Minister of the United States, to pay the claims by instalments, showing that she acted in good faith, and with no disposition to withhold the payment. She paid all the arrears of interest at eight per cent, and three instalments of principal, nor was it until the negotiation of the Annexation Treaty, the expulsion of Santa Anna from power, and his exile from Mexico, that they failed to make the payments. Whether annexation was the cause of such failure, or whether it arose from their inability to pay, I cannot undertake to say; but, I think, the latter the more probable cause. One thing is certain, that Mexico made great efforts, and if she did not make punctual payments, it was rather to be attributed to her distressed condition than to any want of faith. Well, who is there who does not recollect that we ourselves, have been delinquent in this way in reference to the claims of Great Britain against us. I refer to the debts due the British merchants, recognized by the treaty of 1783, and not paid, I believe, for twenty years after that date. I remember too, sir, that our claims against Great Britain for the negroes carried off at the close of the war of 1812, were not settled finally till 1826, although provided for in the treaty of peace.—Who does not recollect the claims for spoliation by Naples and Denmark, and the more remarkable case of spoliations by France, the most flagrant of all, committed in the wantonness of power—in very scorn of our rights—without the slightest justification, and persisted in, repeated and boldly defended with the most offensive effrontery, and yet endured by this country through successive administrations from 1806 until 1831—when a distinguished gentleman, who was formerly a member of this body, (Mr. RIVES of Virginia,) negotiated the Treaty of Indemnity; and then France, adding further wrong to the heaped up injury which we had sustained so patiently, withheld the payment of the money for four years longer? Gen. Jackson did, indeed, in 1835, address Congress on the subject, and suggest reprisals as a proper mode of redress; and he asked three millions of dollars to be placed at his disposal to enable him to act as circumstances might require. But Congress neither adopted his recommendation of reprisals, nor voted him the three millions, and the Senate chose rather to allow the defeat of the fortification bill.

Sir, France was not feeble—her treasury was not exhausted; she was the most elastic Power in Europe, as was manifested by her immense payments made to the allies after the restoration of the Bourbons. Yet, sir, we submitted to all this from France, and it was only in 1835 that we recovered from her the indemnity that was due for spoliations committed in 1806 and 1813. Neither was the indemnity which we obtained from her, a complete and full one. It was a partial and imperfect indemnity. Our plundered merchants got only a dividend of their claims. And yet we talk of violated honor! and the President rants about our claims against Mexico! some of them, by the by, of a very questionable character; some of them, in fact, grossly fraudulent, as I have been informed by a distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, and such as never could be properly demanded by our Government under the treaty with Mexico. I speak of those contracts for land upon which enormous demands for indemnity were founded—which demands this Government was asked to enforce. Sir, take it altogether, and I do say that there never was urged in a legislative body so unreasonable a proposition as, that it is just and necessary to wage a war for the mere procrastination of payment of claims like these, against a weak and impoverished Government. And yet this is urged as though it were a sufficient cause for war; when everybody knows who reflects at all upon the matter, that such has never been heretofore regarded as a justifiable cause of war. No, sir, I will tell you what was the cause of this war. It was the unauthorized act of the President in taking possession of territory to which this county had no title—to which Congress had not authorized him to make claim, and against making a claim for which they had warned him by the very terms of the resolution of annexation.

Sir, my colleague has gone fully into this question, and I have no doubt, that he thought he had demonstrated the correctness of his position; but he took good care not to mention the Mexican claims as being the cause of the war. He did not consider that they were the cause of the war, however much the President paraded them in his messages.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I never thought they were.

Mr. PEARCE.—But he put it upon the ground that this government was bound to vindicate its title to the territory up to the Rio Grande, and he cites a variety of facts which, as he thinks, belong to the consideration of this question, and which in his opinion are conclusive. Well, now I think that the facts which he has cited—some of them at least—do not belong to the consideration of the question, and that neither one nor all of them are conclusive. I think I can demonstrate this, and that I can show on the other side facts which are strong as chains of adamant. I pass over that part of his speech in which my colleague speaks of the revolution of Texas. Nobody doubts the gallantry of those citizens of Texas who achieved their independence. Sir, as far as their gallantry is concerned, their spirit of heroic adventure, their bold and daring exposure of life, I believe there is nothing to surpass it. Nobody questions their right to revolt from Mexico to establish an independent government, and to claim all the territory over which they could extend and enforce their jurisdiction. But my colleague says:

"The boundaries of Coahuila and Texas as these departments were united off into one State by the convention of '74, was the Nueces, running for upwards of one hundred miles in that distance and then by a line across from that point to the Rio Grande. The reason why it was that line, between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, was a part of the State of Tamaulipas. Tamaulipas granted it to various individuals by what were called colony-grants, under which many settlements were made."

I make no objection to this statement, sir; I only desire to add something to it, to make it a little more specific. In 1824, the departments of Coahuila and Texas were united, without change of their former boundaries, provisionally as one State—it being understood that, when Texas had strength and population enough, she should be made a separate State.

The United State of Coahuila and Texas ran across the Rio Grande, but the boundary of Texas proper never did—her limits stopped at the Nueces. My colleague went on to refer to the treaty to which Santa Anna was a party at the time he was prisoner in Texas; and he relied upon the authority of that miscalled treaty as conclusive.

Sir, my colleague is a distinguished lawyer; he stands at the head of his profession in Maryland, and that is praise enough for any man. He is the successor, sir, of Martin, Pinkney, and Wirt, and wears their mantle gracefully. But I must express my utter astonishment at hearing from him, that this miscalled treaty between Santa Anna and the Texas authorities is conclusive on the question of boundary. Why, sir, it was no treaty at all. Santa Anna was a prisoner; and if he had not been, we all know that the constitution of Mexico contains a provision—that when the President of the republic is at the head of the army, his civil functions cease. He was in captivity; and if he had not been, he would have had no authority to conclude a treaty under the constitution of his country, which is like our own in that respect. A treaty, when signed, requires confirmation by the Senate; and a treaty made by Santa Anna was of no more value than blank paper. It might have had a moral obligation as far as he himself was concerned, but it had not even a legal obligation upon himself, having been extorted by duress.

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the Senator allow me to inquire whether he refers to the constitution of 1824.

Mr. PEARCE.—Will the Senator have the kindness to inform me whether there was any other constitution?

Mr. FOOTE.—The Senator can answer my my inquiry or not, as he pleases.

Mr. PEARCE.—I am not furnished with any information as to any new constitution. I believe there was none. The constitution of 1824 was said to be overthrown, because its federal character was abolished and the central form substituted. It was not abolished in the whole, but only changed in part, and therefore this provision remained in full force. If it were not so, and the whole constitution were destroyed, then Santa Anna had no constitutional power at all, and could in no manner bind his country.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—Where do you read from?

Mr. PEARCE.—I read from a work entitled "Texas and the Texans," which I understand to be the production of the Senator from Mississippi, and one which I have read with great pleasure.

"That the President Santa Anna in the official character as chief of the Mexican nation, and the Government (through Messrs. Don José Urrea, Don Joaquin Ramirez y Sesma, and Don Victor Blanco, accepted or authorized, or obtained the subsequent sanction and ratification of the provisional articles agreed upon by Santa Anna as such with Senator Hunt and myself, I entertain no doubt upon the evidence; and they do actually bind the Mexican nation. It is upon the well-known general and established principles of the national law. In fact, it cannot be denied that the government and commander-in-chief of a nation has the power and discretion to make preliminary arrangements for the negotiation of the treaty which a sovereign and peaceful treaty of amity and commerce, to be negotiated with that government, at the City of Mexico, by ordinary plenipotentiaries duly appointed for the purpose. Such is the law of nations, and for this I can refer to Vattel, Book 2, chapter 12, section 156, and to many other writers of the highest authority."

Why, I say, upon the very face of the instrument itself, it was not a treaty. It was nothing else than the personal obligation of Santa Anna. Now, allow me to call the attention of the Senate to the opinion of General Lamar. I understand that Santa Anna was a prisoner in the hands of the Texans, and that they were deliberating whether they should shoot him a-la-Mexique, try him for offences against the laws of civilized war, or send him back to Mexico. Now, what says General Lamar, in the paper addressed by him to President Burnet?

Mr. JOHNSON.—What is the date of that letter?

Mr. PEARCE.—It is a letter from General Lamar, the Secretary of War of Texas, to the President and Cabinet of Texas, and dated 12th May, 1836:

"* * * What good can the Texas to result from an executed enemy? General Santa Anna is now * * * and as soon as * * * he will be ready to make an agreement which our rights may require, or our selfishness exact, but, when restored to liberty and power, will be feel any obligation to comply with terms which he had no agency in dictating. What is * * * to restrain him from the most flagrant violation? Indeed, the idea of treating with a man in our power, who views freedom in sequestrance, and death in opposition, seems to me more worthy of ridicule than refutation. * * * Would such a measure shed a brighter chaplet around the brow of our heroes? I trow not. * * * But, independent of all these considerations, it may be very well doubted whether Santa Anna, with every disposition to fulfil any agreement which he may now enter into, will, on his return to Mexico, have the power to do it. It was public opinion which drove him into war with Texas, and the same public sentiment, on his arrival at home, may keep him in the attitude of avowed enmity. * * * The * * * to the country. The advantages expected to be gained from his supposed or probable integrity, cannot, of consequence, be realized, even with every willingness on his part to redeem his pledge. I doubt not in the least, that as soon as the news of his defeat and imprisonment shall be sounded within the walls of Mexico, that instant will he lost all his authority in the land, as he has long since lost the affections of his people. He will be powerless either for good or ill. I am, therefore, decidedly opposed to all negotiation or arrangements with him; first, because he is a prisoner, and not free to act; secondly, because he is faithless and unworthy of confidence; and thirdly, because of the great certainty of his inability to fulfil his promises, even with the desire to do it."

Well, but my colleague says that Texas fulfilled the contract on her part, General Filisola accepted it and marched his men back to the Rio Grande, &c. So he did; but that did not constitute it a treaty, General Filisola not being the ratifying power.

It might have been an appeal to Santa Anna's honor; it undoubtedly was so; but as a treaty, it had no obligations; it was a treaty made by a captive, and ratified by a runaway; and, I take it, sir, that no validity will be ascribed to it by any fair man who understands the facts.

My colleague next relies, sir, on the action of the Texan Congress regarding the boundary of the State, and says, that they passed a law describing the Rio Grande as the boundary. I should like to know how the mere act of the Congress or legislature of any country, can authorize the fixing their boundaries where they please to put them on paper; how the declaration of any Congress or government can make a right or authorize a claim in such a case. It can do nothing more than assert a claim, and I venture to go a little further, and say that I presume, that in the case of Texas, it was not done bona fide. They did not deem that they were to take in Santa Fe, or any of the valley of the Rio Grande. They claimed a great deal of territory in order to secure a part.

Sir, I do not make this statement from any personal knowledge that I have, but I will refer to the authority of an honorable Senator here, and I beg leave to read from a speech made by the honorable Mr. Ashley, at the second session of the 28th Congress:

"And here I will add, that the present boundaries of Texas I learn from Judge Ellis, the president of the convention that formed the constitution of Texas, and also a member of the first legislature under that constitution, were fixed as they now are solely and principally with a view of bringing large interests in the negotiation with Mexico, one not with the expectation of retaining them as they now exist in their statute book."

Sir, this authority is worth all my colleague's array of proofs. But my colleague says, that after the retreat of Filisola across the river, General Rusk, who was still at the head of the army of Texas and stationed at the Guadaloupe, ordered the families between that part and the Rio Grande to retire to his rear, or to remove to the western bank of the river. The most of them did retire to his rear, but many of the Mexicans preferred to cross the river and settle on the opposite side. Now, sir, how was this taking possession of the country? You may make a solitude, and call it peace; or you may empty a country of its population, and call it occupancy or possession; but you acquire no right by the misapplication of terms. The portion of the people friendly to Texas withdrew to the rear of Gen. Rusk—that is, beyond the Guadaloupe, which is further east, even, than the Nueces. Certainly, they were not taking possession of the country which they thus abandoned. Certainly, they were not occupying the valley of the Rio Grande, when they fled from it to the east of the Guadaloupe to avoid the horrors of a border war. So the Mexican population withdrew to the western bank of the river, and the country was deserted.

But my colleague rests his argument upon the ground, that if Texas had not actual possession, she had it potentially, as Dr. Johnson would have said—that is, that she had the power to occupy it. Well, sir, I deny that the power to take possession, would give a constructive possession. It is not a legal position that can be maintained. As between individuals, actual possession of every acre of a tract of land is not necessary to a right. If we have the title to the whole, and the actual possession of a part, the residue not being possessed by another, the actual possession of a part will operate the constructive possession of the whole. It is so with nations. But Texas had no right by possession, as I shall demonstrate to be the case; and the mere power to possess, if she had been able to take and maintain possession, which I do not admit, would not give a constructive possession. A right to the whole, coupled with a possession of a part, would answer. But Texas was a revolutionary government, and could not divest the title of Tamaulipas and other Mexican States to the lands lying within their respective and undoubted limits, except by taking and holding possession. This she never did, either by her settlers or her soldiers, for the occasional passage of troops across the country was not possession; and, in fact, the Mexicans crossed it thus, as well as the Texans. Predatory excursions and border forays were never held to make a possession.

But my colleague says that General Rusk, for the purpose of facilitating the removal of those occupying the country" and of watching the movements of the Mexican army, and preparatory to an advance upon Matamoras, dispatched General Felix Houston with a sufficient force to take possession of Corpus Christi, and that was done. This was true sir; and this is a good point—I mean as to the right of Texas up to that limit which indeed I freely admit to have been the frontier of Texas. Beyond this they did not go, beyond this they had no possession in the legitimate sense of the word, and therefore I deny that the establishment of the port at Corpus Christi established the claim of Texas up to the Rio Grande.

Texas had no establishments there; she had erected no forts, she had no civil officers in that country; no, I believe not so much as a justice of the peace or a constable. But it is said as proof of possession of this country, that at an election held at Corpus Christi in 1842—certain settlers came from the disputed territory and voted. And it is asserted that Texas thereby and then established her authority. Whether they voted, but where they did not vote.—Well, I assert exactly the reverse, and I ask whether if her authority had been established on the Rio Grande she would have required her citizens to travel 150 miles to give their votes. Why, if Texas had established any authority or jurisdiction on the Rio Grande, she would at least have had the election so held as to accommodate these poor fellows who were so desirious of exercising the elective franchise. Now, I care not whether these people went to Corpus Christi to vote or not—nobody knows who they were or whence they came, how they were induced to come, whether they were the poor fishermen of Padre Island, or straggling herdsmen who attended their flocks like the Nomades of the eastern world. The whole thing wants precision to make it valuable as a fact, and if Texas had not even an election precinct on the Rio Grande country, that of itself is sufficient proof that she had no establishment there which could constitute possession.

The other fact which my colleague cites as an authority to prove the right of Texas is what he stated, on the authority of the Senafor from Texas, that certain purchaser of the [illegible] grants of Tamaulipas had their deeds recorded in Texas. We do not know where they were executed and acknowledged. This, too, wants precision, detail, and finish, to give it certainty and make it available. But suppose that be so, and what does it amount to more than this, that some shrewd, hedging fellows, knowing that the country was claimed by Texas, and supposing it [illegible] may be acquired by it, thought it prudent to have these deeds recorded in Texas, as well probably, as at Matamoras, as future evidence of their title. The fact, indeed, is stated a little too broadly, for it is said this was done as far back as 1834; when, in fact, the revolution in Texas only took place in 1835. At all events, assuming the fact in its fullest extent, it only proves that Texas had no clerks nor record officers in this region of 150 miles breadth.

My colleague says that no Mexican authorities were to be found there, and that Mexico had lost the right she once had. Now I propose to refer to a few authorities to show you the other side of the question; and I think that these authorities cannot be overthrown. I shall invoke first the authority of the Senator from Missouri, whose elaborate research, and whose accurate and minute information, have been the boast of his friends and the admiration of his opponents. Now let me read from a speech made by that Senator after the formation of the annexation treaty. It will be recollected that he introduced a bill for the annexation of Texas, and in that bill he submitted several propositions as the bases of his proposed arrrangement. Here is what he says on the subject of boundary:

[illegible]

"The great natural boundary of Mexico, on the east, is the Mississippi and its waters. Texas, in her revolution, declared that her boundary was the Rio Grande del Norte, from its mouth to its source, thence due north to the forty-second degree of north latitude, thence with the boundary line between the United States and Mexico to the Gulf of Mexico. Texas has never been in the undisputed possession of the country to the Rio Grande del Norte, and has never had any other boundary than the Nueces. Texas, in her revolution, declared that her boundary was the Rio Grande del Norte, from its mouth to its source, thence due north to the forty-second degree of north latitude, thence with the boundary line between the United States and Mexico to the Gulf of Mexico. Texas has never been in the undisputed possession of the country to the Rio Grande del Norte, and has never had any other boundary than the Nueces. [illegible] with such as might be rightfully and properly assigned to her, to be subject to settlement by negotiation with this government, is as clear as any proposition can be.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Will the Senator yield the floor that I may make a short explanation in reference to that treaty? It is a treaty which I negotiated in reference to the admission of Texas, and which was rejected by the Senate.

In making that treaty, and entering into it, I by no means assumed that the Rio del Norte was the western boundary of Texas. On the contrary, I assumed that the boundary was an unsettled one between Mexico and Texas. No provisions were made in reference to it, because Texas, by the provisions of that treaty, was to come into the Union as a territory; and as such, the right of the government of the United States to settle the boundary was unquestionable; there was an express provision to that effect. It was different in reference to the resolutions under which Texas was actually admitted into the Union. They proposed to admit her as a State, not as a territory; and, coming in that character, it would have been necessary to have had the consent of Texas to establish a boundary between her and Mexico. Those resolutions, to avoid the difficulties which might result, very properly contained a provision which provided that the matter in dispute should be settled by the government of the United States.

I am far from thinking that the treaty which I negotiated, established the Del Norte as the boundary. Immediately after the negotiation, I despatched a messenger to our chargé in Mexico, and among other things, intimated to him that the government of the United States was prepared to settle the boundary on the most liberal terms. What boundary was contemplated at the time, it is unnecessary to state, and would be improper, perhaps, on the present occasion.

Mr. SEVIER.—If the Senator from Maryland will indulge me a moment, I would here remark, that when the treaty was before us, the Senator from Missouri some time in April, introduced a resolution calling on President Tyler to furnish us with the boundary line of Texas. That call, if I remember right, was referred to the State department and we had in response a map now on file, defining the boundary with broad blue lines, from the mouth of the Rio Grande to its sources. To strengthen our position as friends of the measure of annexation, we were furnished also, with a memoir, giving us the quantity of land then claimed, the billions of acres, and thousands of square miles, computing the whole of it, from the mouth to the source of that river. That was the boundary for which we contended at that time. There was a difficulty about this boundary. Will the Senator pardon me a few moments longer? Those of us who supported the treaty, never had the slightest difficulty in our own minds, as to the title to that portion of the country below New Mexico, or the Sante Fe country; about that portion, we did have some difficulty, as we thought it a fair subject for negotiation, and we went upon the ground that it was held by revolution—that the arms of Texas had conquered it.

I would observe, that a former Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. McDuffie,] and Mr. Walker of the Treasury Department, who were advocates with him of the treaty, never heard from him or Tyler, or any one else in favor of the treaty, that the Nueces or any other than the Rio Grande below the Nueces, was the proper boundary of Texas. The map coming from his own Department to which I formerly referred, and the constitution of Texas, both represented the Rio Grande as the boundary. If there had been a different view entertained about the boundary at that time, I suppose I should have heard something of it. I may take occasion at some future period to dwell at length upon this subject.

Mr. PEARCE.—I have heard the Senator from South Carolina with a great deal of pleasure. I had not forgotten that map of Texas, and I think I know all about it. If I recollect distinctly, in the memoir which accompanied it, the intelligent officer who made the map, Lieut. Emory, stated that he felt himself bound to designate the boundaries of Texas as prescribed in her ordinance, not meaning to assign them as the true boundaries. It exhibited the boundaries as claimed by Texas, and I was not unaware of the position of the Senator from South Carolina on this point; nor did I mean to say that the objection taken by the Senator from Missouri properly applied to this treaty. Probably if I had not been interrupted, I should have made the explanation which the Senator himself has just offered.

But the argument of the Senator from Missouri was conclusive to me of the want of title to the whole of the country, from the source of the Rio Grande in the region of eternal snows, to its mouth, in the clime of perpetual flowers. If the Senator from Arkansas will pardon me the remark, I have often heard him say, that this Sante Fe country was the weak point of this case. I am afraid he did not characterise it exactly right after all, I have heard of such a point as it is elsewhere. It is called point no point. It has not the semblance of argument; there is not the fragment of a fact to sustain it. He, himself, admits that Texas never had a soldier at Sante Fe, except as a prisoner. All the Texans that were ever there were either taken prisoners by the Mexicans or killed. The Mexicans had undoubted sway there, they had dominion there for centuries, and the Senator from Missouri knew that well; and he stated that they had possession of it for a hundred years before La Salle ever saw the coast of Texas. Well, sir, we must all admit, that the only armed force in the disputed territory on the lower as well as the upper Del Norte was a Mexican force. I allude to the armed company at Loredo, commissioned by the Mexican government. Very possibly the object was to protect the people from Indian incursions, as I think I have heard stated by the Senator from Texas himself.

Mr. RUSK.—Loredo is in the bounds of Texas, as defined in the constitution of '24.

Mr. PEARCE.—I know it is not in Tamaulipas. It was within the boundary of the United State of Coahuila, and Texas; but not in Texas itself. In 1824 Texas was not yet created into a separate State: Coahuila extended across the country, as all the maps show, to the Nueces. The only military post then on the lower Rio Grande, was the post of Loredo, at which were stationed armed men, commissioned by Mexican authority.

But my colleague referred to several acts of Congress as authorities, to sustain him in his position. The first act of December, 1845, extending the laws of the U. States to Texas, was cited by him as one of these authorities. I confess, I am at a loss to know how any inference can be drawn from that, in favor of our right, or the right of Texas, to the country between the Neuces and the Rio Grande. It affirms no limits of Texas. As the resolution of annexation applied only to Texas as properly limited, so this law provided that over Texas proper, with her rightful limits, the laws of the United States should be extended. Well, then my colleague referred to the act of February 1846, making Corpus Christi a port of delivery, and Galveston a port of entry. But Corpus Christi was within the limits which Texas maintained by force of arms—within the bounds of revolutionized Texas; and undoubtedly we took Corpus Christi into the Union, when we admitted Texas, and we had as good a right to establish a port of delivery there, as we had to establish a port of entry at Galveston. Corpus Christi was the frontier settlement of Texas, and having been always since the revolution under her jurisdiction, was as little disputed as Nacogdoches itself. Here the possession was unquestioned, and the title absolute, but this fact could give no colour to the claim to territory beyond her reach and not subject to the sway of Texas. But the act of February 2d 1847, is also invoked in aid of the argument. Sir, this act was passed long after the war was recognized by Congress, indeed it was a consequence of the war, and cannot apply to a state of things existing at the commencement of hostilities. It provided among others for a post route from the Brazos to Fort Brown. I well recollect the history of that act and the proceedings, while it was pending here. Some objection was made to it, as likely to be quoted in aid of the boundary question, when it was explained by more than one member. Allow me to refer to it, and to read a few remarks of the Honorable Senator from Texas on the subject. When it came here after its passage in the House of Representatives, it was objected that it might involve some question as to the boundary of Texas:

Mr. RUSK said he could not agree that this provision would involve any question as to the boundary between Mexico and Texas, he understood. The establishment of this route would prevent the necessity the letters to the army through a circuit of five hundred miles. He had another reason for pressing this route. Texas ever since her annexation had been worse supplied with mail routes than she was before. There were five or six counties entirely destitute of accommodation. If the bill were amended and sent back to the House, great delay must be the consequence; and the Post Master General was now waiting for its passage, to make the necessary contracts.

The honorable Senator from Texas then disclaimed the view of raising the question of boundary on the bill?

Mr. RUSK.—Will the honorable Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment? My remarks on the occasion referred to were not correctly reported, although, it might be said, they amounted, in substance, to the same thing. What I did say was, that "I did not think the bill under consideration involved the question of boundary, but, if other gentlemen thought so, and should move to strike out that portion of the bill, I was fully prepared to discuss that point, and could prove incontestibly, as I thought, the right of Texas to the wholee territory, down as far as the Rio Grande."—The remarks were originally made in answer to suggestions made by an honorable Senator from Massachusetts and an honorable Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PEARCE.—The Senator says, that the report is substantially correct, though not exactly so. I knew that the question had been raised in the House of Representatives, and that it was put on a footing which I, myself, recognised as legitimate. I find that when this bill was introduced into the House, Mr. VINTON moved to amend it.

Mr. VINTON moved to amend the bill by adding to the second section the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be understood to contain an expression by Congress of its opinion as to the question of boundary between the territory of the United States and Mexico.

In the discussion which followed, I find that Mr. Dromgoole made the following remarks:

Mr. Dromgoole resuming, said he supposed that neither the transportation of the mail, nor the establishment of a post office, or of a custom-house, were conclusive facts in regard to a boundary, whenever the two nations should see fit to enter into negociation respecting it. But admit that this is disputed boundary, and then having the possession of it, we have the complete right to govern the country during the possession, even if it be a military possession. We have not only the power to establish post-offices, post-routes, custom-houses, but to introduce civil governments, not only on this side of the Rio Grande, but through all the provinces of Mexico which had been overrun by our arms; we had the right to retain it, inasmuch as during the time we occupied them. None of them were [illegible] which we might do because we said, possession of [illegible]

Now, sir, this is perfectly [illegible] and I may add that it [illegible] teristic of the intelligent, adroit, and skilful parliamentarian who made the remark. It was necessary to supply our army with postmasters, and certainly he had authority to do so—the country being in our possession by military occupation. We had, undoubtedly, as good a right to establish a post-route to Fort Brown as to send troops there. But I need not argue this point farther. The ground of the passage of the law was not that we had a title to the country, and it cannot be marked that [illegible] It is placed only of our military occupation of the country, of which it was a consequence.

Well, now, the next position to which I ask the attention of the Senate is this: that, as we were entitled to the east bank of the river—that being conceded—though I think I have shown that it was not so—the President was bound to march the forces of the United States to the Rio Grande, in order to dispossess the Mexicans.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I did not say so.

Mr. PEARCE.—I am aware that the Senator did not take that position; it is the language of the President himself, and I find it repeated in the Union of to-day. I hold that if Texas had a rightful claim to the country, it being in possession of Mexico, this gave him no right to march the troops of the United States there. That was an act of war, which, under the Constitution of the United States, the President had no right to commit; this is solely at the discretion of Congress, and is usurpation in the other branch of the government, no matter under what circumstances it may be done. I make this declaration under high authority. Let me remind the Senate of the example given by the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. BADGER, at the last session. When Mr. Jefferson addressed a confidential communication to Congress, and invited their attention to the condition of a certain portion of the State of Louisiana, then held by Spain, in violation of the treaty of 1803, he represented to Congress that he had tried negociation in vain, but did not feel at liberty to send the United States forces into that part of Louisiana, because, as he said, that act, Spain being in possession, might change the relations of the country, and transfer them from a state of peace to a state of war.—That territory clearly belonged unto us alone, but it was not taken possession of by order of the President. Spain for a long time retained possession of the port of Mobile, and the Florida parishes, as they were called. Nor were the latter taken possession of by the arms of the United States until in 1810, the country was revolutionized by a set of private adventurers, who set up a government for themselves. In that state of affairs, Congress not being in session, Mr. Madison issued a proclamation and took possession; because, otherwise, as he said, these parishes would have been considered derelict. He took it out of the hands of the private adventurers who had ousted the Spanish authorities and taken possession of it. Mr. Madison did not take possession of Mobile till 1813, after the passage of the secret Act of Congress of that year, authorizing him to do so. Now I say, then, upon the strength of the authorities, that if Mexico had possession of the territory, or any part of the territory, between the Nueces and the Rio Grande—even if they had constructed a fort on the opposite bank of the river, as they might have done at Matamoras, the President had no right to take possession of that portion of it in the possession of Mexico. This is not the only instance of the forbearance with which this Government has submitted to the holding of country by foreign nations, claimed by us. How long was it before certain British posts included within the limits of the United States by the treaty of '83, actually come into our possession? Great Britain held them, I think, from '83 till after Jay's treaty and the defeat of the Indians by General Wayne. Yet we declared no war against Great Britain. Gen. Washington never thought of sending an army to take possession of these posts.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—They were held by Great Britain till '95.

Mr. PEARCE.—A period of twelve years. Let me refer also to the north eastern boundary question, in dispute, from the treaty of '83 down to the settlement by the treaty of Washington in '42. I think both Houses of Congress, by an unanimous vote, declared our title to the boundary as we claimed it, and yet Great Britain occupied a portion of the territory; even her military forces were there, and not only so, but a citizen of the United States was arrested on the soil claimed by us, was carried away and incarcerated in a British dungeon, yet neither General Jackson, during whose administration the controversy existed, nor Mr. Van Buren, during whose administration the incident, which I have just related occurred, ever thought of marching the United States troops there, and taking possession of the country. He knew that Congress alone could authorize such a proceeding. That dispute was settled by negotiation, and if one half the forbearance had been exercised towards weak and prostrate Mexico, which was manifested towards Great Britain, in that controversy, we should have had no war—not a drop of blood would have been shed, not a dime in your treasury, would have been wasted.

I know another instance more recent, and more flagrant. Let me remind the Senate of the case of the Caroline. There undoubtedly American blood was shed upon American soil—shed by British troops—led by a British officer, who was applauded and promoted for the act; and yet Mr. Van Buren did not take the law into his hands—he did not make war against Great Britain—he did not ask Congress to make war. That was an act of hostility undoubtedly, but Mr. Van Buren was content to settle the matter by negotiation. I wish to know, sir, whether the United States intend to reverse the time honored maxim—

"Parcere subjectis, et debellare superbos."

Shall we make war on the weak, and not upon the strong? I fear we have forgotten that maxim in our course towards Mexico, and trample upon her who is least able to resist us. I do not doubt that it is the duty of the President of the United States to repel invasion when made within our acknowledged limits. But I deny that that is war. I deny that there can be a state of war properly, so called, unless the Congress of the United States have exerted their powers, and declared war. It is not for the President to put the country in a state of war, certainly not to invade a territory claimed by us without right, and then to vindicate himself by the declaration, that the territory of the United States was invaded—that American blood had been shed upon American soil. Sir, I blushed for the President when he made that monstrous assertion. Now, as to the farther prosecution of the war, the President tells us very distinctly in his message, that we are to have no peace with his consent, until complete indemnity shall be obtained from Mexico—"indemnity for the past and security for the future"—well characterized yesterday by the Senator from Delaware, as no bill of Mexico for indemnity and the other half as security! I agree with my colleague in his declaration, that in the triumphs of our arms we have obtained ample indemnity. I do not like to boast of the prowess of my countrymen, but certainly I have been as much struck by their achievements in Mexico, as by the story of any battles that I have ever read. I know nothing to compare with them, unless it be the defeat of the Russians at Narva by Charles the XII of Sweden. As to indemnity for the expenses of the war, when, let me ask, have we ever sought compensation in danger from other nations with whom we have been at war? We have had but three wars: the war of the revolution—a just one, I take it—was the first one in which we were engaged, and I do not see why we should not as well demand indemnity for its expenses as for the one in which we are now involved. But nobody dreamed of demanding indemnity for that war. The war of 1812 was a just war, as I believe—eminently a just war—provoked by British aggression, by the impressment of our seamen, by injuries in violation of our commercial rights. We waged that war for three years, and settled it, as I suppose every body agreed, without any loss of national honor, but without receiving or demanding any indemnity. We spent from one to two hundred millions in that war and did not get a penny back. I never heard that Mr. Madison and his cabinet, and the wise men who were in this chamber then, and who ratified the treaty of peace, were reproached for sacrificing the honor of the country in not obtaining pecuniary indemnity. Sir, I despise, I scorn this demand of pecuniary indemnity for violated faith whether made by an individual or a nation. I never heard of such a thing amongst gentlemen. I have had the curiosity to examine Jonah Barrington's account of the celebrated Kilkenny Club, renowned for being composed of the most chivalrous gentlemen that ever pulled trigger. By their rules the reparation of personal insults and wrongs is reduced to a regular system. Every offence was strictly defined, and the appropriate degree of punishment prescribed. If the offence were slight, the party aggrieved might be satisfied with an exchange of shots. If a little more aggravated, it was requisite that one party should be blooded. When the offence was of a very grave nature, somebody was to be well blooded; and there was scarcely any offence which required, according to these rules of chivalrous honor, that the combat should be mortal. Certainly, in no instance, is it recorded in the annals of the Kilkenny Club that pecuniary compensation was to be demanded by the party offended. Sir, Barrington records no instance in which the offender was called upon to pay for the powder and ball consumed, the pistols used, and transportation to the field of honor—that is to say, the hack-hire! Now, I am unwilling to place a nation in a lower scale than a private individual; neither have I one rule for Mexico and another for England.

What is the condition of Mexico? Before I reply to that inquiry, let me say, that I am perfectly disposed to demand of Mexico compensation in damages, not for the violation of national honor, but for the injuries done to our citizens in their commerce. We are their guardians—guardians of their pecuniary rights, which we are bound to maintain as against Mexico and all the world, and to see repaired by pecuniary indemnification. I hold it to be perfectly right to demand indemnity of Mexico on that ground. If she cannot give indemnity in money, let us take it in land. But do not let us make that a pretext for robbing Mexico. She is prostrate and bleeding at your feet. Your armies have triumphed in every combat, from that of Palo Alto to the last battle at Chapultepec. She has been completely vanquished—her towns stormed and bombarded—her seaports in your possession or beleaguered by your fleets—her government fugitive and your armies, in the fashionable phrase of the day, "revelling in the Halls of the Montezumas." What more do you want? Is not this enough? Did you ever hear of the bully who, when he had knocked his man down, thought it his vulgar duty to pull out his eyes?

Do you recollect, sir, the epistle of Tom Crib to Big Ben?

"What Ben! my old hero, nothing your opponent?
I thus the new-gig'd bruiser, once more, addresses:
When the fist-fac'd steward meant pretended pain then.
By the fist of my father! I blush for thee, Ben."

Mexico cannot bring an army into the field. Her revenues are exhausted. She is helpless and hopeless, except in your mercy. Yet you propose to carry the war farther—"into the vitals of the country." Not satisfied with the blood already shed, do you thirst for more? Do you desire more towns to bombard, fresh armies to defeat? When there are none of these to be found, will you rejoice in the slaughter of the miserable guerrileros?

Mr. President, let us take care that the disgraceful guerrilla warfare of Spain be not renewed upon this continent! Is there to be no end to this state of things? I do not believe that the violated honor of the country requires such vindication. That honor is in much greater danger of being tarnished by our own conduct, in the further prosecution of this war.

But, it is said, Mexico must sue for peace! Will you persist in this, when she is too proud to sue for peace? You must know that she is anxious for peace. I know that a treaty of peace can be obtained from Mexico. I make that assertion after a perusal of the correspondence between the Mexican Commissioners and Mr. Trist. She offers ample indemnity for every thing but the expenses of the war. She proposes to cede California, from its junction with Oregon to the thirty-seventh degree of latitude.—This comprises nearly two hundred thousand square miles of territory, as I have been told—thrice the territorial extent of Virginia, and larger than all the New England States, New York and Pennsylvania together; and it includes the harbor of San Francisco—the coveted object of our desire, and which, sir, alone, is worth more than the claims of our citizens against Mexico. Well, Mexico gives very sufficient reasons why she should not cede more. She says that Lower California commands her pearl fisheries, and that she cannot be asked to give up what would make her vulnerable in her weakest point. She cannot give up all Upper California, because a portion of it is necessary to maintain the land communication between Lower California and the other portions of her dominions. She cannot give up New Mexico, because the people there are loyal—they are devoted to Mexico. They abhor union with this country. She cannot, therefore, give up New Mexico. It is cruel to insist that she should give it up. I do not want it, and will, by my vote, New Mexico will never be added to this Union—never sir, never.

Besides, it is inconsistent with the essential principle of our government—the consent of the government.

What were the objects of the formation of this Union let me read you, sir, from the constitution:

"We, The people of the United States in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America."

"To establish union"—"to ensure democratic tranquility"—these were amongst the glorious objects for which our constitution was formed. Sir, do you imagine that our union will be promoted—that our domestic tranquility will be ensured by compelling these refractory communities to enter our Union, in spite of all the differences of blood, religion, race, and color and filled with mortal hatred of us as they now are. No man can be so foolish, sir, as to suppose that by such means our union will be promoted. Is such a union possible? It reminds me of the story in "Le Diable Boiteux." You may remember, sir, the story of the two demons, who quarrelled and raised such an uproar in Lucifer's dominions, that he was compelled to interfere. He commanded them under infernal pains, and penalties, to embrace and swear to be friends forever. We did so, said the demon, and have hated each other mortally ever since—such, sir, will be the consequence of that union, which you wish to bring about. Such will be the fraternal union, between the United States and Mexico. I see it predicted, sir, that if we should annex Mexico, she would be to us, what Ireland is to Great Britain; a perpetual source of bloodshed embarrassments, annoyance, endless disquietude. I do trust, that the country will not sanction such an idea—that the Senate will not sanction it—that in the progress of this discussion, all will come to perceive the truth, as I think that I perceive it.

I have said that in my opinion, we can now obtain satisfactory terms from Mexico. I do not mean to say, that the terms offered by the Mexican commissioner, were precisely such as I would accept, but they afford at all events, a proper basis for negotiation.

If we do not stop here, when and where shall we stop? Are we to become the ocean-bound republic, spreading over the whole continent? That is what some gentlemen contemplate. I recollect that rich very ultra gentleman said sometime since, that the day was fast approaching, when "even China would be a component part of the United States? Are our dreams of ambition boundless?" If we go on in this way enlarging our boundaries, must we not eventually be broken into fragments? Must we not come at last to dissolution, like the circle in the water, which by "broad spreading is dispersed to nought?" The bands which unite our country, if stretched so far, must inevitably snap. We must stop now or never. If we persist in this course, we must come to the project of my friend from Indiana, (Mr. HANNEGAN,) and then I take it, the dissolution of the Union would be inevitable. I do not know that in such a case the event would be matter of regret.

Let me trouble you, with a few words more on the subject of the expenses of this war, in connection with the bill more immediately the subject of discussion. I have examined the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury for this year, and I find that the expenses of the current year, taking the quarter which has expired, will amount to seventy-five millions. I confess I was startled when I saw the statement. The Secretary says:

That the total receipts and means for the year ending June, 1848, are estimated at	$42,886,545 80
The expenditures for the first quarter, which are estimated, being	$16,109,191 69
And the estimated expenditures for the rest of the year being as follows:
Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous	8,578,199 12
Army, pay, subsistence, &c.	19,000,000 00
Fortifications, ordnance, arming militia, &c.	2,030,446 50
Indian department	1,250,000 00
Pensions	1,000,221 05
Naval establishment	10,231,062 45
Interest on public debt and treasury notes	2,240,005 61
Treasury notes outstanding and payable when presented	2,257,500 00
The whole expenditures will be	75,695,626 42
Leaving an excess of expenditures over means, 1st July, 1848	32,809,080 42

When the war commenced we had a surplus of twelve millions in the treasury, and Congress adopted new financial measures, which were expected by the Administration to improve the condition of the treasury. But we have spent the twelve millions surplus—all the current revenues which we have received, increased as they are said to have been by the new tariff, besides thirty-eight millions, according to my computatation, of loans and treasury notes. In January last the Secretary came to us for twenty-three millions, which he said would be ample. But in a month he asked for authority to re-issue five millions of treasury notes, and now another loan of eighteen and a half millions is demanded for the service of the present year. I apprehend it will be necessary to raise more than that for the excess of expenditure in the year 1849. This is a woful state of things. I venture to say that if you continue your military operations as they are now conducted, before eighteen months, either your treasury will be bankrupt or you will be obliged to adopt some new and extraordinary financial measures. I, for one, shall be prepared for the crisis.

It is not just, sir, that the coming generation should suffer for the folly of the present. It is not just to keep glory for the present age and taxes for the next. If you will have the glory you ought to have the taxes along with it. I believe the only way to bring the people to a just sense of the enormity of this war, is to let them feel the cost of it. My colleague spoke of the revenue to be derived from Mexico and ventured the opinion that the war could be sustained in this way without the cost of a dollar to our Treasury. But is it to be expected that Mexico in her present depressed condition—kept down by an enemy, holding her powerful towns,—overrunning her country, her industry paralyzed—her trade and business broken up—her people ground to the dust by military oppression will furnish anything like the amount, which he has represented, as accruing to her treasury in time of prosperity? You wont get a dollar which is not forced from her at she point of the bayonet. He speaks of the duty upon contracts and says that they might now be stamped by your authority and that thus a considerable revenue would be obtained. But sir, they will not make these contracts, especially when there is a probability, that if made they will be invalidated, when the present state of things shall terminate. Sir, this is all illusion and if you could get the whole revenue which Mexico raised in a period of peace and prosperity you would get but twenty one millions and your military operations are costing you nearly fifty millions. The Secretary of the Treasury, sanguine as he is, does not estimate these resources half so high as my colleague.

He has not been able, he says to obtain any reliable statement of the amount of duties realized in Mexico on exports. The duties on specie might amount to half a million; The receipts from duties on imports, in a time of peace, have varied from six to twelve millions. What probability is there, that these would be half the first sum, when our armies were covering the whole country?

Even the Secretary thinks that no large portion of the internal revenue could be collected under our military; and he, with all his eagerness to present a favorable view of this project, admits that he has no sufficient data on which to base any reliable estimate as to this source of revenue. So that I caution the country agasnst these delusive conjectures.

As for the 10,000 men proposed by the bill, I will not vote for one of them.

I believe with the Senator from Ky., Mr. CRITTENDEN, that we have troops enough for all the legitimate purposes of this war, and more than enough, and while I would not deny them food and clothing I would not now give for the war another soldier until I saw a disposition on the part of the executive to bring about a peace.

I look at the honor of the country in a different aspect from that in which it seems to be regarded by some Senators, to whom I do not impute any other than patriotic motives. I thing they are entirely mistaken. For myself, I am willing to take the reproach of consistent dullness, by adhering to the doctrines which I have here announced, refusing to vote a man more until I see a better disposition on the part of the Executive to make peace. I believe that the favorable opportunity to make peace was allowed to pass unimproved. I believe that if this government had not demanded too much, they could have made a peace perfectly satisfactory to the country, and that it still may be obtained on just and honorable terms. I will not increase the forces in Mexico for the purpose of overrunning and annexing the country. It would be a lasting reproach to us to do so. I wish to see the United [illegible] ty more glorious even, than all the victories we have gained.

Mr. BADGER rose and signified his intention of addressing the [illegible]

[illegible] nator from North Carolina. I rise to put a question to my friend and colleague, to which I hope he will reply now, if he can; and if not, at some future time, when he shall have reflected on the answer [illegible] proposed.

Mr. PEARCE assented.

Mr. JOHNSON.—If I am right, then, as to the opinions of my [illegible] which would have influenced him in giving that vote, it would have been because of the preamble to that act. The question I now [illegible] that law was [illegible]

[illegible] —[illegible]

Mr. JOHNSON.—Just so.

Mr. [illegible] necessary that some military provision should be made, and the [illegible] Our arms had [illegible] ry. [illegible] Not for an hundred millions would I have sacrificed one of its gallant officers, or one of its brave men! Perhaps I may add, that it is very likely that I would have gone farther then than now, because I had not then so fully investigated the subject. An amendment was proposed in the House of Representatives by Mr. Schenck, which fully met my views. The amendment was as follows:

[illegible] borders, and to prevent any invasion or encroachments upon the territory of

That proposition, sir, would have met my entire approbation; and if that had failed, I should have been unwilling to place myself in the position of denying supplies to our army in peril. I should be disposed to take care of my own household first, and it would be only in the flush of victory that I should feel inclined to spare those with whom we are warring.

Mr. BADGER.—I understand that the honorable Senator from South Carolina, farthest from me, desires to occupy the attention of the Senate when the consideration of this subject shall be next resumed. I shall, therefore, very cheerfully yield to him, hoping however, that I may be allowed to follow him. With that understanding, sir, I would now move an adjournment.

Mr. CASS.—If the Senator will pardon me, I would enquire of the Senator from Maryland, whether I am to understand him as having said, that the expenditures of the present year will be seventy-five millions.

Mr. PEARCE.—I stated that the estimates for the present year, including the actual expenses of the first quarter, would amount to seventy-five millions, but, I have now reason to suppose that I was mistaken. The Senator from Connecticut, (Mr. NILES,) has satisfied me that sixteen millions, the expenses of the first quarter, were carried out under the same title, and, as I supposed they were not, I fell into that error in my calculation.—But I believe that further deficiencies will run the actual expenditures of the year to $70,000,000.

Mr. CASS.—Did the Senator give an estimate of the expenses of the war?

Mr. PEARCE.—I stated the fact, sir, that you had twelve millions in the Treasury at the commencement of the war. There can be no doubt about that. I then said that there was authorized to be borrowed, or issued in Treasury notes—the same as a loan—the sum of thirty eight millions, including the five millions authorized to be re-issued by the act of last session. Will the Senator have the kindness to say whether I am mistaken?

Mr. CASS.—I merely wanted to know what his estimate was.

Mr. PEARCE.—I should be very glad if the Senator would furnish me with means of making a better estimate, if I am wrong.

Mr. CASS.—If the request had been made, I should have complied with it with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. PEARCE.—No doubt. If the gentleman wishes to put me upon a cross-examination——

Mr. CASS.—Oh no, by no means.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I voted in the affirmative on the motion to adjourn to Monday next. At the request of several Senators, who seem to have labored under some misapprehension with regard to it, I now beg to move a reconsideration of that question.

On this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered, and being taken, the result was as follows:

Yeas	[illegible]
Nays	[illegible]
Majority for the motion,	1

The question recurring upon the adoption of the resolution, the yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered.

Mr. CASS.—I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAYTON.—What will be the effect of the adoption of the motion just made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The Senate will stand adjourned until to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland.—Is the motion in order?

Mr. BERRIEN.—The Senate, by a resolution adopted this morning, determined that when it should adjourn, it should adjourn until Monday next. A motion has been made to reconsider that vote, and the motion for reconsideration has been adopted. But the resolution has not been rescinded—the question was about to be put upon that resolution. If we adjourn now, therefore, we shall adjourn over to Monday next.

Mr. CASS.—Then I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. SEVIER.—This is certainly a very clear case. The reconsideration puts the question back to where it was this morning, before any action was had upon it. A motion to adjourn at that period would certainly have been in order, as it now is in order.

Mr. CASS.—I believe I will take the advice of my friend from Arkansas, and adhere to my motion.

The Secretary then proceeded with the call of the yeas and nays, and the result was as follows:

Yeas	[illegible]
Nays	[illegible]
Majority against the motion,	1

The question recurring upon the original motion, it was adopted.

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 17, 1848.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. BRADBURY presented the credentials of the Hon. WYMAN B. S. MOOR, appointed by the Governor of the State of Maine, a Senator of the United States from that State, for the unexpired term of the Hon. JOHN FAIRFIELD, deceased, or until a successor should be chosen by the legislature; which were read.

Mr. MOOR having taken the oath prescribed by law, took his seat in the Senate.

THE PUBLIC BUILDINGS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Commissioner of the public buildings, made agreeably to law, showing the manner in which appropriations for the public buildings and grounds have been applied; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of A. W. and J. H. Foster, editors of the "Pittsburgh Daily Dispatch," praying that the list of letters remaining in the Post Office at Pittsburgh, may, in compliance with law, be published in their newspaper, it having the largest circulation; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the memorial of the Providence Association of Clerks in the city of Washington praying certain amendments to the charter of said association; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, a memorial of the Caln Quarterly Meeting of the religious society of Friends, praying the abolition of slavery in the United States, and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and between the several states; a memorial of the association of Friends for promoting the abolition of slavery and improving the condition of the free people of color, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and Territories of the United States, and of the slave trade between the states; the prohibition of slavery where it does not already exist; and the repeal of all laws providing for the arrest of fugitive slaves; and six petitions of inhabitants of Pennsylvania, praying the adoption of measures for abolishing slavery throughout the Union; the motions to receive were severally laid upon the table.

Mr. HANNEGAN presented the petition of Robert Piatt, only surviving son of Major Daniel Piatt, praying the payment of an undrawn portion of seven years' half pay due him under the resolve of Congress of 24th August 1780; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, the petition of Robert Piatt, praying a final settlement of his account as a deputy purchasing commissary; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ASHLEY presented the petition of James Wilkins, praying payment for cattle taken by Indians in Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TURNEY presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of Tennessee, approving the plan proposed by Asa Whitney, for constructing a Rail Road from Lake Michigan, to the Pacific Ocean, and in favor of a grant of public land for that object; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CORWIN presented the petition of A. G. Melvin and others citizens of the United States, praying that the public domain may be given in suitable quantities to actual settlers without price; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of citizens of Ohio, praying the adoption of measures for the re-establishment of peace between the United States and Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, the petition of citizens of Ohio, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and the slave trade between the States; the motion to receive which was laid upon the table.

Mr. BREESE presented a memorial of citizens of Illinois, praying that the right of pre-emption may be granted to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, to the lands over which it is proposed to construct their road; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, presented the petition of Robert M. Martin, a volunteer in the war with Mexico, praying to be allowed bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented the petition of Mary M. Telfair, heir of Israel Pearce, praying the payment of certain final settlement certificates; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. STURGEON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Titian R. Peale, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. BERRIEN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Moses E. Levy, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the administrator of Isaac Garretson have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. BALDWIN, it was Ordered, That the widow of Samuel Gibbs have leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. MILLER, it was Ordered, That George Townley have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Mr. President, I wish to give notice that I purpose, to-morrow, to introduce a bill "to make attachments, which are made under process, issuing from the Courts of the United States, conform to the laws regulating such attachments in the Courts of the States." If it should be the pleasure of the Senate to give me leave to-morrow, to introduce this bill, I will shortly state the objects of its provisions. The bill which I propose to introduce, passed the Senate without opposition at the last session, having been reported to the Senate by the Committee on the Judiciary, and I shall ask, with the concurrence—which I hope I will receive—of the Chairman of that Committee, and the other members of it, to expedite the bill on its passage through the Senate, without the delay of another reference, as I know no objection to it, and it is a matter of some importance.

MAP OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. CASS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

[illegible] of General Kearney.

REVALUATION IN THE MINT.

Mr. CAMERON submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was ordered to be printed:

[illegible] ment there.

THE MAILS.

Mr. BERRIEN submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

[illegible]

THE PLAYFAIR TITLE.

Mr. DAYTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

[illegible]

REPORTERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. MANGUM, from the Select Committee, to whom was referred a motion authorizing the Vice President to cause desks to be provided for the Reporter of the Senate, and his assistants, upon the floor, in submitting a report, remarked that upon examination of the subject referred to the committee, it was found, that without any inconvenience, suitable accommodation could be afforded [illegible] upon the floors of the Chamber; and as it was of course very desirable that every proper facility should be extended to them, the committee unanimously reported in favor of providing the proposed accommodation.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report, and, on concurrence therewith, it was Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate have two moveable desks provided, as soon as may be, in the angles of the Senate Chamber at the ends of the Chord to accommodate, each, one reporter.

Mr. MANGUM, by direction of the same committee, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

[illegible]

Mr. BREESE.—I had the honor of serving on the special committee, of which the honorable Senator, (Mr. MANGUM,) who has offered the resolution, was the chairman, and I concurred in the report. At the sametime, sir, I must say, that when in committee I was anxious the report should embrace the subject matter of the resolution now offered, as I believed then, as I do now believe, that a much more commodious position for the reporters can be had in the Chamber than they now occupy, but it was thought we had not the power under the resolution to make any suggestion upon the subject. Accordingly, and to get the power, the honorable chairman was instructed by the committee to report the resolution he has reported, and which is now before the Senate for consideration. I hope, sir, it will be adopted, as I feel assured the committee to be raised by it will report a plan which will be acceptable to the Senate, by which the reporters will be better accommodated than they now are, and the ladies also, by properly fitting up the marble gallery now occupied by the reporters.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to. Whereupon

Mr. MANGUM, Mr. SEVIER, Mr. BERRIEN, Mr. BREESE and Mr. ALLEN were appointed the Committee.

MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. BREESE submitted a report made by J. D. Whitney to Charles T. Jackson, geological surveyor of the United States' mineral lands of the northern peninsula of Michigan; which was ordered to be printed and appended to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Nathaniel Kuykendall, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BRITTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to provide for the compensation of Samuel Leach for services in the investigation of suspended sales in the Mineral Point District, Wisconsin, reported it without amendment, and moved that a report accompanying the bill be printed. [illegible]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Abigail Garland, submitted a report accompanied by a bill granting a pension to Abigail Garland, widow of Lynch Garland, deceased.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Brownell, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Amos Holton, submitted an adverse report: and, on concurrence therewith, it was Resolved, That the evidence presented by Amos Holton is insufficient to justify the allowance of his claim; and that the Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

BARQUE CANTON.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they presented to the President of the United States, on the 14th instant, the bill to authorize the issuing of a register to the barque Canton.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

Mr. President: The President of the United States approved and signed, on the 13th instant, the bill to authorize the issuing of a register to the barque Canton

GENERAL SCOTT'S PLANS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted on the 13th instant by Mr. MANGUM:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate all the plans, estimates and calculations, presented by General Scott, as in his opinion best adopted to attain the objects of the war; and his opinion touching the military means necessary to accomplish the objects of our government in any and all the alternative views that have been considered by the Executive or suggested by General Scott, to bring the war with Mexico to a close, if not inconsistent in the opinion of the President with the public service.

Mr. CASS.—I would ask the Senator to consent to the postponement of the consideration of the resolution till to-morrow. The Senator from Arkansas (Mr. SEVIER,) is absent; and there can be no harm from twenty-four hours' delay.

Mr. MANGUM.—I have no objection to postponement, except that the information sought by the resolution is of vast importance to the formation of an intelligent opinion in reference to measures now pending before the Senate; and which, allow me to say, are pushed to a consummation with a degree of zeal and pertinacity which I have rarely witnessed upon any occasion so early in the session. It would give me great pleasure to comply with the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Michigan, were it not that the information which is desired is of the very highest importance at this very moment in order to enable the Senate to act intelligently. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the resolution. I will make no other remark, unless it should be deemed necessary. I hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. CASS.—I do hope the Senator from North Carolina will consent to a postponement of the resolution. If he do not, I must be compelled to vote against it. I cannot conceive that in the present condition of affairs, whilst we are actually engaged in war, that it would be proper to communicate the plans of the Government. It would give the enemy information vastly useful to them in making their preparations. We can easily conceive that such would be the case. It is true that the usual discretionary power is given to the Executive, but I conceive that the objection which I have just stated has sufficient force to make the call improper at this time. The Senator says that the measures before the Senate have been pushed very pertinaciously. I cannot conceive why the Senator has made such an assertion. The bill for raising ten regiments was introduced three weeks since—four weeks since, I believe—and we are now in the second week of its discussion. There has been no disposition in any part of the Senate to force that bill through without discussion. All we have asked is, that it should be considered, discussed, and voted upon. If this be "pertinacity," we are pertinacious. But I do not think that this is pertinacity. I do not say that there is an instantaneous need of this additional force. But I hold, as was better said by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. DAVIS,) than it can be said by me, that that force ought to be raised and sent to Mexico before the sickly season sets in; and that in order to effect that, we should hasten our preparations as much as possible. It will take some time to put the bill through the Senate, and still longer in the House. We may be advanced far in the session, do the best we can, before these bills can be passed and the Government be put in possession of this force. I repeat, then, that I cannot perceive any ground for the charge that the measure has been pertinaciously urged upon the Senate. I renew the suggestion, that the resolution be allowed to lie over till to-morrow.

Mr. MANGUM.—I did not charge pertinacity in reference to this measure, upon any portion of the Senate. I alluded exclusively to the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs; and I submit to the Senate, and to all who have observed the proceedings of the body in reference to this measure, whether the charge has not been sustained by the facts. Sir, when the honorable Senator from South Carolina was about to be denied the benefit of the usual course of the Senate in reference to the consid-cration of his resolutions, I appeal to the recollection of Senators, whether there was not great pertinacity exhibited in the effort to refuse him an opportunity of addressing the Senate? All must remember the events of last Thursday; the repeated calls of the yeas and nays on the question of adjournment, with reference to this very question. All must remember the earnestness with which the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs urged the necessity of early, if not immediate action on the bill before them. However, I leave that, sir, as a small matter; and pass to one of vastly greater importance. I allude to the sentiment enunciated here by the honorable Senator this morning, that it would be eminently improper for the Congress of the United States to be informed of the Executive's designs and the Executive's instructions to the Commander-in-chief of the army in Mexico. I protest, sir, most solemnly, against this attempt to exact that degree of faith from the legislative bodies of this country which shall induce them to rely upon an Executive who discloses only by glimpses, not even by halves, the purposes believed to be entertained by him! I hold, sir, that the great legislative faculty of the country should not be exercised at all upon a question so momentous as this, upon mere faith reposed in the Executive branch of the government, who does not deign to communicate to us more than glimpses of his policy. I regard it as important that I look upon the question now pending as bringing up the great issue between despotism and liberty. I regard the measures here presented to us—only half disclosed to us—as looking to a spirit of universal domination, and an absolute conquest of the whole of Mexico. If the country is ripe for that, in my poor judgment, the country is ready to surrender its free institutions. The policy, as half disclosed, by the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in the extract from a letter which was read here the other day, indicates, in my opinion, designs from which the inference is inevitable, and cannot be resisted, that Executive policy seeks for universal domination in Mexico, and the conquest of the whole country. That, in my humble judgment, raises the question, distinctly and emphatically, between despotism on the one hand, and liberty on the other; and the more so, sir, as the Executive of this country does not deign to communicate to us his views, and, as the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the trusted and able organ of the administration here, tells us to our faces, that it would be improper to communicate to us the designs of the Executive. I oppose, sir, such a course of policy, and I frankly say, that under avowals of this character, anxious as I am to strengthen the arm of the government for all legitimate purposes—an anxiety which has been evinced by all my votes upon this question—I shall feel myself driven to the necessity of refusing supplies, either of men or money, for any increment of the army, so long as this doctrine avowed by the Senator from Michigan shall be maintained.

Sir, my attention is directed to an order to which I have noticed a reference, but now seen for the first time. I will not detain the Senate by reading it. I suppose it is familiar to other Senators. I understand that this order on the part of the general, commanding-in-chief, is to occupy every important position throughout Mexico.

A SENATOR.—Read the first clause.

Mr. MANGUM.—This is marked "order 376," and is as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
"Mexico, December 15, 1847.

"1. This army is about to spread its flag over, and to occupy the republic of Mexico, until the latter shall sue for peace in terms acceptable to the government of the United States."

"The whole of the republic!" Sir, it cannot be disguised. The disguises are too thin. The veil is too transparent. All the disavowals that we have had, that the President does not entertain any purpose of conquest, come at last to this, that the Executive means to illustrate his administration by absorbing the whole of Mexico, if the sense of the country will sustain him. I desire to know, sir, whether the general-in-chief for any legitimate, or proper, or reasonable purpose desires, or has suggested this increase of the army, amounting to thirty regiments, the bills for which are now upon your table? Yet we are not to have this information! It would be eminently improper to disclose the views of the Executive in regard to Mexico! Disclose them to whom, sir? Not to the Mexicans. The general order of the commander-in-chief has already disclosed his purposes, presumed to be the purposes of the government in regard to the future policy, to the Mexicans themselves; but eminently improper to disclose them to the American people, who I trust, are not yet ripe for this scheme of wholesale rapacity and rapine, in which I fear we have already too much indulged. I hope, sir, the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. CASS.—The honorable Senator from North Carolina from a general charge has proceeded to make an individual charge. He charges me with pertinacious obstinacy.

Mr. MANGUM.—I mean it in no improper sense. I imputed to the Senator only a marked degree of zeal and pertinacity.

Mr. CASS.—No one knows better than I do the courteous and honorable bearing of the gentleman from North Carolina. He may like all of us at times, under the influence of party zeal from which none, perhaps, are wholly free, use harsher expressions than need be; but his present charge, as applicable to me in any circumstances, is incorrect, and I mean to prove that it is so to his satisfaction. He instances two facts in support of his allegation: first, that I opposed the discussion of the resolutions of the honorable Senator from South Carolina. Now, I was not opposed to the discussion. I beg the honorable Senator's pardon, but he must allow me to remind him that I was in favor of the discussion. I was anxious to extend to the honorable Senator from South Carolina all the indulgence which he asked. All I insisted on was, that if this most important bill were laid aside for the purpose of taking up a subject which, so far as it related to the measures immediately before us, might be called abstract, as soon as an opportunity had been conceded to him to express his views, the subject should be laid upon the table and the bill be taken up. That was the only objection that I ever made in reference to that matter; and that was precisely the arrangement into which the Senate itself fell. Such, then, was the amount of my pertinacity in that case. As to the adjournment, it has been many times a matter of conscience with me to vote for adjournment under the impression that we did less mischief out of this chamber than in it, but here is a case in which the interests of the country required prompt action, and therefore I opposed the adjournment. We had before us a bill whose importance cannot well be overrated. We had been giving to it one and an half hours discussion daily—six hours a week allotted to one of the most important measures in its consequences, ever presented to the Senate! I objected to adjourn over till Monday, and that is adduced as another proof of my pertinacity! Really, I cannot see it.

Now, with respect to the motion before the Senate, all I ask, is, that this matter should be allowed to lie over till to-morrow, when the honorable gentleman from Arkansas, (Mr. SEVIER,) specially charged with it, shall have collected the necessary information. I do not say, that it will not be proper then to communicate the information, nor have I said that it would be improper to give any of the information which is sought. The gentleman has asked, to whom the information is to be disclosed? Why to the Mexicans. I do not, of course, intend to say, that that is his object; but that will be the effect of the resolution.

Mr. MANGUM.—The Senator misconceives my meaning. The Mexicans have already had intelligence of the designs of the President to the utmost limit; and if the information is withheld, it is because there is an unwillingness, somewhere, that it should be laid before the American people. As to the Mexicans, they have been already advertized of the views of the Executive.

Mr. CASS.—If the Senator only wants that information, the American people have got it as well as the Mexicans. I take it, Mr. President, that in all countries during the prosecution of a war, the specific plan of the campaign should not be made public. Surely, prudence requires that only the general intentions of the Executive government should be made known in such circumstances. But, where in the name of wonder would be the sense in telling Mexico, that the first of June we mean to take Vera Cruz, and Puebla on the 20th—that on such a day, such and such troops or subsistence, or munitions of war, would be despatched to a certain point? It is not the specific, identical plans of campaign made between the commander-in-chief and the government which should be laid before the legislature of the country and the enemy. A thousand reasons will occur to every body, showing that such a proceeding, if not impossible, would be highly injurious. I repeat, there is no wish to refuse any information which may, with propriety and safety, be communicated. My only object is to delay action on this resolution for a short time, until the necessary information can be supplied. All I contend for is, that the broad principle assumed by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, is neither safe in itself nor justified by the practice of any government—to wit: that at all times it is right to call upon the Executive to disclose its specific plans of carrying on a war. The adoption of such a principle, it is obvious, would be attended with the most injurious consequences.

Now with respect to the progress of the war, it is said that General Scott is going on from town to town, and from city to city, conquering all before him. I am very glad to hear it. I hope that the commanding general will continue to go on in this way. If he does so, I have no doubt he will conquer Mexican obstinacy and thus conquer a peace. I have already expressed my opinions with regard to the war in Mexico, and have nothing to say on the subject now, except to tell the Senator from North Carolina, what I had the honor to say to the Senator from South Carolina, that the adoption of any resolutions in this Senate with regard to any danger—if danger there be—in the progress of this war, would be but as the idle wind. You might as well stand by the cataract of Niagara and say to its waters, "flow not," as to the American people, "annex not territory," if they choose to annex it. It is the refusal of the Mexican people to do us justice that prolongs this war. It is that which operates on the public mind and leads the Senator from North Carolina to apprehend a state of things which he fears, but which for myself I do not anticipate. Let me say, Mr. President, that it takes a great deal to kill this country. We have had an alarming crisis almost every year as long as I can recollect. I came on the public stage as a spectator before Mr. Jefferson was elected. That was a crisis. Then came the embargo crisis—the crisis of the non-intercourse—of the war—of the bank—of the tariff—of the removal of the deposites—and a thousand others. But we have outlived them all; and advanced in all the elements of power and prosperity with a rapidity heretofore unknown in the history of nations. If we should swallow Mexico to-morrow I do not believe it would kill us. The Senator from North Carolina and myself may not live to see it, but I am by no means satisfied that the day will not come in which the whole of the vast country around us will form one of the most magnificent empires that the world has yet seen—glorious in its prosperity, and still more glorious in the establishment and perpetuation of the principles of free government and the blessings which they bring with them.

Mr. ALLEN.—I was not aware that this resolution was before the Senate at all; and therefore it will not be supposed, that I intend to address the Senate on its subject matter. It seems to me, Sir, that this government has always proceeded upon the assumption, that in certain cases, it is proper to refrain from giving publicity to some portions of the public business, until the whole can have been consummated. It is upon that ground that these doors are so often closed upon the public. It is upon that ground, that this Senate has seldom refused, almost to entertain resolutions calling for matter touching the foreign relations of the country, before the matter was consummated. For the same reason a part of the appropriations of this government, to the "secret service fund" is placed under the guarantee of the President's honor; and he turns the key and closes the door upon the public, with regard to that secret service money. I speak of these things, sir, as evidence of the fact, that thus far this government has proceeded upon the ground, that some parts of the public business, in some stages of its transaction, ought to be withheld from the general observation of the world. Where the line should be drawn, sir, is a great and a delicate question. How much, if any, of the public business should be so withheld from the notice of the public is a very serious question, and one on which I entertain opinions quite different from those so often expressed by most of the members of this body. The line I think to be this: that whenever the act sought to be made public, barely affects the relations between any branch of the government and its own constituency, it ought to be made public, every part and parcel of it; but when the act sought to be published affects the relations of our government with a foreign government, then the national interests, and the national safety may require, that until all is consummated, none should be made known. Hence the resolution, which I have submitted so often in this body, to open the doors of the Senate, and have no secret sessions as applicable to nominations, contained always the exception as to treaties, and that exception predicated upon the reasons which I have given.

I am not prepared to say whether I shall vote for or against this resolution, because I have read it only this morning, and not ten minutes ago. I desire an opportunity to examine the resolution. I wish to ascertain whether any of the information there called for, would, if disclosed, of whatever character it may be, prejudice the interest of the country. Perhaps, sir, in a time of war, when so large national interests are involved—perhaps, in such circumstances, a great deal more than ordinary care should be taken to see that, in our anxiety to bring every thing before the public, we do not injure it on the public interests. But, as I said, I will not go into this business. I will go as far as the farthest man here, in a general resolution, describing what part of the public business shall be kept secret, and what shall be made public. The sentiments of the Senate in regard to the question, vary with the cases which exist at the moment, as everybody knows; and the same vote which closes the doors to-day, may open them to-morrow. We ought to have a general rule, applicable to all cases. I remember a famous struggle which we had upon this floor, in regard to a resolution which I had the honor to submit, calling for certain military orders issued by President Tyler, the object of which was to transfer a portion of the regular forces of the United States, near to the scene which was going on in one of the States of the Union, involving a question of its constitutional government. Well, upon that subject the Senate would not entertain the proposition. They laid it upon the table and kept it there, in defiance of all the efforts which I could make to get it up. I alledged that if rumor were correct, the President was doing a thing which he had no right to do; and which seriously perilled the public peace, and what was more, the public rights of a portion of the citizens of the country. The Senate, however, thought that it was not proper to call for the documents. I will not say that in that case the Senate was wrong, and that I was right; but I speak of this as one of the historical reminiscences of the past, to which we ought sometimes to refer when we start propositions of this kind; and which may reflect some light upon the case now before us. I pledge myself to vote for the most ultra resolution which any man can conceive, for which he will himself vote, laying down a general rule with regard to the description of public business, to which this Senate has a right, and for which they have a right to call. I say, therefore, to the Senator from North Carolina, let him draw up a general resolution, declaratory of the rights of the Senate upon this subject, and he cannot carry his resolution too far—he cannot throw open the door too widely—he cannot let in too much sunlight—to lose my support; for I have been one entertaining very ultra ideas on this subject of making everything public. But I want time to consider the particular resolution which he has submitted; and, therefore desire that it may be laid on the table until we make a question declaratory of the rights of the body in this respect—a question which shall result in the adoption of a resolution applicable in all time to come, and by which we shall measure all succeeding administrations. I move, sir, the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. MANGUM.—I hope that the honorable Senator will withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. ALLEN.—Certainly.

Mr. MANGUM.—It is impossible, without a violation of propriety and decorum, to allude to what has been done in the Senate when sitting in a different capacity, and I shall not do so.

Mr. ALLEN.—The resolution to which I had reference was submitted in open Senate.

Mr. MANGUM.—I am aware of that, sir. But in answer to what has been said, by the honorable Senator from Michigan on this subject, I have only to remark, that it is perfectly competent for the President, in what I regard a proper deference to the Senate, which is a portion of the Executive, and exercises also, a share of the legislative faculty of this government, to make all communications to us in the strictest confidence. Is it to be maintained here, sir, that we, who must give efficiency, and consummation to all these great measures, acting, not upon Executive, but upon our own respective responsibilities—is it to be contended that we are to be reinsed in secret session, such information as it may be deemed improper to communicate in public? I have inserted in the resolution, in a proper feeling of decorum towards the Executive, the usual clause—"if compatible with the public service." I protest, sir, against the doctrine that the Executive can withhold from us any information which is necessary to intelligent action on our part. What! deny us the means of acting understandingly and intelligently on the measures submitted by the Executive! Sir, an absolute despotism could not ask for more—could not seek for more than that! As regards the views of the honorable Senator from Ohio, it seems to me, that he has considerably modified his opinions on this subject. The distinction now, is that in all matters which touch our internal interests and affect our constituency, the Executive is bound to give us all the information which we may demand; but, that in those cases which affect our foreign relations, and which may very often involve matter of vastly greater delicacy, and perhaps, higher responsibility, the Executive is not to communicate information to us. I confess, I cannot discern the grounds on which such a distinction is drawn. I believe, the injunction of secresy has been removed from the discussion of the Oregon question in private session. It was insisted then, that the discussion should be open; and, if I be right in my recollection, the honorable Senator then entertained a somewhat different opinion from that which he has enunciated here to-day. If, therefore, on a renewal of the motion, this resolution should be laid on the table, I shall regard it as a decisive expression of the judgment of the Senate, that upon a great question involving a vast expenditure of money, deeply affecting the future policy of the government, the principle is asserted, that we are to sit here as puppets of the Executive will, voting for whatever measures may be recommended to us, without the Executive condescending to put us in possession of those facts which we deem essential to the formation of a just estimate of his policy. Sir, I hope that such a judgment will never be affirmed by the Senate.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The hour for taking up the special order has arrived, and, I believe my colleague has the floor. I suggest, that the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina, be passed over till to-morrow.

Mr. MANGUM.—I have no objection to that, sir.

The resolution was then passed over informally till to-morrow.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration, on its third reading, of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. BUTLER.—The bill upon your table, sir, proposes to raise ten additional regiments, or ten thousand men, rank and file, in addition to the regular army now existing, and under the control of this government. This bill has been reported by the Military Committee in conformity with the recommendation of the President; and we are also informed that it will be followed by another bill, giving to the Executive, authority, whenever he may think proper to exercise it, to call out twenty thousand volunteers. These are the measures which will form the subject of our authoritative action at this time. By the existing laws, the President of the United States has the basis of an army of sixty thousand men.—There are thirty regiments of regulars, I believe, and about the same number of volunteers, which have been authorized to be called into service during this war. I cannot be precise, however, as to the number of men who have been actually in service, but it is certain, that if all the regiments of regulars were filled up, there would be about twenty-eight thousand, six hundred, or very nearly thirty thousand men; and I understand there are about thirty thousand volunteers. It is true that, of this number we have not now in the field, or under the actual command of officers, more than forty-five thousand, but it is sufficient to say, that the President of the United States, as Commander-in-Chief of the army of this nation, has the power to call out at this time—if we put the means in his power to pay them—sixty thousand armed men. He now asks that we should add to this number ten regiments, to be raised by enlistments; and, I suppose, by another bill, twenty thousand volunteers to be placed at his disposal, making in all ninety thousand men. These, together with the seamen and marines, which are also a portion of the army, would make, if they were called into actual service, one hundred thousand men.

History generally takes notice of the more prominent points in the progress and policy of nations, and it must certainly be remarked in after times, that the largest army ever raised to be concentrated upon one single object, by the republic of the United States of America, was an army for the invasion of her nearest neighbor, and the only other republic on the North American continent. Posterity, sir, will have a right to inquire, why it was that the councils of the United States had thought proper to exert the highest attribute which, perhaps, can be exerted, for carrying on a war of this description. We are indeed told by the President—or those who speak for him on this floor—that although this number of men may be at his disposal—although he may call them out under the authority of existing laws—yet he is not likely to have over one-third of that number actually in service.

Sir, this leads me to another question which I am bound to notice in passing—why is it that the Executive, as we are informed, cannot raise the number of troops, which, by law he has authority to raise, for carrying on this war in the heart of Mexico? Why is it? Does it arise from popular aversion against entering into such a service as this? If it were a war for the defence of our own soil, do you believe, that five times that number could not be called into requisition? Sir, at the voice of the Executive of the United States, ten times that number would spring up—ready to defend the national honor and the soil of this republic. And, I must here make another remark: if all parties in the United States were to concur in the justice and propriety of carrying on this war, I would answer for it, that the President could not say, that it was out of his power to raise the number of troops which the laws of the country authorize him to raise. But, sir, the very fact, that he is unable to raise these troops by the means which have been put in his power, is, I think, one of the omens which a wise ruler should regard in administering the trust—the sacred trust—that is committed to him.

Before, Sir, I proceed further to discuss this bill, I must be permitted to advert to some of the tendencies of this war? And in doing so, I beg leave to address myself particularly to the propositions for amendment, which I have had the honor to submit. I do not propose by the amendment on your table, to withhold from the President the troops, or such number of troops as may be required—but I propose to raise them in a different manner. And I know that I am likely to incur the censure of those who sustain the measures of the Executive, and perhaps, I shall encounter the criticisms of those, who, speaking ex cathedra, may find fault with the measure which I have suggested. Sir, I have not brought forward my proposition, without consulting those who are better acquainted with the subject, than I am myself, nor have I brought it forward for the purpose of thwarting the measures of the President. But, sir, this a conjuncture of affairs, which calls upon every man, who feels an interest in the welfare of the republic—to express himself freely, fearlessly, and openly, upon all matters that come before us. This is not the time, that I have found it necessary to differ with the President, as regards some of the measures which he has advised, for carrying on this war; and I am happy that I did contribute at the last session, to upset some of those measures, which, in my opinion, would have been inconsistent with the public interests. I have introduced this amendment for no such purpose. But I think that this is a conjuncture of affairs, in which every man should make his views clearly understood. It is a time when every one should pause and look around; for I solemnly believe, that every step we are taking, we are going deeper and deeper into the labyrinth of a dangerous and inextricable policy—from which we may find no clue, for an honorable and safe retreat.

There are those who look on the fair side of things always, and if the President had recommended that we should put at his disposal two hundred thousand men, I believe there are men on this floor, and in the other branch of Congress, who would have voted for it, if on no other ground than that it came from the Executive, who is responsible for this war. I believe they would have voted for any number of men which the President might have called for, and for all the schemes—the magnificent and splendid schemes to be carried into operation by the Executive—that would require an army of two hundred thousand men. Yes, sir, if we are to go on with this enterprise of conquering and subjugating the republic of Mexico—either with a view of absorbing the whole of that republic, and making it a part of this confederacy, or of making her a dependent province—it would not be an extravagant proposition for the President to ask for two hundred thousand men to enable him to do it with security and safety. There are those, sir, who looking at objects in the distant horizon, sometimes neglect to look at the clouds which hang above our heads, and which are ready to burst upon us. And that is the case with some gentlemen on this occasion who, while they are indulging themselves in splendid visions of revolutionizing Mexico, and making her a part of this republic, or making her in some degree dependent on us—are neglecting to look at the dangers which surround our own institutions. I therefore have introduced this amendment, in some measure, that I might have an opportunity of examining more particularly into the tendency of the measures that are hereafter to be proposed. My amendment—for I mean to address myself more particularly in the first instance to that—goes only so far as to add to the different regiments of the army—the riflemen, the infantry, the artillery, and the dragoons—although by some unguarded omission the dragoons seem to have been left out;—to add, I say, to each of these regiments, three hundred men. By adding thirty men to each one of the companies, it will give a regiment on paper of thirteen hundred men; and for this increase I only propose to add two subordinate officers—and in some cases none at all—provided, however, there be five officers to each company; and in this way I shall raise seventy-five hundred;—not so many to be sure as the President has asked for and the Committee recommended. But I can raise in this way seven thousand five hundred men without the necessity for more than a very few additional officers. I have this recommendation in favor of my system—that it will certainly be the most efficient mode of raising additional troops for active service. I think this position cannot very well be controverted—that new troops, infused and mingled with disciplined soldiers, are more readily assimilated and rendered efficient; and all military men will tell you so. They will be better officered, too, having those officers who are experienced. I know there are those who entertain the belief that officers can be selected from civil life, equal in every respect, for such a war as this, to trained and educated officers already in the army. I believe, Mr. President, there never was a greater heresy; but if the truth were known, and the testimony of officers of the army obtained, we should be entirely satisfied that those battles which have so signally illustrated the American character in this war, from the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma to those of Contreras and Churubusco, were to be attributed to the skill and ability which were displayed by the officers of our army who were educated at West Point. I know there have been splendid achievements performed by the volunteer corps; but the truth is, that both the soldiers and officers of the volunteer corps relied with an abiding confidence in all operations of the army upon the science and skill of those who directed the operations.

Well, sir, in raising a force of this kind you put them under just such men, not officers from civil life, but those already trained and accustomed to the service. The soldier himself will be better trained, and he will be better taken care of; he will have the greater security; it will be a measure recommended by considerations of humanity. I think this proposition cannot be disputed, that it will be a more efficient corps, and that the transition to efficient soldiers will be more easy and expeditious.

My next proposition is, that it will be cheaper. We have a right to look at the ten regiment bill which passed Congress at the last session, with a view to ascertain the true character of this bill.—And what was the character of that bill? I do not mean to say that the President intends to ask for two Major Generals, four Brigadier Generals and the full complement of other officers; but whether that be the case or not, it is very certain that under the bill before you, there must be ten entire regiments raised, and for the purpose of officering these regiments, you must have ten Colonels, ten Lieutenant Colonels, twenty Majors, one hundred Captains, and three hundred Lieutenants. Now, in point of cost, there is very great difference between the two—the one has the recommendation of being cheaper, and when raised are more efficient; there cannot be a difference of opinion on these two propositions. But the objection to the plan I have suggested is, that the President cannot raise the number of troops, that he desires, in the mode which I have suggested; in other words, that it becomes necessary when the President wishes to raise a body of troops, to appoint intelligent officers in the first place, otherwise he cannot get them. That is the argument. I have heard it said, if you adopt this plan the men cannot be raised, because the officers under whom they are to serve are already appointed. It does seem to me, sir, however, that the men can be readily raised. I can see no reason why they cannot. I do not see why men will not enlist, without having the excitement of a political movement every time we call for additional troops. If this be the case, it is high time that we should examine into the true merits of this war, especially in regard to the character of the troops to be employed in it. However, sir, I have submitted the amendment for what it is worth. If the troops should be raised under it, they will stand thus: General Scott now has at his command about thirty-one thousand in the aggregate, about two thousand of whom are in garrison at Tampico and Vera Cruz. The remainder are now under his immediate command in and near the city of Mexico. I understand from military men who are recently from there, that he has a moveable column of twenty thousand to carry on offensive operations. I do not pretend of my own knowledge to say what the number of his available force is, but if seven thousand be added to those which it is said are now under his control he will at least have twenty-seven thousand—and there are to be recruited under the existing laws to fill the old regiments, six or seven thousand more: add these and he will have at least thirty-four or five thousand; a number sufficient not only for garrison duty but for active operations at any point to which they may be directed. Why, sir, Bonaparte had not more when he made his first campaign in Italy than thirty-five or forty thousand men. And what is it that these troops are to be required to do? Not to fight battles. We are told they are not to fight battles. What are they to do? They are to overrun the Mexican States, to disarm the population, to confiscate the public property, to sequester the revenues, and to become the armed jailors to those persons who will not take their parole. The soldiers we are to raise now, are not soldiers who are to be animated by the love of glory and the spirit of military adventure—their office is neither more nor less than to be armed tax-gatherers and jailors. They are to sweep through the country for the purpose of gathering treasures, and keeping in awe a feeble and distracted population. But, sir, the experiment has not been made; and though General Scott has recommended an addition, which will make the number of troops amount to fifty thousand, I am satisfied that the Executive will carry on his operations whether that number be added or not. I, for one, will be perfectly willing to accelerate as far as I may be able all operations that may be necessary to bring the war to a successful issue. But it does seem to me, that if we grant seven thousand regulars —to be added to the army, in the manner I propose, which is as much as has ever been employed under any general of this country in the service—it will be sufficient for any purpose that can be desired in order to bring this war to a close; and I trust in God it is the last war of invasion in which we shall ever be engaged. But while I have thus intimated my purpose to concur to some extent in raising the number of men which the President may require for his immediate purposes, I cannot shut my eyes to the tendency of the measures which are likely to be adopted as the permanent policy of this government. The President has told you in his message, that it is not his design to carry on this war for the subjugation of all Mexico, or the destruction of her nationality. But I have seen enough, sir, to satisfy me that the current of consequences is carrying the measures recommended even by the Executive himself far beyond his control.

Since the discussion of this subject commenced, within the last fortnight, there have been certain demonstrations of public opinion not to be mistaken. I have heard it openly avowed that this war is not to be carried on merely for the purpose of making peace with Mexico under a satisfactory treaty; but that it is to be prosecuted with the more obnoxious design of conquering Mexico and bringing her into subjection, either as an independent province, or to be annexed as a part of our territorial government. Sir, it is not to be disguised. When my colleague first intimated that such would be the tendency of the measures recommended by the President, the friends of the President on this floor—and I have no doubt they spoke by authority—repudiated the idea and said that nothing was further from the intention of the President than such a design. I cannot impute to the Chief Magistrate any design under the cover of any ambiguous terms. He has said—and I believe he was honest when he said it—that it was not his purpose to subjugate Mexico and destroy her nationality. But if the President should be unable to control the tendency of his own measures, what difference will it make to the people whether the result arises from design, from ignorance, or from his inability to control the tendency of the measure which he himself proposes? The effect will be the same. Are we any nearer peace now than we were at the commencement of the campaign, which has fulfilled the most sanguine expectations of all those who were interested in the accomplishment of the designs of the Executive? I can never forget the time when that campaign was under discussion in private circles—the deep anxiety that I felt on the subject—(I mean the campaign which may be denominated the Vera Cruz expedition.) There were men who foreboded the greatest evils—men who looked at it with a distrustful eye—who denounced it as rash and unmilitary, and one likely to result in disastrous consequences. Gentlemen will recollect the deep anxiety which was felt by all who had friends or relatives in that expedition, at the time of the landing of General Scott at Vera Cruz. And when it was ascertained that they had landed in safety upon that soil which was destined to cover the bones of so many of our gallant soldiers, the common feeling throughout the United States, was a feeling of joy at the prospect of approaching peace. Peace was then confidently calculated upon, but no peace came. General Scott was then in the most difficult of all situations. He had not only to fight his way against an enemy, and a formidable enemy, but he had to fight for the escape of his army from the effects of the climate, to save his men from certain destruction; for if he had not been able to pass the heights of Cerro Gordo, the climate would have destroyed more than would have fallen by the sword of the Mexicans. And with what number of men was it that General Scott landed? Not over thirteen thousand; and with not over eight thousand he passed the heights of Cerro Gordo. He was obliged to use the utmost expedition or risk the consequences to be apprehended from the diseases of the country. He was reduced to the necessity of risking the issue of an unequal contest in passing that which was regarded as the most impregnable of any position which had been erected by the Mexican government. If the incidents and events attending these battles had been written by Levy or Plutarch the reader would have felt his cheeks glow in reading them. They have given us names which are destined to go down to posterity, at whose mention the American heart will exult. There are many who did not feel the excitement incident to that first, and, perhaps, I may say, important victory, which was gained during this eventful campaign. If not the most important, it must undoubtedly be regarded as the most splendid achievement of the campaign. I shall not undertake to describe the achievements before the walls of Mexico; it has been better done by the honorable Senator from New York. But these battles did not bring peace. The army is in Mexico—is there any peace? Have we not the right to ask the question, what have been the important results proceeding from those splendid and magnificent victories? Their soil has been enriched by the blood of those who have sacrificed their lives to maintain what they regarded to be the honor of their country. But, Mr. President, while we can take pride in the heroism of our countrymen, and rejoice with those who survive, —and every one can profit by the history which will be written of the dead—we must recollect that that history is written upon tombstones—that it will be found in the neglected graves of our soldiers, whose bones and blood are now enriching a foreign soil—in the tears of widows, in cries of orphans, and in statutory provisions for your maimed soldiers. These are the only fruits, as far as we have seen, of those splendid achievements. Have you a right to expect any other? Is there any prospect that there will be any other? I hope there may be other results.

The President has told us that the only mode by which he can obtain a peace is, by the entire subjugation of the people of Mexico, so as to reduce them to an unconditional submission. That is the only alternative left. But there are other and more prominent reasons why we have no peace, and one is from our own divisions.—This war has encountered a most formidable opposition at home; and all Europe is against us. Where in all history have you found such opposition as there is to this war at this very time? I do not know what party ought to be responsible. The majority of the popular branch, I understand to be against it, and we have only to look at this Senate to see the formidable array of those who countenance that opposition. A wise magistrate should take council from the signs of the times. Lord North pushed the current of his measures so far that he could not control them, because he would not take counsel of those eminent statesmen of their time, Fox, Pitt and Burke. I have no right to allude to names, but let the Executive understand this much, that some of the highest names of this country are now giving him counsel—not directly, but in the form of expressed opinions—to which, if he is wise, he should give something like the attentive consideration that is due to so formidable and imposing an exhibition of public sentiment.

I cannot concur myself (and I have said so on another occasion) in the mode in which those who are opposed to the war propose to terminate it. In my opinion it would have been best for us to concur in the most effectual measures for bringing it to a close, and it is possible that if we had all concurred in passing measures for bringing this war to a close, by this time Mexico would have found it hopeless to hold out any longer; but she has taken hope from the opposition to the war which has existed among ourselves, but that is not, in my opinion, the most prominent source—certainly it is not the only source—of her inducement to protract this war. I think Mexico has a right to complain of the enforcing terms which we have been demanding of her as the price of peace. Why, sir, when the ten regiment bill was under discussion at the last session, I recollect the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, acting no doubt, as the organ of the administration, advertised the whole country—before, sir, the territory was reduced to subjection by our arms; and before we had any right of conquest over it—that the least that would be demanded of Mexico in any negotiation for peace would be New Mexico and all of California.

Mr. CALHOUN (in his seat.)—Upper California.

Mr. BUTLER.—All of California, Upper and Lower. And, sir, I thought at that time that it was one of those declarations that was very well calculated to offend the pride and arouse the jealousy of any nation. No nation on earth, that had a spark of national pride, could submit to be told in advance that she was to be despoiled of nearly one-third of her territorial dominions, and that before we had obtained anything by right of conquest. But, sir, this is not all. The President of the United States has gone further, and told us in his late annual message that only New Mexico and Upper and Lower California had been conquered; but that he would not, under any circumstances, sign a treaty ceding them or any part of them to Mexico again. He has gone further, Mr. President, and what struck me as somewhat remarkable at the time, he has assumed that they are our territorial dominions now, and that the government of the United States has a right to appropriate them by extending their civil jurisdiction over them. This is nothing more nor less than assuming that we have a good title to these territories by conquest. It does seem to me, as it seemed then—and upon perusal of books upon the subject, I am still more satisfied—that it is entirely against all the weight of authority in the laws of nations. There is no such thing as one nation flagrante bello acquiring title to the territory of another, until there shall have been a treaty of peace made, or an abandonment of right on the part of the conquered nation—or unless such circumstances exist as to induce the other nation to recognize the right thus claimed. I know no instance in modern times, of title to any territory being consummated and perfected by the law of the strongest—although, during war, it is one of the modes of annoying an enemy to take possession of the territory of that enemy, if it can be seized upon by either of the belligerents.

War does not consist merely in fighting. War has other modes in which it may be conducted; and one of the modes in which it ought to be conducted is, to seize the property of your enemy, for the purpose of depriving him of the means which he otherwise would have of sustaining himself, or the contest. This, sir, is one mode of carrying on a war—and so I say as we hold possession of this territory, we are but carrying on the war legitimately. It is not war to fight, because there is nobody to fight. But if the United States advertise Mexico that, under no circumstances, can these territories, or any part of them, be ceded or given back to her, under a treaty of peace, why talk about negociation? Why speak of making a peace under the form of a treaty? Why resort to such a miserable mockery? Why seek to disguise your course under such miserable pretences. Negotiation for what? You will say "Mexico, you must negotiate, but if you do it is with this distinct understanding—that we are to hold all we have, and compel you to give up as much more as we can." Why if she were as strong as you, she would never submit to that, because it would be degradation; and because she is a weak nation, is it any reason that a neighbor should presume upon her defenceless condition, and extort terms from her, which would be unworthy in her to grant in any negiation with an equal? What right has the republic of the United States to graduate the scale of nations, in point of dignity and influence? If we were to consult what should be the proper example, under the influence of christian civilization it would be, sir, as far as possible, to raise the dignity of the only other republic on this continent, and hold it as equal with the proudest despotism or monarchy on earth. This would be right, sir. The laws of nations are made up of precedents like this.

We should set an unworthy example, were we to act otherwise in reference to a weak power that is prostrate at our feet. It would be abhorrent, sir, to my notions of justice. I know there are those who insist that that there is no wisdom in magnanimity.—Before God, I believe there is more wisdom in the impulses of a warm heart, than in the devices of a crafty head, and especially if it is crafty head looking forward to gratify certain designs of ambition.

I know, sir, very well that all I shall say on this subject may have very little influence, but I intend to require the friends of the President to vindicate the proposition, that before we have acquired a title according to the laws of nations by a treaty of peace, we should assume to be the owners of the land; that we have the right to extend over it our own laws and invite our citizens to settle upon it. What advice such law-course is? It has been said, sir, that a victorious country is rarely deaf to the suggestions of ambition and avarice, and I am afraid we will find in ourselves an exemplification of the remark. No, sir, as a matter of policy we should not insist on it. We have no right to insist upon it, if we intend to have negotiations upon anything like principles of equality and justice. But as I have thus far disapproved of the mode heretofore pursued, with a view to obtain, what all speak of as desirable, what all are anxious to obtain, an honorable and speedy peace, I may be asked what course would you suggest? Perhaps, sir, my opinion will have very little influence, but as I have taken the liberty to indulge somewhat in censures upon the measures of others, I ought not to withhold my own opinions as to what would be the proper measures to be adopted.

But before I do so, I am compelled cursorily to look back to those measures which preceded the admission of Texas into this Union, and to the situation of Texas before that Union was consummated, and to examine upon what title she held the land which she claimed to possess, whether by title acquired by her at the time of the revolution; or whether by title acquired by conquest subsequently. For a title acquired by a revolution; and a title acquired by subsequent conquest are very different things. They are essentially different. Texas, as I understand, when she raised the standard of resistance to what she regarded as tyrannical acts on the part of the Mexican government, comprehended not only the limits of Texas proper, but also the district of Coahuila; thus including territory lying on both sides of the river. She had no right, at this time, to any part of the territory comprised within the limits of Tamaulipas; and if she acquired any right to this territory, lying between the Neuces and the Rio Grande, it is not, sir, and I undertake to say so, as a lawyer, by any right incident to her in consequence of her revolution. I will point out to you as far as I can, the extent of her title under the revolution.

As I understand, sir, sometime in 1835 General Cos passed through Tamaulipas. Leaving a garrison at Goliad, he pushed forward and took up his quarters at San Antonio. Thence he sent a detachment of soldiers to take possession of some cannon at a village in the neighborhood. Well, the first symptom of the revolution was the rising of the people of this little village to prevent their cannon from being taken. They were not content to limit their exertions simply to prevent the taking of their cannon, but they raised an army and drove back General Cos and reduced him to the necessity of entering into stipulations that he would never take up arms against Texas again. Well, this was the commencement of the revolution. In 1836 Santa Anna brought his army to the Rio Grande, which he crossed, and re-took all these posts again, marking his course in blood and ashes as he passed along; and not in the ashes of inanimate substances only, but in the ashes of the soldiers. He drove them before him. He passed the Brazos and was going on, when, at San Jacinto he was met and overthrown by the Texan army. There he was taken prisoner. The revolution of Texas was thus consummated, as far as it could be consummated, by the capture of this prisoner and the reduction of Filisola to their terms, which were the restoration of all prisoners and property in his possession. Santa Anna entered into a treaty, not only to give up all prisoners and property, but all that territory lying between the Nueces and the Rio Grande. Now, I am not one of those who maintain that this treaty gives a title. I am very far from meaning any such thing; but I resort to it for another purpose. The revolution having been conducted under the organized government of Texas proper—gives, it seems to me, the right to all the land on this side of the Nueces. But, as regards Tamaulipas, that was a distinct and separate State. What right had Texas to this? If she acquired any right it must have been by conquest. Now, what was the nature of the possession by which she could establish her right of conquest? Why, these are the circumstances that are relied on, that some of the inhabitants who had taken refuge under the flag of General Rusk, returned and settled there by his permission. At the same time, the Texas flag was hoisted at Corpus Christi? So that possession of the west bank of the Nueces was kept, until, on another military demonstration on the part of Mexico, the inhabitants again applied for protection and he ordered them to retire beyond the river; they did so, and after the danger was over returned to their possessions. These are the evidences of possession, and they are the evidences of the possession of only a part of this territory, a possession, which, in the language of lawyers, might have given a color of title to her by constructive possession of the whole. And such, I think, would have been the legal inference, if Mexico had not had a previous and older title of possession to a part of the territory lying along the Rio Grande. But the fact is so. She had houses there; the citizens recognized the laws of the Mexican government, and debts were collected under these laws.

Such was the situation of affairs when annexation took place. Mexico had possession of a part, and Texas of a part lying on the banks of the respective rivers leaving the intervening space divided by a shadowy line which could not very well be distinguished. Under these circumstances the annexation took place, and General Taylor was ordered with his army to Corpus Christi, on the right bank of the Nueces, and in a part of the disputed territory. Now, was there a perfect title in legal contemplation in the republic of the United States? I have no doubt, sir, Texas had as good a right as Mexico; there was concurrent possession. This was exactly the position in which neither had exclusive right to the whole. There was no exclusive right in either, so far as regards a definite certain title. Under these circumstances General Taylor was ordered down to Corpus Christi, with a view to occupy the territory of Texas to protect it from the invasion of Mexico. Now comes the most difficult and debatable point at issue, upon which it seems to me the merits of this war must ultimately turn. General Taylor was there, and by direction of the government, and he had a right to remain there until he received further orders from home. An Envoy Plenipotentiary, Mr. Slidell, was sent to Mexico with a view to negotiate, if he could, and settle the boundary. We all know the result of this negotiation. Herrera, who was then in power, was perfectly willing to receive him, as he said, as Commissioner to settle the boundary; but he could not receive him as Plenipotentiary. It might have been an idle objection, but our government insisted that the cup of reconciliation was exhausted and that he should be received in the character in which he was sent to Mexico. After Mr. Slidell was recalled, or after he took his passports, it must be recollected the march of General Taylor to the Rio Grande took place.

Now, sir, I am going to excuse the President for acting on the advice and suggestions of Gen. Taylor, in any thing that he did by his orders for moving the army from one place to another. The General was placed in a situation to get information, and was bound to communicate it, with his opinion, to the President as commander-in-chief, upon whom had devolved the highly responsible office of fulfilling the directions of the Legislature. It was Gen. Taylor's duty to take a proper position for the occupation of Texas, and to go to any point that he might be directed. Under his first orders, the General might have gone, as he seemed to think it was his duty to have done in the first instance, to the banks of the Rio Grande. He forebore doing so, for the want of certain military appliances, and contented himself by sitting down at Corpus Christi. Here he continued, in some measure, abiding the result of negotiations. His decided opinion always had been that the Rio Grande presented the best position for military reconnoissance and operations. He gave this opinion to the President, evidently under the belief that he might in certain contingencies have to resort to force to defend the occupation of Texan territory. After having given this advice, in another letter he said that, if the disputes of the two Governments could be settled by negotiations, the army might well remain where it was, at Corpus Christi. With these instructive suggestions before him, the President had a right to act as he thought proper. His duty was to hold the occupation of the country by the army. He had a large and perhaps dangerous discretion. So long as Mexico refrained from taking possession of the disputed territory lying beyond the Nueces with an armed force, or forebore to make any obvious demonstration of a design to use force—military force—the President was bound to do the same. He had his hand on the spring of a terrible engine, and was bound, under the highest obligations, to touch it with the skill and precision of a master. It is easy to cry havoc and let slip the dogs of war, but it is hard to call them from their dreadful revelry. The question is pregnant with an important issue, For what purpose did the President order the army from the Nueces to the Rio Grande? It was done after the withdrawal of Mr. Slidell, and after it had been said that the cup of reconciliation was exhausted. Was it done in the view of having the controversy brought to a close by an appeal to the sword? If so, he acted with a criminal indifference to consequences, and in disregard of his constitutional duty, having neither the power to make war nor wilfully to place the country in such cir-circumstances as would lead to it. In a juncture so full of danger he should have appealed to Congress. There, then, is one view of the subject in which I would hold the conduct of the Chief Magistrate entirely justifiable. If he were satisfied, from Gen. Taylor's communications, that Mexico was making open demonstrations of a design to make a lodgment of her army on this territory in dispute, he should have prevented it by a similar movement. In such a juncture he had to use the vigilance and information of his military officer. Had General Taylor then reasonable grounds for apprehension, that the Mexican forces were moving to this point? If so, he was perfectly right in anticipating them in the contest for the possession. The issue of this controversy depends on this statement of the case. Whilst the President has no right to make war, he may rightfully use the army to repel the hostile invasion of conceded or disputed territory; but not to bring on circumstances that would lead to such a result.

Mr. DAVIS of Mississippi.—If the Senator will permit me, I would suggest that Gen. Taylor, in marching to the Rio Grande, met the Mexican army about half way—on the banks of the Little Colorado—and was informed by the Commander of the Mexican forces, that if he crossed that stream, it would be held an act of war.

Mr. BUTLER.—I understand all that.

Mr. DAVIS.—The Mexican army moved first.

Mr. BUTLER.—I do not recollect dates; but I understand the order to General Taylor was issued before the Mexican army advanced.

Mr. DAVIS.—I do not know at what time the Mexican army proceeded to this point, but we do know that General Taylor found them in position, and they must, therefore, have moved first. That is a fair inference.

Mr. SEVIER. The order was given to General Taylor in January; in February it was received by him, and in March he was in motion.

Mr. BUTLER.—I shall concur with the Senator readily in this point of view, for I regard both as having possession. I think that General Taylor was right to advise the Government to anticipate the Mexican army. I have always been under the impression, however, that the order to move was issued long before. However, sir, I do not think it makes a great deal of difference as far as regards the situation of affairs now. All concur in desiring to bring this war to a close by as honorable a peace as can be very well effected. And how is it to be done?

Now, sir, having come to the conclusion that we are bound to maintain the rights of Texas to the territory between the Nueces and the Rio Grande—and I certainly think we are bound by the most solemn of pledges—for we have an act of this very body reciting that American blood had been shed on American soil—there it stands on your Statute Book the most solemn of all declarations, that this territory did belong to Texas, and to this country by annexation—and though it was a subject of honest dispute between Texas and Mexico, and between the United States and Mexico—yet we have passed judgment upon it and said to Texas it was a part of her territory—and in consequence of that pledge, it seems to me we never can yield one foot of land this side of the Rio Grande. But, sir, that is as far as I will go as an ultimatum of any proposition of peace to that government. I would insist, in the first instance, in every measure, that to the Rio Grande we are bound under the most solemn of pledges to protect the rights of Texas. But then the question may be asked—and it is a proper question—how would you establish any other line for separating the territories of the United States from those of Mexico? Will you fall back upon any line which separates Oregon from Mexico? I think not, sir. But by way of making it as acceptable as possible to Mexico, and with a sincere desire to terminate this war, I would not hesitate, if it were to be done tomorrow, to send the most illustrious embassy to Mexico and propose to her terms of peace, upon this ultimatum, with the right, however, to demand from her to say what line she should run by way of compensating us for the claims we have against her, and I should think it no degradation. If it were a strong government, and we were actually engaged in a contest to be decided by force of arms, it might be otherwise. But Mexico, prostrate and feeble as she is, it is no degradation to make any terms by which we can terminate this unhappy, this disastrous war.

I know the suggestions which I make are not likely to be adopted, but I think that what I have already intimated as the limit is one from which we cannot depart. We are bound to say to Mexico, we cannot give you any land on this side of the Rio Grande, but we will leave you to say what line you will agree to run from the Rio Grande to the Pacific. I would give her the option in the first instance to say what line she would agree to, though I do not say I would be bound by it; but I say I would not hesitate to give her the right to indicate the line she would adopt. Perhaps she might adopt the thirty-seventh degree, and I might be asked the question, would you be satisfied with that line?

I have no hesitation at all in stating, that it is our interest to encourage and countenance Mexico as an independent republic, and let whatever line may be agreed on, be it thirty-seven or thirty-eight, all the territory we want, or all it is said we want, will fall into our possession inevitably. There is no way of preventing the American people from settling in the territory now claimed, and which, it seems to be presumed by the President, is to fall into our possession. But I may be asked, if Mexico propose a line, would you adopt it? If there is any one thing which the policy of this government dictates more than another, it is to terminate this war. And, sir, we cannot, at this conjuncture, make too great sacrifices to terminate the war. I speak now as a Southern man, and if I were only to have in view what must ultimately be the interests of the Southern States, I would enter most fully into the mad schemes of taking possession of the whole of Mexico; because in that way slave labor might be employed, whilst I have no idea that any slaveholder will ever go into that country north of thirty-two degrees. But as I have said, that if Mexico would propose terms, I would consult the councils of moderation and justice, and endeavor to sustain rather than annihilate a neighboring republic.

But I may be told that they are not capable of self-government. I believe they will have to go through the changes to which other nations are subject. They will, perhaps, have to endure an irksome fermentation before they arrive at that degree of refinement and intelligence which will fit them for a republican form of government. But as I have said, if Mexico were wise she would give all we claim. I believe it would be to her interest to give up all territory between the Rio Grande and the Sierra-Madre.—But I have no hope that she will be governed by any such policy. I am, however, for peace, and for the purpose of securing it I am willing to make any sacrifice except of the power and dignity of the country. And I believe it will be a sacrifice of neither to offer in the most conciliatory manner—such terms of negotiation as that republic might be induced to accept. Well, I may be told that she will reject your terms—that she will not only cling to the Nueces, but that she will give you no line this side of the boundary between Mexico and Oregon. Well, sir, if she acts thus, what then can we do?

Suppose that Mexico rejects all overtures, liberally made to terminate this war, what are we to do? Prosecute this war, devastate the country, sequester the revenues, disarm the population, reduce them to such a state that they can make no resistance, but must appeal to us, and ask to be annexed to our confederacy? Is this desirable, sir, as a matter of policy? It is desirable that we should reduce her to such a condition, that we cannot refuse to receive her into the Union? Now, sir, this it seems to me must be the legitimate consequence of pushing these aggressive and invasive operations further. Suppose you take the whole of her territory, or suppose you have the whole under your control, how much do you contemplate permanently retaining? Will you take more than New Mexico, and the two Californias by way of indemnity—for the just claims which you have against that government? I ask how much will you take? I again repeat the question, let the President make his own indication to-morrow? What prevents them from doing it now, at this very moment, instead of overrunning the whole country, and after examining all the expense attending further invasive operations—being compelled to content themselves with what they have at present? What prevents the President from taking by his army now as much as he wants? You can do nothing more by carrying on the war than you have already done. I understand the Senator from Mississippi has said, that it is nothing more than an experiment, and after you have made that experiment, and Mexico will not come to terms, you can only then take a defensive line.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—My position was, that holding the interior of Mexico would conduce to peace—that when deprived of all hope of further resistance, which could result only from the presence of a powerful and well organized army, she must then give indications of a disposition to treat, stronger than she has heretofore given. They have heretofore—and I say it without unkindness to any one—continually looked to divisions at home as likely to produce a recall of the army; and they can be cured of that heresy, only by the presence of an army sufficiently powerful to show the concentrated will of this nation. That was the policy which I recommended. Further than that, I believe that it would be proper to take a line along the mountain ridge, which could be easily held; and that if our jurisdiction were extended over it, the country behind that line would immediately become quiet—not a line territorial in its nature, beyond which we could not conduct our operations, but from which we could effectually make sorties; and not restricting us at all from holding other posts in the interior of Mexico. I will say in this connexion, that my remarks the other day in relation to the dangers which might threaten the army were not made in reference to General Scott's column, which is, I believe, 20,000 strong, and no more, though it is constantly represented as otherwise. That is not the column which is placed in danger. It is the column of General Wool, numbering 6,000 men, and holding a series of posts with a long line of communication; and threatened, as I have been recently informed—with an army of 15,000, and the militia numbering, as has been stated, 15,000, and having immediately in its flank a valley which could turn out 30,000 men. That little army, I thought, was in danger, and I think it may yet be in danger. Then, again, there is a smaller force in New Mexico, and a still smaller one in California. These are the positions which I wished to reinforce; and hence the necessity of adding new regiments, instead of strengthening old ones—not of sending men to General Scott, but of strengthening other columns, as well as to hold new posts, and to relieve garrisons. But I will not longer trespass on the time of the Senator, and beg his pardon for this interruption.

Mr. BUTLER.—I understand the Senator from Mississippi to say, that after we have overrun Mexico, if she will not sign a treaty of peace—he then proposes to take a line, to leave the better place to fight from. After he has whipped her, then, he would take a line to fight from. Now the Senator seems to anticipate, that peace can be brought about by taking an advantageous position, from which to attack the enemy, and thus carry on the war. The Senator's calculations are certainly different from mine. If we overrun all Mexico, and then obtain peace, it is only such a peace as a conquering nation may dictate to a people, that have passed under the yoke. And if this do not make peace, he must then take a line, not to hold the territory comprised within it, but as one of the modes of making more effective sorties upon a prostate people.

Mr. DAVIS.—It is a part of the same plan and I would adopt it now.

Mr. BUTLER.—I have said, and I would say again, I would much rather take no territory at all, than consent to carry out the magnificent schemes entertained by some gentlemen on this floor. Why infuse the lifeless blood of a ruined republic, into the healthy veins of this confederacy? Are you not taunting your own, by attempting to communicate life to them? Or, if you do no more you can reduce them to a province, and this seems to be the project of the Senator from Indiana. When you have it as a province, how will you govern it? By your armies, by Prætors, Consuls, or what kind of magistracy? Who will be responsible for such an office?

Mr. FOOTE.—If the Senator will allow me, I would remark that in the proposition of the Senator from Indiana, as I understood the word "province" was stricken out.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Certainly, sir.

Mr. BUTLER.—Well, sir, all seem to anticipate, that ultimately we should be driven to the alternative, of either taking Mexico as a province or of annexing her to this republic.—That must be the case. Why what does the President say? You must either use your army to overcome and subjugate Mexico, or for the purpose of giving support to one of the factions there which is in favor of peace—that is to say, the United States must keep an army there until one of the factions is strong enough to form such a government as to enable them to go through the forms of negotiation. I have never heard, sir, nor read in any history, of any people who permitted a foreign army to give protection to any party, into which the country was divided that had survived the protection itself. Why, any people that will call upon an army for protection is incapable of self-government and unworthy of protection. I know that Philip of Macedon, under pious pretexts—ambitious princes make great professions of piety—contrived to have himself invited to take a part in the sacred war, for the purpose of giving protection to the weak against the profane and stronger party, and we all know the result. It was the protection of the wolf to the meek lamb. There never was a wiser remark, and one that should be more practically alluded to, than that made by the prophet Ezekiel to the council of Israel—where a proposition was discussed—whether that harassed people should place themselves under the protection of Egypt as their safest reliance against the power of Assyria. If you do, you will rest on, not a weak, but a broken reed, that will cut the hand that rests upon it. If we make a colony of Mexico, and our army be withdrawn, how long will she remain in that condition? Such a government could not stand without the perpetual guarantee of a standing army; and to undertake to sustain a portion, or a faction, with a view that they might sign a league treaty of peace—it does seem to me, sir, that it is one of those calculations that will aggravate the evil instead of relieving it. I protest against the use of the army for any such purpose; and, as far as my vote goes, it shall never be given for it. No, sir, let us make a treaty of peace as soon as we can before the current of consequences carry us too far. I do not even hope that any suggestion of mine can lead to such a result. I believe, that these mad schemes, in spite of every warning voice, are destined to go on, and that we shall find ourselves, when they are accomplished, in a worse condition than any in which this republic has ever been placed. I will but ask, if such be your opinion, why give the President any troops at all? Or, if it be your design to enable him to overcome all Mexico, give him a sufficient number to accomplish the purpose. But the house has been, that this government has undertaken to accomplish, with twelve or fifteen thousand troops, what they should have taken thirty thousand to accomplish. I think the expedition to Vera Cruz to invade Mexico with twelve or fifteen thousand men was an inexcusable liberty which the government took with human life. It was realizing what had been said before, that in the calculations of American human life is the least of all its elements. Yes, sir, the government has gone on and made liberal drafts upon the patriotism and gallantry of its citizens, and it is for this reason, it for no other, that I would be in favor of adding more men. But I have other reasons. There is a portion of the volunteers now in the field that ought to be recalled and others enlisted in their place. Some of them were enlisted to serve for one year. The government taking advantage of the circumstance of their being already in Mexico, induced them to enter the service for the war. And such has been the fate of the South Carolina regiment. They had offered their services for a year. Their pride, the regard which they entertained for the honor of their State and their obligations to the Constitution of the United States induced them to volunteer, and they have been drawn on in the expectation that this war would soon close to continue in the service. I am willing, if for no other reason than to relieve these volunteers, to send other troops into the field with a view to procure their recall. But the main reason upon which I will give my vote, if I vote for this bill at all, is on the ground that I want the experiment made as soon as possible, the sooner the better for the safety of the government. I know that all my suggestions of moderation will have very little weight; but if we are to go on with the war, let it be in such a manner as will lead to its most speedy termination.

This being the first war of invasion, it is full of startling suggestions, and should be regarded as full of admonitory instruction. The Constitution presupposes that all the supplies for carrying on the war should be exclusively under the control of Congress. Yet we are told that in part, and with fallacious calculations, a large part of the revenue to support this war is to be found in the contributions to be raised from the enemy's country. By a tariff, sometimes legislative in appearance, and by military coercion, the Mexican revenues are to be directed into the treasury-chest of the army. How much will be collected in this manner, is entirely a matter of uncertain conjecture. By way of encouragement as to the means of carrying on the war, this source of supply is prominently paraded—rather to hide the public debt, which must be enormous, than for anything else. But suppose it could be demonstrated that the army had a self-supplying revenue—what a commentary would it be on the futility of the supposed controlling power of Congress over the military responsibility of the Executive as the Comander-in-chief of the armies of the Republic. It would place him in the condition of Charles the 1st, who contended for the right of carrying on war by the arbitrary collection of ship money, without the advice or control of Parliament. A general with the ambition of Cæsar, placed in such a situation, could, at the head of a strong army, put his government at defiance. We may not see such results in our term—but the example of to-day is the precedent of to-morrow. And when the fires of virtuous patriotism that were kindled on the altar of our country by the founders of the republic shall have burnt down under the ambitious lust of conquest, there will be no relenting influence left to purify and restrain lawless ambition.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after a short time so occupied, the doors were opened.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 18, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. NILES presented the petition of William B. Stokes, surviving partner of John N. C. Stockton and company, praying compensation for services in carrying the mail; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DIX presented the petition of settlers and occupants of lands in the Tonawanda Reservation, praying to be confirmed in their titles to said lands; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DIX presented the petition of Edward Mills, praying to be restored to the rights and benefits of a contract entered into by him with the Postmaster General for conveying the mail between the Ports of New York and Bremen, which contract has been transferred to the Ocean Steam Navigation Company without his assent; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. YULEE presented a memorial of Professors of Mathematics in the Navy, praying an increase of their pay; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HANNEGAN presented the petition of David Wilkinson, praying compensation for the benefits which the government has derived from his inventions for which he has received no pecuniary return; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. PHELPS, it was Ordered, That Pamela Allen have leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. BALDWIN, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of John Stanert; and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

TREASURY STATISTICS.

Mr. YULEE submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate the following statements:

1. A statement of the amount of all revenues received through each custom house, and the moneys expended at each to defray the expenses of collection, from the earliest practical period to June 30th, 1847; classifying the receipts and expenditures under different headers [illegible] the books of the Department will permit.

2. A statement of the quantity of land sold, the amount received therefor, how paid, and the expenses of collection, in each land district, from the earliest practical period to the 30th June, 1847; dividing the expenditures under the usual different heads.

3. A statement of the whole amount of revenue received into the Treasury, each year, from the earliest practical date to June 30, 1847; giving the source from whence the same was derived.

4. A statement of the expenditures of the government, from the earliest practical time to June 30, 1847; separating the same under different heads of expenditure, as far as can be done from the records.

5. A statement of the importations and exportations of domestic and foreign goods in American and foreign vessels, to and from each country, from the earliest period practicable to June 30, 1847.

6. A statement of the tonnage of each district and State, and of the classes of vessels, from the earliest period practicable to June 30, 1847.

7. A statement of the American tonnage engaged in foreign trade, and in the coasting trade and fisheries, and coopers employed, and of foreign tonnage entered and cleared, and the number of the crews, from each port and State, from the earliest period practicable to June 30, 1847.

8. A statement of the amount of monies received on account of the marine hospitals in each district and State, and the expenditures of the several places from the same [illegible] and from [illegible] each year, from the earliest period practicable to the 30th June 1847.

Resolved, further, That the Secretary of the Senate cause the said statements to be printed and bound in separate volumes, under the direction of the Register of the Treasury, and that [illegible] copies be printed and bound, and placed in the [illegible] of Congress for the use of the members of both Houses, and the Committees thereof.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS.

Mr. BAGBY submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

1. Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States was a compact between certain [illegible] and sovereign States, and that [illegible] specified powers which each granted to the common benefit of all the parties to said compact.

2. Resolved, That for powers not thus delegated, the parties to said compact reserved to the [illegible] each, any department thereof, a claim with the States respectively, or to the people.

3. Resolved, That the government of the United States possesses no powers except such as are expressly granted to it by the constitution, or such as are necessary and proper to carry the granted powers into effect.

4. Resolved, That the power to construct roads, cut canals, make harbors, or improve the navigation of rivers in any one or more of the States or territories of the Union, is not among the powers expressly granted to the general government, by the Constitution; nor, is the exercise of such a power necessary and proper, to carry any of the granted powers into effect.

5. Resolved, That the power to build piers and docks, erect buoys and lighthouses, and improve the harbors on the lakes, if it exists at all, is not derived from the power to regulate commerce, but from the power to provide and maintain a navy.

6. Resolved, That the government of the United States does not possess the power to create, originate, ordain, establish or carry on commerce between or among the States of the Union, but only to regulate such commerce as the States, or the people thereof may create, originate, ordain, establish and carry on between or among themselves.

7. Resolved, That any attempt by the general government, under any pretext whatsoever, to construct roads, cut canals, or improve the navigation of any river within the limits of any one or more of the States of the Union, or within any territory, is a palpable violation of the Constitution; and if it be within the limits of a State or States is a direct and dangerous encroachment on the rights and sovereignty thereof.

Upon presenting the resolutions

Mr. BAGBY said: That nothing was further from his intention than to consume any portion of the time of the Senate at present in discussing the resolutions he had the honor to submit, or any other proposition not intended to be followed up by some act of practical legislation. He had an aversion to abstractions, generally. He could not be mistaken, however in supposing that these resolutions related to and embraced subjects of vast and momentous importance to the people of the United States, and he should, as soon as the measures for the continued vigorous prosecution of the war were disposed of, ask the deliberate action of the Senate upon them. At present he moved that they lie upon the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MEXICAN TERRITORY.

Mr. BALDWIN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate any information he may possess in regard to the extent and value of the public domain (if any) belonging to the Republic of Mexico, and also in regard to the power of that Republic, under the fundamental laws thereof, to cede to any foreign government, whether monarchical or republican, the sovereignty and dominion over any of the members of that confederacy, or the people thereof.

ATTACHMENTS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. WEBSTER asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to make attachments, which are made under process issuing from the Courts of the United States, conform to the laws regulating such attachments in the Courts of the States; which was read a first time.

Mr. WEBSTER.—As I stated yesterday, this Bill was before the Senate last year and passed without objection. I will state its object, sir, very shortly; and if no Senator should object to it now, I hope it will go through the forms of legislation without being again referred to the Committee; and I wish particularly to draw the attention of the gentleman who is at the head of the Committee on the Judiciary. There are, in the Courts of the New England States, processes called attachments which are levied upon the property of the defendant in the suit. Various laws, at different times, have been passed by the States to palliate what seems to be the severity and injustice of the old long-continued modes of practice. By a law passed in 1794, process in the Courts of the United States was made dependent upon processes in State courts, as they then stood. In the course of legislation it has been found quite necessary for the purposes of justice to alter and modify these processes. But the law of Congress does not follow these modifications, and my object now is to render the proceedings upon process issued out of the Courts of the United States, conformable to the practice of the State Courts in the same States. The object is so plain that, without detaining the Senate further unless some gentleman wishes further explanation, I should be glad if the Bill would be permitted to be read a third time and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY.—I would ask if this is the same Bill that was before the Senate last year?

Mr. WEBSTER.—Exactly the same, word for word.

Mr. ASHLEY.—This Bill received the unanimous concurrence of the Committee on the Judiciary, from which it was reported without an amendment. The Committee, however, is now somewhat differently constituted from what it was then.

The said bill was then read a second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed, and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

PROVIDENT ASSOCIATION OF CLERKS.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a memorial of the Provident Association of Clerks, reported a bill amendatory of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Provident Association of Clerks in the Civil Department of the government of the United States, in the District of Columbia," approved 3d March, 1825; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth Jones, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Elizabeth Jones, and the other children (if any) of John Carr.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Thompson Hutchinson, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Hugh Munro McLean, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

GENERAL SCOTT'S PLANS, ETC.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. MANGUM, on the 13th instant.

Mr. MANGUM modified the resolution, so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate confidentially, or otherwise, all the plans, estimates, and calculations, presented by General Scott, as in his opinion best adapted to attain the objects of the war; and his opinion touching the military means necessary to accomplish the objects of our government in any and all the alternative views that have been considered by the Executive or suggested by General Scott, to bring the war with Mexico to a close.

Mr. MANGUM said: The resolution as at first introduced contained the usual clause, "if it be not incompatible with the public interests," because it is regarded as due to official decorum, when a matter is to be laid before the Senate in open session. The resolution as now modified leaves it to the discretion of the President to lay the information before the Senate, either confidentially or otherwise. It becomes necessary, therefore, to strike out the latter part of the resolution as it originally stood, because I do not recognize any right in the President to withhold from this body any information that may be necessary to bring them to a correct determination. I think, sir, that under our system we are entitled to all the information which pertains to the official discharge of our duties.

Mr. SEVIER.—It is not my purpose to discuss this resolution, but I must be allowed to say, that calling upon the President for the plan of a campaign recommended by the commanding General, seems to me to be wholly without example. And, I believe, sir, that the view which I entertain in relation to it, is also entertained by many gentlemen here.

Mr. SEVIER moved to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. MANGUM demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Allen, Ashley, Atherton, Bagby, Bradbury, Bright, Butler, Cameron, Cass, Davis, (of Miss.) Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Hannegan, Hunter, Lewis, Moor, Sevier, Sturgeon, Turney, and Yulee.—23.

NAYS.—Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Calhoun, Clarke, Dayton, Greene, Johnson, (of La.) Mangum, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Webster.—19.

So it was Ordered, That the resolution lie on the table.

MAP OF NEW MEXICO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CASS, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of War, furnish the Senate with the report and map of the examination of New Mexico, made by Lieut. J. W. Abert, corps of Topographical Engineers, while attached to the command of General Kearney.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Finance, on the memorial of Henry Simpson, administrator of George Simpson, deceased; and on motion by Mr. PHELPS, it was laid upon the table.

The following bills were severally read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole:

A bill for the relief of Milledge Galphin, executor of the last will and testament of George Galphin, deceased.

A bill for the relief of Thomas Talbot and others.

No amendment having been made, they were severally reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That they be severally engrossed, and read a third time.

The said bills were read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That they pass, and that their respective titles be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. BADGER said: If I believed, sir, that the duty which I owe to the country and to the State which has sent me here, could be performed by yielding to the requisitions of the Executive of the country such supplies as he may deem requisite for the prosecution of the war, upon plans for prosecuting it which have not been made known to Congress—if I believed that I had not a high, and controlling obligation to exercise my own best judgment for the benefit of those whom I represent, and for the general welfare of the country, upon every question submitted to the consideration of this body, I might be disposed to vote for the bill upon your table. If, sir, the yeas and nays had not been ordered upon the passage of this bill, I might have been content to permit the measure to pass, as far as I am concerned, without offering a single word to the Senate upon its intrinsic merits. But the yeas and nays have been ordered upon this bill. I cannot vote for it. I shall record my vote against it; and, I think it is due to the country—I feel that it is due to myself—that the views and principles which will govern my conduct in giving this vote should be plainly and distinctly stated, and should accompany, to the public, the vote itself. I shall endeavor to assign those views and principles in as short a compass as is consistent with a full exposition of what I believe to be the truth on this all important subject, and which every consideration obliges me to put before those whom I represent, without any unnecessary diminution, without leaving out any thing that may be required in a full and complete expression of the argument which, in my mind, is conclusive in regard to the measure before you. I shall offer my own opinions, sir, with entire respect, and even deferential consideration, to the great minds of this body and throughout the country, whom I know to be arrayed against me. Without intending towards them any disrespect, I shall take the liberty to declare what are the opinions which I entertain with regard to the origin of the war, the manner of its prosecution, the tendency of the measures now proposed, and the schemes that are evidently entertained by the Executive of the country in relation to it. I shall not go as far back, sir, as an honorable Senator from Maryland did a few days ago, (I mean the honorable Senator from that State who first addressed the Senate upon this bill,) but, nevertheless, I shall be under the necessity of going a little back for the purpose of making myself fully understood.

First, then, I will lay it down, and endeavor to demonstrate, that the war in which we are now engaged with Mexico, was the immediate result of the unlawful and unconstitutional act of the President of the United States. I suppose, sir, that there is no gentleman on this floor or elsewhere, who supposes or believes that the President of the United States is vested with the war power of this country. It is a power expressly, and in terms, conferred upon the Congress of the United States. And the President would have no control over it, direct or indirect, except from the incidental circumstance of his limited veto on the action of the two Houses, and except, from the fact, that in virtue of his office he is the chief commander, the principal military officer of the United States.

I maintain then, Mr. President, that when the President of the United States moved the troops under General Taylor to the Rio Grande and took possession of the left bank of that stream, he committed a clear and undoubted act of war. What is war?—What do all the writers on the law of nations tell us it is? They all, in substance, define it to be a contest about rights which is carried on or maintained, not by argument, but by force. It can, therefore, admit of no question, that when a nation claiming certain rights, which are disputed by another, undertakes to support those rights by force, she undertakes to support them by war—war as far as she is concerned. It is true, if the act of violence or aggression on her part, be not resisted by the nation that suffers it—if it be patiently and tamely submitted to—no war results. To constitute war, it is essential that there should be two parties, as it is, that there should be two parties to a treaty of peace. The act of one nation cannot alone constitute war; it is like the case of an individual striking a blow: if it be not resented, no contest, no battle, no fight is the result. The blow is an act of aggression, it is an act commencing a contest, but it does not amount to a perfect contest. Whether this act on the part of the President was an act of war, of hostility, of aggression, depends not at all upon the question, whether we had a right to the territory of which he took forcible possession. War, between nations, pre-supposes a contest about rights. The publicists, who speak of contests between nations, never suppose them to contend except about rights. War is a contest about rights. Public war is a contest between nations about rights, carried on by force and not by argument. If, therefore, it were assumed as clear and unquestionable that the title of Texas and the United States extended to the Rio Grande, it is still beyond all doubt, that Mexico possessing the left bank of that stream, having settlements there, having officers there, and exercising jurisdiction there—any movement to dispossess Mexico, to occupy what she thus occupied and what she claimed to be her own, is an act of war. It is an act of war just and rightful if the territory be ours—just and rightful if the territory be unjustly and improperly withheld—just and rightful, if, also, the act of war be directed by those who represent the sovereignty of the nation. Well, sir, this act was directed by the President of the United States. He ordered the troops to the Rio Grande. They advanced. When they came into the Mexican settlement, the inhabitants fled before them in dismay; the officers abandoned the public buildings and set fire to them, and under such circumstances, our forces under the command of officers of the United States, took from Mexico that which she was in possession of, and by force kept possession of the territory and placed it under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Now, sir, on this subject I had the honor at the last session to bring to the attention of the Senate, the action of Mr. Jefferson, during his administration of this government, under circumstances of a very similar character, with this difference, that the title of the territory withheld from us was truly and clearly ours. In every other respect the case was like this. The territory was withheld by another power, and a disposition manifested by that power to deprive us of what we held. Under these circumstances, Mr. Jefferson conceived that he had no right to use the military force of the country to obtain possession of that which was withheld from us, though clearly ours. And he states as the reason for referring the subject to the determination of Congress, that matters relating to peace and war belong exclusively to that body, and not to him; and as this movement might change the relation of the two countries from peace to war, therefore, it belonged Congress to determine whether the movement should be made.

But Mr. President, I have other authority. I certainly shall not say that it is more respectable in itself, than the authority of Mr. Jefferson. I doubt very much whether with a large portion of the American people, and of the Senate it will be thought quite equal to Mr. Jefferson's. But upon this question, with respect to the President of the United States, the authority is conclusive and overpowering. It creates upon him, what lawyers call an estoppel, for I am able to show that the President of the United States has himself recognized that such an act as this is an act of hostility—of aggression—of war. On the 11th of July 1845, the Secretary of the Navy writes a confidential communication to Commodore Conner, then commanding in the Gulf of Mexico.—He says:

"The unanimous vote of the Texas Congress for annexation leaves no doubt of the consummation of that measure. When you receive this letter, the Texan convention, which is assembled on the 4th, has doubtless acted on, and will have said Texas is a part of our territory—to be defended like any other part of it.

"At the same time, every honorable effort is to be made to preserve peace with Mexico. The protection of our boundary, the northern, has been ordered, and the will of the people of Texas, duly notified to the principals of Mexico, which renders American occupation of Texas, and a conflict between the two nations, beyond peace, of probable occurrence, and it cannot be too much impressed upon the President's mind that he can not, should be controlled without the diffusion of blood, and without the exercise of force; believing that the Mexicans, in their own right will desist and that can be done."

I read this part of the communication, for the purpose of shewing though this paper was written on the 11th of July—prior to the actual consummation of the act of annexation—yet the instructions to which I propose now more particularly to call the attention of the Senate, are given prospectively—cautiously—and with a view to the actual completion of that measure, when, as appears from the instructions themselves, the officer to whom they were directed was required to consider Texas as a part of this country. The letter proceeds:

"To secure this end most effectually, you are charged to commit no act of aggression; and to the same end you are directed to consult with the commander of the nearest military force of the United States, on the subject of co-operation."

Then after enumerating the force at the officer's command, the Secretary says:

"That you may promptly meet any emergency, you are authorized to call to your aid the forces of the United States in Texas, or any part of them, as you may deem necessary. You are aware that the precise boundary of Texas has not been settled. It is claimed by Texas to the Rio Grande, and by Mexico to the Nueces. Should Mexico declare war, you will of course consider it your duty to repel invasion, and to conquer a peace. You will, however, not anticipate this result, but will be governed by circumstances as they may arise. If Mexico should not declare war, but should assemble a large force on the Rio Grande, marching upon Texas, or should attack our squadron, or any portion of our naval force in the Gulf, you will employ it in defending our own forces, and protecting the rights of Texas. In the event of the Del Norte's possession of Tampico, and the consequent seizure of San Juan d'Ulloa, you will proceed to blockade, or, if possible, take, if war ensues, but every effort will be made to secure peace by adopting the most prompt and energetic measures."*

Again: The Secretary of War writes General Taylor under date of July 8, 1845.

"The occupation of a second base [besides Corpus Christi], commensurate with the end in view, the defence of the Rio Grande, which are, and for some time have been, in the actual occupancy of her troops. In carrying out the instructions heretofore received, you will be careful to avoid any acts of aggression unless an actual state of war should exist. The Mexican forces at the posts in their possession, and which have been so, will not be disturbed, unless an hostile act should be committed by the United States and Mexico on that day."

Here we have from the representatives of the President in the two Departments, War and Navy, a clear and distinct recognition of this proposition, that, although the President held our true boundary to be the Del Norte, yet it would be "AN ACT OF AGGRESSION," "A HOSTILE ACT," an act which would not be justifiable except IN A STATE OF WAR, to dispossess Mexico from any portion of that territory of which she held possession at the time of the annexation. When, therefore, orders were issued to General Taylor, on the 13th of January, '46, to advance and occupy a position on the left bank of the Rio Grande, admitted to be in the possession of Mexico, the President ordered what he then, undoubtedly, understood to be an act of war. He ordered what he intended, and what he supposed would be regarded on the part of Mexico, as an act of hostility—of aggression. For, sir, you will observe, that when General Taylor, in the execution of this order, advanced to the Rio Grande, and drove the Mexicans from their possessions—when he occupied what had before been occupied by the Mexicans—and these facts were reported to the President, there was not the slightest intimation on his part that General Taylor had exceeded the scope of the orders which had been given to him, and had thus been the means of precipitating the country into war, which, by a prudent forbearance, might have been avoided. On the contrary, up to this very moment, all that was done in pursuance of that order, has been recognized by the President as having been rightfully done, as having been done in accordance with the purposes which the Executive had in view when the orders were given.

But, sir, if the act was not an act of war, it was plainly and manifestly an act which was likely to produce a state of war. It was an act the tendency of which was to change the relations of Mexico and this country from a state of peace to a state of war. Can there be any doubt of this, sir? It is impossible to doubt it, when we recollect the unhappy and angry state of feeling which existed between the two countries. When we recollect the position which our army held at Corpus Christi for so many months, and the disputes existing between the two countries—the mutual charges of insincerity, and breaches of faith—when we recollect all this, it must be manifest that such an act as moving an armed force to the Rio Grande was, in itself, if not an act of war, at least one which wore the appearance of aggression, and one which was calculated to rouse the feelings of the Mexicans, and to provoke retaliation. Thus much must be conceded; and, if so, sir, whence did the President of the United States derive his power to do this without the consent of Congress.

According to Mr. Jefferson, an act which in its execution may change the relations of the country from peace to war, is an act beyond the competency of the Executive, and to be passed upon only by Congress. The Constitution has undergone no change, the people have made no amendment to it—it stands now as it stood in the time of Mr. Jefferson. Whence, then, has Mr. Polk derived his authority to precipitate measures which must lead directly to war—Congress being in session—without taking their advice or even deigning to inform them of what he proposed to do? But, sir, at all events, there is not the slightest reason to doubt, as I apprehend, that the movement of the troops upon the Rio Grande was the act which produced war. There had been, previously, threatenings on the part of Mexico. There had been mostly that state of feeling which was likely to result in war. But there had been no war, and my conviction is clear that if our troops had remained quiet at Corpus Christi, where they had a right to remain, on the ground so strongly put by the Senator from Maryland, (Mr. PEARCE,) that it belonged to Texas by virtue of her revolution, and was then in her possession, there would have been no war. But at all events, supposing that war would have been produced in some other manner, or by some other movement, though our troops had remained, which is mere matter of speculation, yet it cannot be denied, that in point of fact, this war—the war in which we are now engaged—was the immediate result of the movement of our troops upon the Del Norte, and nothing else. That movement was an act of war—it was, at all events, an act directly tending to change the relations of the two countries from peace to war; and, therefore, an act which the President could not lawfully or constitutionally perform.

The next proposition which I lay down is, that this war, thus resulting from an act of the President, has been prosecuted by him from the commencement with a view to the conquest—the permanent conquest—of at least New Mexico and Upper and Lower California. I beg the attention of the Senate while I attempt to demonstrate this proposition from public documents.—First, sir, I will call the attention of the Senate to the instructions given by the Secretary of War on the 3d of June, '46, to General Kearney:

* Doc. H. R. 29 Cong. 2d Sess.

"Should you conquer and take possession of New Mexico and Upper California, or any considerable places in either, you will establish temporary civil governments therein—abolishing all arbitrary restrictions that may exist, so far as may be done with safety. In performing this duty, it would be wise and prudent to continue in force such part of the existing officers as are known to be friendly to the United States, and will subscribe to the oath required to be taken. The abolition of the custom-houses and of ex-orbitant duties, and the substitution of moderate duties on imports, will necessarily follow. You may assure the people of those provinces that it is the wish and design of the United States to provide for them a free government, with the least possible delay, similar to that which exists in our Territories. They will then be called on to exercise the rights of freemen in electing their own representatives to the territorial legislature. It is foreseen that what relates to the civil government will be a difficult and delicate part of your duties, and much must necessarily be left to your own discretion."*

In further proof of this, I read the instructions given by the Navy Department to Commodore Sloat, 12th July, 1846 :

"The object of the United States is, under its rights as a belligerent nation, to possess itself entirely of Upper California.

"The object of the United States has reference to ultimate peace with Mexico; and if, at that peace, the basis of the uti possidetis shall be established, the government expects, through your force, to be found in actual possession of Upper California.

"This will bring with it the necessity of a civil administration. Such a government should be established under your protection; and, in selecting persons to hold office, due respect should be had to the wishes of the people of California, as well as to the actual possession of residents in the place. It may be necessary to require such oath of allegiance to the United States from persons as you may deem necessary. You will also insure the people of California of the protection of the United States.

"After you shall have secured Upper California, if your force is sufficient, you will take possession, and keep the harbors on the Gulf of California as far down, at least, as Guaymas. But this is not to interfere with the permanent occupation of Upper California."†

Then, sir, on the 13th of August, we have instructions from the Navy Department to Commodore Stockton, or the commanding officer, in the Pacific :

"You will take immediate possession of Upper California, especially of the three ports of San Francisco, Monterey, and San Diego, so that it the treaty of peace should be made on the basis of the uti possidetis, it may FULLY BELONG TO THE UNITED STATES.

"Having provided for the full possession of Upper California, the next point of importance is the Gulf of California. From the best information I can form, you should take possession of the port of Guaymas. The progress of our arms will probably be such that, in conjunction with land forces, you will be able to hold possession of Guaymas, and so to OBTAIN POSSESSION OF THE COUNTRY SOUTH AS FAR AS THE GULF."‡

Now, sir, in order to understand the scope and bearing of these orders still more clearly, let us see what was done under them by the officers to whom they were addressed. In a letter of General Kearney to the Adjutant General of the 24th August, 1846, written from Santa Fe, he says :

"On the 22d I received information [concerning the advance of New Mexico, and that the Americans were to be driven out before I arrived. I, of course, advanced, and took it without our protection."§

In another part of the same letter, he says :

"On my return (which will be in two or three weeks) a civil government shall be organized, and the officers appointed for it; after which, I will be ready to start for Upper California, which I hope may be by the latter end of next month: and in such case, I shall expect to have possession of that department by the close of November.

Then we have General Kearney's proclamation, in which he announces his intention to hold New Mexico as a part of the United States, under the name of the "territory of New Mexico."

"A, by the act of the republic of Mexico, a state of war exists between that government and the United States; and as the undersigned, at the head of his troops, on the 18th instant, took possession of Santa Fe, the capital of the department of New Mexico, he now announces his intention to hold the department, with its original boundaries, on both sides of the Del Norte, AS A PART OF THE UNITED STATES, and under the name of "THE TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO."

* * * * * * *

"The undersigned has instructions from his government to respect the religious institutions of New Mexico—to protect the property of the church—to cause the worship of those belonging to it to be undisturbed, and their religious rights in the amplest manner to be preserved to them; also to protect the persons and property of all quiet and peaceable inhabitants within its boundaries against their enemies the Entawa, the Navajoes, and others; and when he assures all that it will be done, as well as his duty, to comply with those instructions, he calls upon them to exert themselves in preserving order, in promoting concord, and in maintaining the authority and efficacy of the laws.

"And he requires of those who have left their homes and taken up arms against the troops of the United States to return forthwith to them, or else they will be considered as enemies and traitors, subjecting their persons to punishment, and their property to seizure and confiscation for the benefit of the public treasury.

"It is the wish and intention of the United States to provide for New Mexico a free government, with the least possible delay, similar to those in the United States; and the people of New Mexico will then be called on to exercise the rights of freemen in electing their own representatives to the territorial legislature. But, until this can be done, the laws hitherto in existence will be continued until changed or modified by competent authority; and those persons holding office will continue in the same for the present, provided they will consider themselves good citizens and are willing to take the oath of allegiance to the United States.

"The United States hereby absolves all persons residing within the boundaries of New Mexico from any further allegiance to the republic of Mexico, and hereby claims them as citizens of the United States. Those who remain quietly and peaceable will be considered good citizens and receive protection—those who are found in arms, or instigating others against the United States, will be considered traitors, and treated accordingly."

What was the action of Commodore Sloat? How did he interpret and understand the orders he had received? We have distinct information upon this point, communicated in the proclamation of Commodore Sloat to the people of California. He says:

"Henceforward California will be a portion of the United States, and its peaceable inhabitants will enjoy the same rights and privileges they now enjoy, together with the privilege of choosing their own magistrates and other officers, for the administration of justice among themselves, and the same protection will be extended to them as to any other State in the Union. They will also enjoy a permanent government."¶

And in a general order of July 7, 1846, he says :

"It is not only our duty to take California, but to preserve it afterwards, as a part of the United States, at all hazards."

What was the understanding of Commodore Stockton?

"The Territory of California now belongs to the United States, and will be governed, as soon as circumstances will permit, by officers and laws similar to those by which the other Territories of the United States are regulated and protected."

Now, sir, it is impossible, I think, to read what was done—what was reported by our officers to the President as having been done by them—without seeing that they understood and acted on his instructions, as designed to make a permanent conquest of such portions of Mexican territory as they were instructed to take possession of. There is not one word said in the instructions—nothing declared in the actions of the officers obeying those instructions—which referred or appeared to refer to a military occupation of those territories, for the purpose of compelling Mexico to do us justice for the wrongs we had sustained at her hands—on the contrary the instructions to General Kearney before read, require him to establish temporary civil governments therein, and authorize him to assure the people of the design of the United States to provide for them a free government similar to that which exists in our territories. These officers clearly understood that they were to take possession of, and hold, those territories as a portion of the United States. What says Commodore Stockton in his proclamation?

"I, Robert F. Stockton, commander-in-chief of the United States forces in the Pacific ocean, and Governor of the Territory of California, and commander-in-chief of the army of the same, do hereby make known to all men, that, having by right of conquest taken possession of that territory known by the name of Upper and Lower California, do now declare it to be a Territory of the United States, under the name of the Territory of California."

They accordingly took possession. They organized governments—and they acted in all respects as if from that time forward these territories ceased to be the property of Mexico, and became for all time, the property of the United States.

Now did they understand their instructions aright? Why, sir, in the message of the President of the United States, communicating those documents to us, there is something said which implies a disavowal of something that was done, an intimation that in some respects the instructions had been exceeded."

These documents contain all the "orders or instructions" to any military or naval officer of the government, "in relation to the establishment or organization of civil government in any portion of the territory of Mexico."

* * * * * * *

"Among the documents accompanying the report of the Secretary of War will be found "a form of government" "established and organized" by the military commander who entered and occupied with his forces the territory of New Mexico. This document was received at the War Department in the latter part of last month, and, as will be perceived by the report of the Secretary of War, was not, for the reason stated by that officer, brought to my notice until after my annual message of the 8th instant was communicated to Congress. It is declared on its face to be "a temporary government of the said territory," but there are portions of it which purport to establish and organize a permanent territorial government of the United States over the territory, and to impart to its inhabitants political rights, which, under the constitution of the United States, can be enjoyed permanently only by citizens of the United States. These have not been approved and recognized by me."

The Secretary of War in the report referred to by the President, states that "the organic law of the territory of New Mexico was not received until the 23d of November; and, because of its being voluminous, was not read by him or submitted to the President until after his annual message was sent in."

It appears, then, upon the statement of the President of the United States and the report of the Secretary of War, that the "organic law" established by General Kearney for the government of the territory of New Mexico, in consequence of its late arrival—late with reference to the then succeeding session—had not been read by him and submitted to the President and his orders taken with respect to it. Well, now that is the only one of the documents of which it is intimated that the contents were not known by the proper department and communicated to the President and approved and sanctioned by him. Therefore it is a reasonable, just and necessary conclusion that every one of the other documents, except the one thus specified and taken out by the exception, had been read, considered and approved. And further, even in reference to General Kearney's "organic law" nothing is excepted by the President but this: that he undertook to make that law a permanent form of government—whereas the President intended a permanent occupation, with a permanent government to be finally settled by Congress, leaving to the military officer the establishment of a temporary government only. No exception was taken by the President to General Kearney's proclamation of the 24th August, declaring his intention to hold New Mexico "AS A PART OF THE UNITED STATES"—none to his requiring ALL THE INHABITANTS TO RETURN TO THEIR HOMES on pain of being considered TRAITORS, and subjecting their persons to punishment, and their property to confiscation—none to his requiring the office-holders to consider themselves "CITIZENS OF, AND TO TAKE AN OATH OF ALLEGIANCE TO, THE UNITED STATES"—none to his declaring the intention of the United States to provide a civil government for New Mexico with a territorial legislature—none to his ABSOLVING in the name of the United States the inhabitants of that country from their allegiance to the republic of Mexico—and finally, none to his claiming all persons residing within that territory as citizens of the United States, and denouncing the doom of traitors against all of them who should be found in arms against us. To nothing that was done, by either Commodore Sloat or Commodore Stockton, in regard to these matters, is any exception taken; yet, Commodore Sloat proclaimed to the inhabitants of California—as early as July, 1846—THAT THENCEFORWARD CALIFORNIA WOULD BE "A PORTION OF THE UNITED STATES," and would enjoy "A PERMANENT GOVERNMENT." And, in his general orders, issued July 7th, he says to the troops who were about to be landed on the coast, that it was their duty not only to take California, but to preserve it afterwards as "A PART OF THE UNITED STATES" at all hazards. And Commodore Stockton by his proclamation makes known to all men, that he has by right of conquest taken possession of the territory known as Upper and Lower California, and declares it to be "THE TERRITORY OF THE UNITED STATES;" under the name of "THE TERRITORY OF CALIFORNIA." And again, on the 17th of August, he declares that the territory of California now belongs to the United States, and will be governed, as soon as circumstances permit, by officers and laws similar to those by which other territories of the United States are regulated and governed.

Here, then, we see officers acting under the authority of the President, without rebuke from him, claiming and establishing civil governments in New Mexico and California, as the permanent territories of the United States; claiming their inhabitants as the citizens, promising them a permanent form of government, and denouncing them as traitors if they should take up arms against the United States. What is this but conquest? What is it but seizure and permanent annexation by force of arms? This, then sir, I presume the President designed to do at the very time when he called upon the country for a recognition of this war, and for men and money to prosecute it. No intimation is given to us in any of his correspondence—if he did not entertain the design—at what time the change took place in the Presidential mind. In June, July, and August, from the Navy and the War Departments to all the officers charged with carrying into execution the wishes of the President in the prosecution of the war, we have the same general tone of instructions, and we have all these officers seizing territories and treating them as a permanent part of the United States. And to these proceedings the President takes no exception! He does not intimate, by the slightest breath of disapprobation, that the zeal of these commanders has exceeded the purpose of the Executive!

I must suppose then, that conquest was the object for which the President prosecuted the war from the beginning, and not indemnity. Why, sir, is it not a singular mode of securing indemnity if such had been his purpose. At the commencement of the war, what did he want indemnity for? Mexico, it is true, owed to our citizens money. If the object had been to seize the Mexican territory and simply to hold it by military occupation in order to compel Mexico to recognize and discharge her debts to us, why is nothing of this kind mentioned in these instructions? Why did these officers treat the territories of which they obtained possession as a conquest, which was to become a portion of the United States? Why is it that no intimation was given to them that the object had been misunderstood—that the possession which they held of these territories was as a sort of mortgage, or in the nature of a security until the payment of the debts due to us by Mexico? And above all, if indemnity, if enforcing payment of what was due to our citizens, and not conquest, or permanent annexation, was the object of the war, why did the secretary, as early as the 3d of June, 1846, authorize General Kearney to assure the people of New Mexico and Upper California that it was then "the wish and design of the United States to provide for them a free government similar to that which exists in our territories."

But this view of the subject, I think, becomes still stronger when we consider the mode in which the President carried on his negotiations. Mr. Slidell was sent to Mexico, in the month of November. I believe that his credentials bear date on the 10th of that month. Well, when he got to Mexico he was not received. Why was he not? The President tells you that Mexico, in spite of her plighted word, insultingly refused to receive our minister. Well, now it is plain to me—it is evident, when adverting to the correspondence which took place between our consul at Mexico and Senor Pena y Pena—that it never was the design of the then executive government of Mexico to receive a "minister resident" from the United States. On the 25th October, 1845, that minister writes to our consul, Mr. Black, "my government is disposed to receive the commissioner of the United States who may come to this capital with full powers from his government TO SETTLE THE PRESENT DISPUTE." And afterwards, Mr. Slidell having arrived, the objection to his reception was that his credentials appointed him "a Minister to reside near the government of Mexico, just as if there had been no suspension of the diplomatic and friendly relations between the two governments;" while the Mexican government understood it to be a special mission confined to the Texas question. And when, to this objection, Mr. Black replied that Mr. Slidell was authorized to settle all the questions in dispute, Senor Pena y Pena said that "his credentials had not reference to any questions in dispute, but merely as a Minister to reside near the Mexican government," and, referring to the great caution and circumspection necessary on their part, assured him that "the government itself was well disposed to arrange all differences."

It is impossible to read the correspondence without seeing that the persons administering the government of Mexico were exceedingly anxious to settle the question of boundary, and that, in order to enable them to do so, nothing might be done further to arouse or irritate the jealous feelings of the Mexican nation, and that therefore we should send them a commissioner only, with power to settle the pending dispute. Well, we were not satisfied with that. They had promised to receive a commissioner; the President tendered them a minister resident. To such a minister they objected, because he could not be received without arousing excited feelings and endangering their continuance in power, if not their personal safety. But that is not all. Long before Mr. Slidell's mission was set on foot, on the 15th of June, 1845, the acting Secretary of War writes to General Taylor in these terms:

"The point of your ultimate destination is the western frontier of Texas, where you will select and occupy, on or near the Rio Grande del Norte, such a site as will combine with the health of the troops, and will be best adapted to repel invasion, and to protect what, in the event of annexation, will be our western border."

Now, sir, here is an order as early as the 15th of June, 1845, in which General Taylor is directed to select a position on or near the Rio del Norte, claimed as the western frontier of Texas, which should have these conditions—it should consist with the health of the troops and be the point best adapted to repel invasion, and to protect what was to be our western border. Now, it will be sufficiently evident from these documents, I think, that it was the intention of the President that General Taylor should encamp on the left bank of the Rio Grande. General Taylor so understood it, for in a despatch of his dated 4th October, 1845, he says:

"It will be recollected that the instructions of June 15, issued by Mr. Bancroft, then acting Secretary of War, directed me to "select and occupy, on or near the Rio Grande, such a site as will consist with the health of the troops, and will be best adapted to repel invasion," &c. Brazos Santiago is the nearest entrance to the mouth of the Rio Grande; and Point Isabel, within that entrance, and twenty-one miles from Matamoras, would have fulfilled more completely than any other position the conditions imposed by the secretary."

Here General Taylor says expressly that he understood that he would more completely carry out the order by taking a position at Point Isabel. Why did he not? He immediately assigns the reason:

"But we had no artillery, no engineer force or appliances, and but a moderate amount of infantry; and the occupation of Point Isabel, under these circumstances, and with at least the possibility of resistance from the Mexicans, might have compromised the safety of the command. I, therefore, determined to take up the next accessible position in the rear, which is at the mouth of the Nueces river."

As early then as the 15th of June, an order was issued to Gen. Taylor, which he understood to be an order to take up his position on the left bank of the Rio Grande. An order which he thought would have been best complied with by establishing his position at Point Isabel. And he informed the department on the 4th of October, that this would have been done, but that he had not the requisite force to undertake it. Well, sir, did he understand the order rightly? Let us see. On the 16th the secretary writes to him:

"You will approach as near the western boundary of Texas, the Rio Grande, as circumstances will permit,"

And the final order of the 13th of January, 1846, about the meaning of which there is no dispute, which all admit was an imperative one to General Taylor to advance to the left bank of the Rio Grande, is couched in exactly the same terms as the two orders preceeding it. He is directed to advance, and occupy positions on, or near the left bank of the Rio del Norte. There is no intimation at any time to General Taylor, after the despatch of the 4th of October, informing him that he was mistaken in the construction which he puts upon the order of the 15th of June. On the contrary, after that despatch must have been received—nearly three months after it was written—when it is the design of the department, that he should occupy the same position which he was directed, according to his understanding, to do previously, he is directed to do it by a repetition of the order issued in June, 1845, almost in the same terms. Well, now what is the inference from this? If in June, 1845, General Taylor had been provided with a train of artillery, if he had had a suitable apparatus of engineers, he would under the order of June 15th have advanced, and taken possession of Point Isabel—pelting the Mexicans from that position, and placing it under the control of the United States. He had done so, would he not have been obeying the orders of this government? Was it not what was designed by this government, that he should do if the means had been in his possession? It is evident it was so designed, because, when they had given him the means and the same order—he assumes the position with the entire approbation and support of the government. Now, sir, was not this a singular mode of proceeding, if the object was to prevent peace, and restore friendly feelings between the two nations by amicable negotiation? Offence having been taken by Mexico for some cause, real or supposed, before the President sends his mission of peace—a month before he sends it—an order is issued the object and scope of which was to place a military force within the territory claimed and occupied by Mexico. Now, is it not obvious that if this order had been fully carried into effect, it was calculated to rouse the indignation of Mexico, and to prevent the settlement of the differences between the two countries? If negotiation was desirable, if the President himself desired to settle the differences upon amicable terms—would he have preceded a mission of peace by an aggression upon the power with which he desired to restore friendly relations? Let it be remembered, that I have shown to the Senate already, that the President considered, (we have it in the orders transmitted to his officers,) that the expulsion of the Mexicans from the left bank of the Rio Grande—the removal of their settlements—was an act of aggression, a hostile act, an act to be avoided in order to insure the continuance of peace, and which nothing would justify but the occurrence of actual war.

Thus, it seems to me, that not only did the President bring on the war by an unlawful and unconstitutional act; but that he has prosecuted it for the purpose of conquest—and of conquest alone. But this purpose the President did not made known to Congress. He did not submit (as he should have done) to the judgment of Congress, whether they were willing to prosecute a war for the purpose of making a permanent conquest of the territory of a neighboring republic. On the contrary, he seems carefully to have concealed his design from Congress. In his special message of the 4th of August, 1846, to the Senate, he says expressly:

"The chief difficulty to be anticipated in the negotiation is the adjustment of the boundary between the parties, in a line which shall at once be satisfactory and convenient to both, and such as neither will hereafter be inclined to disturb. This is the high mode of securing perpetual peace and good neighborhood between the two republics. Should the Mexican government, in order to accomplish these objects, be willing to cede a portion of their territory to the United States, we ought to pay them a fair equivalent for it, just and honorable payment, AND NOT CONQUEST, being our purpose in the prosecution of the war."

Now what notion the President attaches to the term "conquest," I do not know! To me it seems plain that what had been directed to be done before this message was written, and what was afterwards done by the military and naval officers of the Government not only without rebuke, but with the express recognition of the President of the United States, is direct, clear, and unquestionable conquest. I understand conquest in this connection as meaning the seizure of the territory of another nation by force—whether it is to be held by force, or whether a consent to our retaining it, is to be extorted by the power of our arms.

Again, sir, the President's message at the last session of Congress expressly declares that, "the war has not been waged with a view to conquest," that "the war will continue to be prosecuted with vigor as the best means of securing peace," and that "it is deemed proper to hold military possession of all the provinces which have been taken, until a definitive treaty of peace shall have been concluded and ratified by the two countries." And I recollect well, sir, at the last session, when a resolution was moved by a member of this body, [Mr. WESTCOTT,] directing the Committee on Territories to consider as to the propriety of establishing some species of legislative authority overthe territories of the enemy which had been taken into our possession, the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] who is not now in his seat, in his strong manner denounced in his place the proposition, on the ground that it attributed to the President of the United States the assumption that those portions of Mexico were territories of the United States. This the honorable Senator characterized as an absurdity.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—Monstrosity.

Mr. BADGER.—Yes, monstrosity. But, sir, this year the tone of the message is materially changed. The President has got a new phrase. He now says, not that he is not carrying on the war for the purpose of conquest, but "it has never been contemplated by me, as an object of the war to make a permanent conquest of the Republic of Mexico, or to annihilate her separate existence as an independent nation." This is quite consistent with a design of temporarily conquering the whole, and permanently conquering a part. Indeed, he expressly informs us, that New Mexico and the Californias "should never be surrendered to Mexico." Now, it seems to me that it was the duty of the President of the United States to have explained to Congress from the first, what his real purpose was. If he intended at the last session to actually conquer and retain by force—to retain, under all circumstances, the territory then acquired from Mexico—he should have so told Congress. But he told us no such thing. On the contrary, he leaves us to suppose that though these proceedings seem to look like conquest, yet, still, in the Presidential mind, the conquest of any part of Mexico was not his purpose. Now, sir, we are distinctly informed that the President is of opinion we should retain, at all hazards, New Mexico and the two Californias.

The next proposition which strikes me as being material to a just determination of the course to be pursued in reference to the bill, now under the consideration of the Senate, is this: that the present plan of the war, as announced by the Secretary of the War Department in his communication to the President, if carried out, must irresistibly lead to the conquest of the whole of Mexico; and I think we may reasonably conclude, judging of the future by the past, that if at this session, Congress shall place in the hands of the President all the means he has asked, we shall, at the next session, find the whole of Mexico entirely overrun, and at the mercy of our troops; and we shall then have a message informing us that the President is of opinion that Congress should not consent, under any circumstances, to surrender any portion of the Mexican republic.

The Secretary of War, in his report, speaks of three plans.—Why, sir, there are but two, in fact, if I am capable of understanding what seems to be tolerably plain language. Human ingenuity cannot make of it more than two plans, although he has numerically divided it into three. What are they?

Our further operations must, in my opinion, be conducted in one of the three following modes. First, to take and hold an indemnity line, to recede from all places and positions now occupied in advance of it, and cease from all aggressive operations beyond that line. Second, to overrun the whole country, and hold all the principal places in it by permanent garrisons. And third, to overrun what we now possess, and the lines of communication into the interior, and extend our operations to other important places, as our means and the prospect of success might indicate, keeping a disposable force always ready, within supporting distance of it, to annoy the enemy, to seize supplies, enforce contributions, and frustrate his efforts to collect means and assemble troops for the purpose of protracting the war.

Well now, sir, is it not strange that numbers two and three shall be considered separate and distinct plans? The second is to overrun the whole country and hold all the principal places in it by establishing garrisons therein. What is the the third? It is to retain what we possess, to open a communication with the interior, and to take other places, according as our means may enable us. Does he mean under the second plan to take more than our means will enable us to take? Under the first of the two latter of the Secretary's plans, he proposes to take all the principal places in Mexico; and, under the second of them, he proposes to keep what we have got and get all we can. Well now, the President has adopted the third of the plans reported by the Secretary, as enumerated by him upon which the war is to be carried on, and it is upon that basis that supplies are asked, and particularly the ten regiments proposed to be raised by this bill, to assist in carrying out the operations of this war, in accordance with the views of the Secretary.

Well, sir, believing, as I do, that the necessary consequence of furnishing the means which are required by this bill, will be to enable the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, to make a permanent conquest of the whole of Mexico, I cannot vote for it. I am opposed to augmenting the forces for such a purpose.

How is the conquest of Mexico to be effected? How is a peace to be brought about, under this mode of prosecuting a war, except by the seizure and subjugation of the whole country? I cannot vote, sir, for any plan by which Mexico is to be conquered and annexed! Because, in the first place it would be grossly unjust. It would, in my judgment, according to my convictions of right, be a high and flagrant wrong for us to seize upon and incorporate the territories of that republic into our own. I believe it would fix a stigma upon the character of this people which all successive ages would not be able to wipe out.

No oblivion that thousands of years could throw over it—no darkness with which the lapse of ages could surround it, would prevent the flagrant enormity of such a measure, from being apparent to posterity. How could our future historians, and poets be able to relate the tale of this country's doings in regard to this feeble, unfortunate, degraded republic? In vain would the attempt be made to close the eyes of mankind against the gross injustice of this procedure, by throwing around it the flimsy pretences which patriotism might suggest. Sir, now we have the dazzling blaze of military glory cast over these operations, and behold them in a light which may mislead and deceive us, but when the excitement of the present day, shall have passed away, and they shall be looked at in the clear light of history, and their character pronounced by the voice of truth, there will be a universal verdict of condemnation given by mankind. My deliberate conviction is that in the judgment of posterity, if we should consummate such a wrong as this, the crimson guilt of the partition of Poland, would pale into absolute whiteness in the comparison. The one, it would be said, was an act perpetrated by Monarchs, hereditary rulers, men born to govern, and who had been taught to regard others merely as the ministers of their pleasures, or the instrumentality of increasing their power, and in whose behalf it might be urged that they only followed the example of their predecessors in seeking, by whatever means, to increase their power; but in the other case, it would be declared that the act was committed by a republican government, based on principles of equal rights, and professing friendship and good will to all mankind, seeking for national happiness, and national glory in the pursuit of the peaceful arts, engaged in the establishment of justice and tranquility, and regarding the whole human race as brethren in blood, entitled to their humanity and consideration. The writers of that distant age would find that then, as ever:

> "Nor florid prose nor honied lies of rhyme,
> Can blazon evil deeds or consecrate a crime."

I am not willing that my country should now commit this irreparable wrong, and soil herself with this ineffacable stain.

I am opposed to the seizure and annexation of Mexico, because it is as unwise as unjust. I know there are some who entertain a different opinion, but it does seem clear to me that the accomplishment of such a measure as the incorporation of Mexico—whether her people are to be introduced into a community of rights with us or to be held as a degraded and conquered province—whether they are to sustain towards us the relation of the territories we have heretofore had, or to remain in a state of perpetual pupilage—whatever the mode and form in which their future condition and character are to be established—must inevitably in the hour of its completion doom the Union to certain destruction.

I was glad to hear the Senator from South Carolina farthest from me, (Mr. CALHOUN,) take strong and decided ground against the absorption of Mexico and the destruction of her nationality.—I was glad to hear his voice raised against what in my view would be one of the greatest of crimes, one of the greatest of political blunders. But, I wonder, Mr. President, that it did not strike the honorable Senator, that the injustice of seizing upon the whole by force, was an injustice but in degree superior to seizing upon any part by force—that though the enormity of absorbing the whole of the Mexican territory strikes us with astonishment and horror, it is but because the human mind is more strongly affected and impressed by subjects which appear large, yet, that in truth, the seizure of one foot of Mexican soil is just as much an invasion of the eternal principles of right, as much a sacrifice of the claims of justice and the obligations which we owe our fellow-men, as the seizure of the whole. I am opposed to the conquest, by arms, of Mexico or any part of Mexico. I am opposed to wresting from her one inch of her domain by the exertion of any force which shall control her will and compel an apparent surrender, while in reality, the soul of the country tenaciously adheres to that with which it parts. I am opposed to the commission by the country of such an act of injustice, for the attainment of any object be it great or small, believing, as I fully do, that a pure, unsullied reputation amongst the nations of the earth, is of more importance to us than any acquisition that the wide world can furnish.

It has been said—it was said on this floor at the time when the resolutions of the honorable Senator from South Carolina were before the Senate—that the proposition contained in them, without a denunciation of the conquest of Mexico and the destruction of her nationality, was a proposition for the assertion of which would be idle and fruitless, because the destruction of the nationality of Mexico is contemplated by no one. At the time when I heard the statement made, I entertained the same opinion and expressed that opinion to the Senator himself. (Mr. CALHOUN here nodded assent.) But, an attentive consideration of the report of the Secretary of War, and the means demanded by the President—a consideration of the important fact disclosed this day, that the President has refused upon this subject to communicate his views and plans in the further prosecution of the war—the fact that he has proceeded from a disavowal of all intended conquest, to a simple intimation that he has never desired to conquer Mexico or destroy her nationality;—these things, sir, have convinced me of the probability that the government is now thinking, at some no distant day, actually to make the movement which the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina denounces. I was struck, sir, with the account of a recent celebration in this city of the anniversary of the battle of New Orleans. It was held here on the 11th instant, and I noticed that an honorable and distinguished member of this body (Mr DICKINSON,) made an address on the occasion to the company then assembled, concluding with a sentiment which goes far ahead of the annexation of the whole of Mexico. He gave as a toast—"A more perfect Union, embracing the whole of the North American Continent." I did not observe that the sentiment was received with disapprobation. I saw no mention of any qualification of the sentiment by him or others; but there it stands as the declared opinion of a representative of the great "empire State" upon this floor—a State which, of all others, is able to succeed by physical force in the accomplishment of such a design—a design looking to a more "perfect union," not in the closer association of the members of this republic—not in a strengthening of our social relations—not in an increase of mutual attachment—but a more perfect union which is to embrace in one with us the whole of the North American continent, including Mexico on the south, and the entire British Provinces on the north. When I see propositions of that sort coming from gentlemen of such high character, known intelligence, and distinguished position before the country, I cannot resist the conclusion that such sentiments may have an echo in the hearts of thousands.

But there are other difficulties in my mind. I consider the further prosecution of this war upon the plan proposed by the President of the United States as dangerous to the liberties of the country. I was struck by the remark made by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) that no one now hears, as in the early days of the republic, the question, "how will this measure affect our liberty?" Now we sit down and calculate calmly what amount of military force or means it is necessary to put into the hands of the President to accomplish a certain object. We ask whether we shall send him further into Mexico at the head of an hundred thousand men, with all the means of this country at his command, by our voluntary vote, and all the means of Mexico by military and violent seizure, and yet, as the honorable Senator said, there is no inquiry as to the effect of all this upon our liberties. That remark excited in my mind a train of thought, which led me to the conclusion that there is great and just ground of apprehension if this measure is adopted that the liberties of the country will be seriously endangered. Recollect what the President claimed on this subject, in his message of last session. All that has been done heretofore in Mexico, in the prosecution of this war, the President claims the right of doing because we are the conqueror. But where, I ask, does he find any authority for exercising the rights of a conqueror? If he has them, it must be irrespective and independent of the constitution of the United States? The conqueror has certain rights, and the President claims that these rights belong to him. For one, I do not admit that proposition. It is the Government of the United States and the people of the United States represented in that Government, who are the conquerors in every war in which we are successful. Therefore, the rights which belong to the conqueror, according to the law of nations, belong no more to the President than they do to the lowest officer who leads a band of men against the enemy. These rights belong to the country—to those who represent the sovereignty of the nation—who hold the war-power of the nation—to the Congress of the United States. The President has no other power, than as he is, by the constitution, the chief military commander, whose duty it is to carry on war for the purpose and to the ends declared by those who represent the sovereignty of the nation. But the President claims that he has a right to take possession, and, that having taken possession, he has a right to require from persons within the territory the oath of allegiance; submission to the regulations of his military officers; suspension of all resistance to his military authority, under pain of being treated as traitors, and made liable to punishment in their persons and in the confiscation of their goods; and to seize all the public property and revenues of the country. All this he claims, as a conqueror, and wholly irresponsive of any responsibility to Congress. I protest against any such doctrine.

Having now stated my views of the commencement of this war—the manner and purposes of its prosecution—and the dangerous tendency of the Executive claims of power and projects of conquest—I come to the proposition before us. We are called upon to place at the command of the President ten regiments of regulars, in addition to the present military force. For what purpose? To carry on the war with Mexico? Upon what plan? Sir, the President declines to inform us upon what plan.

Mr. MANGUM, (in his seat.)—His friends here decline.

Mr. BADGER.—A few days ago when this subject was under consideration by the Senate, and my friend from Kentucky (Mr. CRITTENDEN) stated in his strong and forcible manner the present condition of Mexico, and the utter and absolute want of any necessity for this additional military force, a part of a communication from General Scott was read by the Hon. Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, as to the amount of force that would be required. General Scott expressed the opinion that if certain purposes were contemplated it would be necessary to raise his forces to fifty thousand men. I myself asked the Hon. Senator on what plan, system, or basis of operation, for conducting the war, that estimate was made. The Senator declined to answer. Resolutions have been proposed in the other House, making inquiries, and to these the President has declined giving any answer. A resolution was introduced in this body asking the President to communicate to us information on this subject, such as he might deem it consistent with the public interest to communicate to us, either confidentially or in open session. The President was asked to communicate to us information which would enable us to understand this monster project for the war, which requires this great addition to our military means; and this morning, by a vote of the majority of this body it was determined that the question should not be put to the President, whether he has in his possession any information on this subject, which he could, consistently with the public interests, communicate to us, either in private session or confidentially? Thus, by the action of the President in the one case, and his friends in the other, all information is denied us, and the war-making power of the country excluded from all knowledge of the plans for the prosecution of the war! Well, sir, what is the amount of our military force in Mexico, to which it is proposed to make this formidable addition? Without going into detail, I may safely say that that force at present amounts in round numbers to forty-five thousand men. Under existing laws, twenty thousand may be raised, to complete the complement of regulars and volunteers, making an aggregate of sixty-five thousand men. Deduct from that fifteen thousand, on account of the casualties to which the Senator from Michigan so often refers, and you have an army of fifty thousand men. Yet, it is now proposed to add to that force ten regiments of regulars with a bill behind it to put at the disposal of the President twenty thousand volunteers, a force, including the sailors and marines co-operating with the troops, of not less than seventy-five thousand to eighty thousand effective men. What is to be accomplished by this force? Are there battles to be fought? That is distinctly disavowed. There is no expectation, sir, of any more battles to be fought. For what then, sir, do you ask these men? Why, the honorable gentleman from Michigan says, that he wishes, by the exhibition of a large force there, to produce "a great moral effect." How? Why, he means to convince the Mexicans that they are unable to resist us! Well, sir, if they are able to resist the logic of such fields as Buena Vista, Churubusco, Contreras, and Cerro Gordo; think you, sir, that the incredulity will yield to the mere sight of a large body of men? What, then, do you intend to do with this immense military force? They are to take possession and occupy the country it is said. And when they are there, what great object is it intended that they should accomplish, which this country desires to see accomplished? Do we want peace? Is it not obvious to every one that peace cannot in this way be obtained? If peace could be coerced, we have done every thing that genius can contrive, and skill and gallantry execute to accomplish it. I believe it may be said, without exaggeration, that the history of no country has presented such a succession of brilliant military achievments as we have gained in Mexico. As a single battle, nothing can be produced equal to the last battle of Taylor; and as a succession of military operations, where can you find a parallel to the advance of Scott from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico? If chastisement—defeat—overpowering, overwhelming defeat—were sufficient to bring Mexico to a disposition for peace, she would have been brought to that disposition long ago. How, then, do you propose to accomplish it by your troops? Why, they are to take possession and occupy the whole country—or, as the Secretary of War says, to keep that portion of it which we have got, and occupy all the rest of which our means will allow us to take possession. Well, when you have got possession, what disposition of it do you propose to make? Posts and fortifications. I suppose, are to be established everywhere. You are to maintain all the strongholds of Mexico, and her valleys are to be everywhere marked by the signs of military occupation How long is this state of things to continue? Until Mexico makes peace! But, I pray you, is this the way in which the gentle sentiments of benevolence and peace are to be instilled into the Mexican bosom? True, you may compel her to submit—you may prevent her from uttering a word of complaint—you may force her to feign compliance with your wishes—her active resentment may disappear—and yet a dogged spirit of revenge, and the intensest hate, will rankle and lurk beneath. The Latin poet has said with great propriety and force:

"Si te cola Sextæ non fumabit."

—referring to a well known quality of our nature, in virtue of which that superiority which demands our admiration, inclines us to withhold our love. If this be the tendency of that moral coercion, what may we expect from awe and terror? Do we really expect, by renewed conquest, by devastated fields, by captured villages, by stormed fortresses, by occupying such positions that no Mexican can look forth without beholding the evidence of the fall of his country and the presence of her conqueror, that peace is to be restored? Sir, no man should expect it. What is the situation of Mexico at this moment? She lies at your feet, bleeding, exhausted, panting. Do you wish to trample upon this enemy already in the dust? Do you wish to crush the last remains of her vitality? I hope not, sir; but even if you do, you do not need this additional force.

We received yesterday the copy of a general order of the 15th December, issued by General Scott, the first article of which proceeded to inform the army that it would spread itself over the republic of Mexico; and which goes on to establish a system of internal regulation for the government of the country, and the collection and disbursement of the revenue. If, then, it be right and manly, in the present crippled condition of Mexico, to destroy her nationality, you have ample means to do so. But, ere you proceed to the accomplishment of such a purpose, will you not pause for a moment and reflect upon the consequences which must inevitably follow? If such a design be carried out, the destruction of our liberties is certain. You send forth the President with his eighty thousand men. He is told that he can support these men and meet the other expenses of the war by levying contributions in Mexico. He is thus, clothed with such authority, left in a foreign country to form his plans and carry them into execution. Is he not thus invested with all the power and dignity of a prince, free to obey the dictates of his own arbitrary will at the head of seventy or eighty thousand men, dictating laws to a new nation, collecting and disbursing its revenues, ruling there with a despotic sway, and by the patronage and power thus created controlling the action of his proper constituency at home? Such a power, sir, ought not to be trusted to the President of the United States. Above all things, sir, regulars should not be the force placed at his disposal. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has told us that regulars were to be preferred because when they entered the army they surrendered every right but the right of obedience! and became "mere machines." This avowal led me to look with horror upon such a description of force. I prefer the volunteers, because although they enter the service of the country, they yield none of the rights of freemen. I am opposed to putting into the hands of the Executive a military force which knows no law but their master's bidding, moving at his will, obeying his behests implicitly, and holding themselves free from all the obligations and responsibilities of citizenship. When you put a vast force of that description into the hands of the Executive, have you not, as far, as possible, rendered him independent of you? Have you not converted him from a President into a Prince—from a republican Chief Magistrate into a Military Dictator?

When, on the present plan of the campaign, is the war to end? War, it must be admitted by all, is a great evil. Is there to be no end to it in this case? must

"——————————— the tears
And blood of earth flow on as they have flowed,
An universal deluge—which appears
Without an ark for wretched man's abode
And ebb but to re-flow."

Is it our design, in sending these troops to Mexico, to sit out the Mexican people, and try an experiment of obstinacy between the two races? If so, let us recollect the just and forcible remark made here last winter by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) in speaking of the line proposed to be taken by the Senator from South Carolina, that no people on earth have such obstinate perseverance as the old Castilian race, and this quality is to be found to a great extent in the present inhabitants of Mexico. The Senator then reminded us, that if we undertake the process of sitting out the Mexicans, we should not forget the example of the Moors; for, as he remarked, they sat a thousand years, and the Spaniards at last sat them out, and took possession of the whole of Spain. Sir, I am not in favor of voting these regulars to the President in order to enlarge our military forces in Mexico. The force there now, is ample for every legitimate purpose. If the President wishes to prolong the experiment for another year of occupying the portion of the country, now in our military possession, he has ample force to do so. I am not willing to encourage the President in any scheme of territorial aggrandizement, or by any action of mine to excite, if it does not already exist, a disposition to seize and annex the whole of Mexico. I desire no such result; nay, I should dread it as a calamity—I should look upon it with horror as a fatal misfortune. If we are to have any additional troops, let them be volunteers. Let them be men of that superior character of which the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. DAVIS,) spoke. Let them be men who realize their rights—who have a position in society, which connects them indissolubly with everything dear to the happiness and future welfare of the country. Let us not put any more of these "machines" into the hands of the President, which he may, if it be his pleasure, turn against ourselves.

It has been supposed that the people of the United States have a desire that some acquisition should be made from Mexico by force. I am extremely unwilling to believe that the people of my country entertain such a wish, or cherish such a purpose. But of one thing I am certain: the people of my own State neither have in themselves, nor encourage in others, a disposition to seize by violence the property of Mexico, or to acquire anything from her except by her voluntary disposition, for a full and valuable consideration. The people of North Carolina, I feel sure, are satisfied with their own possessions. They fix no eager look of covetousness on the enjoyments of others. Plain, unpretending, honest, not blessed with the largest amount of wealth and power and means which Providence has showered upon other portions of the Union, but possessing enough for happiness—enough for respectability—enough to enable them to educate their children and diffuse the principles of morality and religious truth amongst them, and to hand down as a legacy to their descendants the great principle that nothing can be truly great which is not right—that people, sir, are opposed to any such aggressive policy—any such unjust and forcible acquisition. They hold that he who sacrifices the principles of justice on account of property, not only yields up his innocence, but sacrifices his interest, and, by his intemperate pursuit of what belongs to others, surrenders or weakens his best security for the continued possession of his own. Sir, I feel the strongest conviction that the people of my own State do not desire to acquire any thing from Mexico, by force, and that they would not be willing to put at hazard the peace of our own country, and weaken the bond of our Union, by any considerable acquisition of Mexican territory, however freely surrendered and amply paid for. They may be willing, as I am, to procure a bay upon the Pacific with such an addition of territory as shall be necessary and barely necessary, to unite it with our territory of Oregon, provided it is not obtained by force—that the surrender is not dictated by coercive power—but that it is made with a true free will, and honestly purchased by us. But, if, contrary to my confident expectations, the people who sent me here have or should have views contrary to those which I have expressed, I cannot sacrifice, to their wishes what I believe to be their highest honor and their best interests.

I have thus imperfectly expressed the views under which I must vote against the proposition on your table. They have been presented with entire frankness on my own part, and, thanking the Senate for the attention with which I have been heard, I will detain them no longer.

Mr. FOOTE then signified his intention of addressing the Senate upon the bill before them, but as the hour of adjournment had arrived,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1848.

REPORTS FROM DEPARTMENTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, accompanied by a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, respecting any losses sustained by the Seneca Indians of New York, through a late Sub-Agent of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, correcting a clerical error in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances; which was ordered to be printed, and appended to said annual report.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, made agreeably to law, accompanied by a statement of the persons employed in the Indian Department, during the year 1847.

PETITIONS.

Mr. MANGUM presented the petition of Ann Kelly, widow of Daniel Kelly, deceased, a gunner in the Naval Service, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial of the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy, praying the adoption of measures to prevent the importation of spurious drugs, medicines and chemicals into the ports of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BAGBY submitted an additional document relating to the petition of Hugh Wallace Wormley; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON, of La., presented the petition of William Darby, praying remuneration for time and money spent by him in the survey of the Sabine river.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of La. it was Ordered, That it be referred to a select committee, consisting of five members, to be appointed by the VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. CORWIN, Mr. JOHNSON, of La., Mr. RUSK, Mr. FOOTE, and Mr. CASS, were appointed the committee.

On motion by Mr. UPHAM, it was Ordered, That the documents on the files of the Senate, relating to the claim of John Ellis to a pension, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, it was Ordered, That the memorial of John Hagan, E. Lackett, and Sherman Johnson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. BAGBY, it was Ordered, That the report of the Postmaster General, made the 6th inst., in relation to the claim of Jameson and Williamson, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Miss., it was.

Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Gad Humphreys, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

MAJOR CHARLES LARABEE.

Mr. NILES said: Mr. President, There is on the files of the Senate the petition and accompanying papers of Major Charles Larabee, praying for an increase of his pension, or for arrears of pension which he thinks he is justly entitled to. I presented this petition last session, and then took occasion to make a few remarks on the case, to ask the attentionof the Committee on Pensions to it. From wanted time I presume there was no action upon it. In justice to Major Larabee, who is one of my constituents, I cannot now forbear to say a few words respecting the merits of this claim, and the peculiar hardship of the case of the petitioner. Major Larabee entered the army several years before the last war with Great Britain. I believe, in the humble rank of a private—I perhaps of a sergeant—and by his good conduct, his fidelity and his bravery, left the army with the brevet rank of a Major conferred upon him for his gallant and honorable conduct. Before the war began he was engaged in the battle of Tippecanoe; and he was in that fierce and bloody fight at Brownstown, the very first battle of that war, and in that action lost his right arm, which was so shattered that it had to be amputated at the shoulder. But though thus wounded and maimed, he continued in the service, and was actively employed during the whole war, and was in other actions, of which the battle of Plattsburgh was one.

Soon after the war he left the army, and in 1830 received his pension, commencing in 1827. Being but a lieutenant when wounded, he received a pension as such only, although he sustained the honorable rank of a Major when he left the service. His pension is only twenty-five dollars per month, a small sum for an officer of the rank of a Major, and wishing to sustain in society the character belonging to that rank. If his pension was to go back as is done in the case of officers of the Navy, there would be a considerable sum due him for arrears of pension. There were several years which intervened between the time he left the army when his pay as an officer ceased, and that of the commencement of his pension. For this period at least, it appears to me, he is justly entitled to receive his pension, but this would be inadequate relief. It appears to me that this is a proper time to revise our invalid pension laws, as there are now many who will be claiming relief under them. There are I apprehend defects in our laws; they will probably require amendment to do justice to the numerous meritorious officers and soldiers who have been wounded in the present war. It is my opinion, without having particularly examined this subject, that the present laws do not make a sufficient distinction between those whose disability is such as to wholly deprive them of the capacity to support themselves, and those whose disability is partial, and not essentially disability for civil employment. In the former case the sacrifice of the wounded officer or soldier is great; it is in a pecuniary point of view alone equal to the value of a man's servicers for life. It is in reality much more than this, as it is no small thing to be wounded and lose a limb for life.

I would not encourage a spirit for war, or a desire for military fame and distinction among the young men of the country; but those who possess this spirit and who hazard their lives, their limbs, and their health in the service of their country, I would deal justly and liberally with. Without saying more I commend this case to the examination and careful consideration of the Committee, and trust that they will be able to afford some relief to the petioner, either by a general law or a special act confined to this particular case, which is certainly one of great hardship.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. ASHLEY submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into and report to the Senate, the manner in which the printing of the Senate has been executed; whether it has been done in conformity with the terms of the contracts, either as to the quality and size of the paper furnished, or the manner in which the printing has been done; also, that they inquire and report who further documents printed and distributed by the Printers to Congress, are correctly printed from the originals sent to their offices.

GEN. SCOTT'S LATE ORDER.

Mr. MANGUM submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether the general orders, No. 376, issued by Gen. Scott, at head-quarters, Mexico, bearing date 15th December last, were issued under instructions from the Secretary of War; and if so, to lay said instructions before the Senate; and also any opinion of Gen. Scott, in regard to the necessary military means to carry said instructions into effect, which may be on file.

SAULT STE. MARIE.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That the report of the acting Secretary of the Treasury communicating a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of Dec. 7th 1847, respecting the military reservations and private land claims at Sault Ste. Marie, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CASE OF LESLIE COMBS.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, moved that the Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Leslie Combs, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SEVIER.—I can see no reason why there should be a change of reference in this case.

Mr. BERRIEN.—This is a claim arising from the result of negociation between the United States and Mexico, when Texas was yet an independent republic. It is not a claim presented as growing up subsequently to the time of her admission into the Union. It is a question, therefore, depending on the principles of international law. After the Union of Texas with this Republic, such claims would properly belong to the Committee on Claims; but the claim having arisen prior to the Union, I submit that the subject properly belongs to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MANGUM.—I hope the Committee will not be discharged; if they should be, the subject ought not to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations; for it is undoubtedly, as it seems to me, entirely a distinct claim. It is one which necessarily requires the application of accurate and precise legal knowledge. And as these are very interesting questions, and as it is probable that they will occupy much of the attention of Congress in future, I hope we shall have the benefit of all the learning of the distinguished Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I shall be perfectly willing to acquiesce in the suggestions of the Senator from South Carolina, if he can indicate to me any one principle of municipal law which will be brought into discussion in the consideration of this claim. The question is what is the responsibility which the United States incurs in consequence of her associating with herself, and incorporating into the Union, a foreign state. If that is not a subject for the consideration of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I know not what is.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I disagree entirely with the honorable Senator. I conceive that by far the most difficult and delicate question involved in this claim is a question of municipal law.

The question was put on discharging the Committee on the Judiciary, and it was determined in the negative.

ADDITIONAL UNITED STATES' COURT IN TEXAS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. RUSK asked, and obtained leave, to bring in a bill to establish an additional District Court of the United States in the State of Texas; which was read the first, and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

UNITED STATES' COURTS IN MAINE.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill changing the time for holding the terms of the Circuit Court of the United States, in the District of Maine, reported it without amendment.

JUDGMENTS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a resolution in relation to the rendition of judgments against the United States in certain cases; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of John Searing, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas Douglas, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas Douglas, late United States attorney for East Florida; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. BRADBURY, the vote by which the Senate had concurred in an adverse report submitted by the Committee of Claims, in the case of Amos Holton, was reconsidered; and the question recurring upon concurring in said report, it was Ordered, That it be recommitted to the Committee of Claims.

VACANCIES IN COMMITTEES.

Mr. BRADBURY was, at his own request, excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Printing, and as a member of the joint committee of the two Houses on printing.

Mr. CAMERON was, at his own request, excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. YULEE was, at his own request, excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. DICKINSON was, at his own request, excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Patents.

On motion by Mr. BRADBURY, the VICE PRESIDENT was authorized to make appointments to fill the vacancies in the foregoing committees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER stated that he was somewhat embarrassed as to the intention of the Senate in regard to these appointments; whether the chairmen were to be designated by him, or merely appointed to complete the number.

Mr. MANGUM.—I understand that the practice of the Senate has been that the chair simply appoint a member of the committee. I believe that, under parliamentary rules, every committee has a right to make its own chairman; but it has been the invariable practice here to accede to the rule, when the appointment is given to the chair, that the first named on the committee shall be chairman. Still I think it is within the competency of the committee to displace that chairman at any time, and appoint another. But when a vacancy occurs, the usage, I think, has been simply to appoint a committee man.

Mr. SEVIER.—In regard to the practice of the Senate, I happen to recollect one instance which occurred in relation to a committee of which I was a member—I mean the Committee on Indian Affairs. Judge White had been our chairman for many years. I happened to be the second on that committee. When Judge White resigned his seat in the Senate, the then Presiding Officer of the Senate appointed Mr. Tipton to be chairman.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I know there have been cases where the chairmen have been appointed by the Presiding Officer, but I think the principle is that the chair appoints the committee men, and it belongs to the committee, where it is not otherwise provided for, to say who shall be chairman.

Mr. YULEE said that the Naval Committee had recently found occasion to examine the question presented by the Vice President. The result of his examination was that the practice in the Senate, as exhibited by an uniform and unbroken current of precedents, was to leave to the committees the selection of their Chairmen under the circumstances as stated by the Vice President.—The Senate might, by a distinct and direct action, designate a Chairman, and in several instances this had been done; but when the Vice President, under the direction of the Senate, filled a vacancy, the member thus appointed invariably took place, on the list of the Committee, after the members already constituting it. He believed no precedent would be found to the contrary. The action that followed the resignation of the Chairman of the Finance Committee, in the last Congress, furnished a correct illustration of the established practice of the Senate.

Mr. SEVIER read from the Senate Journal the case to which he had referred.

Mr. YULEE said it would be seen that the precedent referred to by the Senator from Arkansas, was in strict accordance with the practice as stated by him, (Mr. YULEE,) for it would be seen that, in the case his friend referred to, the Senate itself had designated the Chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER then put the question, "shall the appointments be limited to filling up the number," and

It was decided in the affirmative.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. FOOTE—The Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. BADGER,) concluded his speech of yesterday with the mention of what he was pleased to entitled, "the flickering light of military glory." What does this mean? Does he so much condemn the war that he is of opinion with some other distinguished gentlemen of his party, that no permanent honor can be acquired in a war so unjust and unconstitutional? I knew before, that the venerable Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) had expressed some months ago his opinion, in very plain language too, that no real glory could be achieved in such a war. His words on this point are worth quotation, for they seem to me to indicate a settled design, not to say a deliberate conspiracy in certain quarters, to prevent our military chieftains of this Mexican war from deriving any eminent civic advancement from their immortal exploits. "Sir," said the Senator from Massachusetts, on the occasion referred to, "I need not say that I have as much respect for distinguished military achievement as any man. I would not see any laurels that belong to it withered. I honor those who are called on, by professional duty, to bear arms in their country's cause, and do their duty well. I would obscure none of their fame. But I will say here, and to them, that it is the solemn adjudication of nations, and it is the sentiment of the Christian world, that war urged for vicious purposes, or from vicious motives, tarnishes the lustre of arms; and darkens, if it does not blot, what otherwise might be a glorious page in the history of the nation that makes it." Well, sir, the Senator from North Carolina, and others, co-operating with him in this discussion, claim to have proved that this war was entered upon by the President, not in defence, nor to avenge national injuries and insults, but in order to secure a plausible pretext for forcibly seizing upon, and permanently retaining, the Californias and New Mexico; he denounces the act as a great crime, and quotes poetry depictive of his contempt and indignation against such vile conduct; so that between the two distinguished gentlemen, the case is easily made out. Neither Gen. Taylor nor Gen. Scott could have gained any laurels worthy to adorn the brow of a patriot, since the war is judged to be both waged for "vicious purposes," and from "vicious motives," and thus is "the lustre of arms" seriously "tarnished." This, too, is not mentioned to be the opinion of a single individual however distinguished, nor even of many, but "the adjudication of nations," and "the sentiment of the christian world." No wonder that the Senator from North Carolina talks about the flickering light of military glory. This word flickering is quite expressive: it is usually applied to the blaze of a candle or lamp just in the act of becoming extinct. And, sir, is it possible that all the glory which certain gentlemen lately saw in the achievements of our brave officers and men who have fought in Mexico, is about becoming eclipsed? Shall we say of the lustre of Buena Vista: "Sic transit gloria mundi"? Has the old dread of military chieftains suddenly come upon distinguished gentlemen? Is Cicero's famous maxim—"Arma cedant togæ," about to be realized? Has some magnetic process been going on, in order to win distinguished gentlemen back to their old faith and prevent them from running after new idols? I have understood that the celebrated lecturer on Electro Magnetism is in the city, and, if applied to, might perchance suggest the means of succeeding in this magnetizing scheme. Well, I am really afraid that if the blaze of military glory is flickering, it may be expected to go out shortly.

Mr. BADGER.—If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I will say that the expression which I used was used inadvertently. The term I intended to use was very different. I meant the dazzling light of military glory. I was not aware, until the Senator informed me, that I had used the word flickering.

Mr. FOOTE—Well, sir, dazzling is the word then. I am not sure that this helps the case much. If the glory of arms is dazzling, why then, we infer that there is nothing substantial in it, but it is altogether delusive. Sir, it is not my business to advocate the claims of military men to high civil stations on account of their military distinction alone. Nor shall I seriously interfere in this matter at all; but, whether General Taylor's glory, as one of the officers in this war, be, or be not, either flickering or dazzling, fading into extinction or merely delusory, I feel bound to say a few words in vindication of this commander, against the peculiar advocacy which the Senator from North Carolina has thought proper, on the present occasion, to originate in his behalf. He asserts that the movement of General Taylor to the Rio Grande, brought on the war; and he further says, that General Taylor is not at all responsible for the movement. Indeed! General Taylor not responsible?—Why, it is one of his chief glories in the war, that he is responsible. The movement was necessary; he perceived the necessity of approaching the Rio Grande; did advance to it—and lo! the collision of arms. The whole correspondence of General Taylor with the government is of the same import, and is all alike calculated to fix upon him the chief responsibility of the movement, and secure to him the glory of having acted with singular acuteness, energy, and good sense at this delicate crisis.

[Here the Senator read from various documents in maintenance of what he had asserted, and then proceeded as follows:]

Sir, no man can examine this correspondence between General Taylor and the Secretary of War, without being perfectly satisfied of these facts:—1. The administration entirely confided in his judgment and energy, and designed from the first, to endow him with an ample discretion as to his movements on the south-western frontier. 2. That every movement in the direction of the Rio Grande was taken, either upon his own judgment, in the absence of special instructions from Washington, or in obedience to instructions founded upon his own previous advice; and 3d. That there was not one of these movements, from first to last, from the location of his troops on the west bank of the Nueces up to the earliest battle with the enemy, which he did not execute with great alacrity, and as there is good reason to believe, with a full conviction that what he was doing was necessary to the honor of his country, and to his own personal fame. And now, when the glorious battles of Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, Monterey, and Buena Vista have been fought, when General Taylor's fame and popularity are placed beyond question, by his conduct upon those immortal fields of bloody and terrific strife, I must in regard it as one of the most illiberal, unfair, and (but for the respect which I bear certain gentlemen here, I would say,) unmanly and contemptible efforts I ever heard of in my life, to shuffle him, by sly device and quibbling sophistry, out of all the responsibility of those acts, without which, he would never have been, as he is, his country's pride, and the world's admiration. Sir, so decided are my opinions on this subject, that as much as I admire Gen. Taylor, (and I do so as highly as any one in the republic, out of the pale of those who are struggling to make political capital out of his popularity,) so help me Heaven, if I thought, as I am far from doing, that he would give his sanction, for an instant of time, to such miserable special pleading as we have heard here from his professed friends, I should feel compelled to give up entirely my present profound respect for his character as a man of justice and magnanimity. I will not believe, sir, that were General Taylor now in our midst, he would fail to set gentlemen right on this subject, and I confidently believe that he would tell them, that he would scorn all popularity or character which was to be obtained by a resort to technical subterfuges, that would not be very respectable even in a justices court, in a case where the whole matter in controversy only amounted to some 15 shillings or less. I am almost tempted to exclaim in the language of Falstaff,

"Call you this backing your friends?"

Sir, it seems to me that, in the progress of the debate which has been going on for some days past in this body, not a small number of the topics which have been introduced and more or less strenuously urged upon our attention, have either no legitimate connection with the grave and momentous question before us, or have been heretofore, so repeatedly discussed in legislative halls, and in popular assemblies, that but little, either of profit or entertainment, could be reasonably anticipated from a renewed examination of them at the present time. I may be in error, sir, but if I do not egregiously mistake the indications of public sentiment which are reaching us every hour, there has never been more unanimity exhibited in this country, than is now displaying itself in regard to the origin, progress, and future prosecution of the pending war with Mexico. Sir, the patriotic citizens of this Republic, almost everywhere, heartily approve the whole course of the administration thus far in the management of this war, and are resolved, that it shall not languish for want of the necessary supplies, both of men and money, to ensure its vigorous prosecution. Thank Heaven, we have not yet reached, and God forbid we should ever reach, that sad period in our history as a free people, when a factious combination, any where, will be able to plunge the natal land of Washington and Jackson, of Jefferson and Franklin, into that deep and irretrievable disgrace which I fear that a few degenerate sons of heroic sires in different parts of the republic, have been for some months past laboring most assiduously to provide for us. Not yet, nor ever I trust, are we to realize those scenes so memorable in Athenian annals, when Demosthenes, whose fervid and fearless eloquence shook even the Macedonian Despot upon his throne, felt constrained by a high sense of patriotic duty to launch the arrows of his blasting invective against certain factious orators of his day, who, swayed by party feeling or the mad ambition to rule, or some motive still more inglorious, sought to get up a party in Athens opposed to timely measures of defence against the dangerous encroachments of Philip. Far from us and from our posterity, be that moment of disgrace and desperation, when an American Senator shall find it necessary to the freedom and honor of his country, to denounce any portion of his countrymen in such language as burst in lightning and in thunder from the lips of the noblest champion of Grecian liberty, when he exclaimed: "But not only is our full conviction of these facts necessary to our safety; not only is it necessary that we should resolve to take vengeance on Philip by all the operations of war; but it is equally necessary that we should prosecute with the most determined hatred, those who make harangues in his favor. Let us be strongly convinced, how impossible it is to vanquish the foreign enemies of the republic, until we punish her domestic foes—these ministers of Philip. But I appeal to Jupiter, and all our other Gods, you have neither power for such an attempt, nor inclination. For to such excess are you arrived, either of infatuation or frenzy, (I am unable to express myself) that I am frequently alarmed, lest some Demon precipitately hurry the republic to destruction; when, either for the sake of some personal invective, or invidious remark—some malignant ridicule or trivial pleasantry, you command those mercenaries of Philip to speak in your assemblies, and laugh when they are scurrilously abusive. Nor is this the severest mischief, however severe; for you have at least in part, given up the republic to their administration, and rendered it less dangerous for them to offer you the most pernicious measures, than for others to propose that counsel which concerns your interests and honor alone."

No one, Mr. President, who listened to the able argument of the Senator from Maryland, a few days since, could have avoided being forcibly struck with the peculiar cogency of that part of it which was devoted to establishing the important position that the pending war with Mexico is both just and honorable.—Perhaps I should have been still more impressed with the views of the Senator from Maryland, had I not been led, from his high reputation as a jurist and statesman, to anticipate such an effort as would comport with the peculiar dignity of his own chivalrous State, and be not unworthy of the successor in this body of the first of American orators, the illustrious Pinckney. I fear, though, that the logical artillery of that honorable Senator hardly felt to play with any decided effect upon the convictions of those most proximate to him in this chamber; among whom, if he should, perchance, have effected a conversion or two, I shall regard it as matter of special gratulation. But, whatever fortune the Senator may have had in this respect, such an argument as he has presented here will certainly not fail to receive a just appreciation at the hands of his countrymen, and the day can never by possibly arrive when he will regret the expression of views at once so wise and so noble. Long will "the star-spangled banner" of our fathers wave in triumph "over the land of the free and the home of the brave," whilst sentiments of lofty patriotism in our national councils shall attend upon the valorous achievements of our heroic armies upon the fields of a just and defensive war.

The speech of the Senator from Maryland, so far as it was in vindication of the justice and honor of the war, could scarcely have failed of its intended effect in any quarter, as it would seem to me, except where compelled to encounter that great enemy to truth, against which the venerable Senator from South Carolina, the other day, so solemnly warned us, and which he was pleased to denominate "pride of opinion." When this pride of opinion was thus, with something of dramatic emphasis exorcised by the distinguished Senator from the noble Palmetto State, I confess that I scarcely knew precisely what quality of the mental man might be probably alluded to. But I have since ascertained, from some who profess to be particularly wise in such matters, that this same pride of opinion is a morbid condition of the human intellect, brought on, most commonly, at least in understandings of a certain elevation and expansive force, by multiplied successes achieved over vigorous opponents, in the arena of logical dialadiation: That it is a status of moral being very much disrelished by those who are over eager to make proselytes, either in religion or politics, and of which those are apt to complain most dolorously when they suspect its existence in others, who, in the impartial judgment of mankind in general, are most subject to the access of the malady themselves. Now, as pride of opinion is commonly understood to be precisely "antogonistical" to what is known among practical politicians under the dread name of inconsistency, (which latter quality is quite celebrated as a grievous impediment to high civic advancement,) I am not entirely able to perceive why it might not be permitted to escape severe criticism on this side of the Atlantic, where most of our leading statesmen, unmindful of illustrious examples elsewhere, of the formal and public disavowal of opinions once ascertained to be clearly erroneous, are every now and then heard to insist, with an earnestness which is the customary attendant of perfect sincerity of heart, that though it may be quite possible for the wondrous magnet to lose more or less of its characteristic polarity, and for Phebus, himself, someof these o cold and cloudy days, in a moment of sudden caprice, perchance, to permit the regular succession of the seasons to become fatally disturbed, yet that the operative powers of their minds are not at all subject to the great law of change, which is impressed upon the whole universe besides, and that they have the happiness still, in the noon or evening of life, as the case may be, to entertain the self-same opinions, upon all the public questions which have divided parties in this their day and generation, which they adopted upon their first entrance into the tangled and thorny pathways of modern statesmanship.

Mr. President: The learned and able Senator from Maryland has made it wholly unnecessary that the administration now in power should be hereafter defended against a number of charges growing out of this Mexican war. Did I not know, that the course of that Senator had not been at all actuated by a desire to conciliate the political party with which it is my honor to hold connexion, I should thank him, in the name of those associated with me, for the seasonable and effectual relief which he has thus afforded us, and which his conscience and patriotism have forced him to afford us, from the insidious and persevering hostility of an unscrupulous press, sustained and encouraged as it is, by a furious band of unblushing demagogues, who occupy themselves night and day in traduc ng the government of their own country, and in bewailing the wrongs and sufferings of those whom they denominate, "our republican brethren in Mexico." Had a friend of the ruling administration, however elevated in point of character, and energetic in the field of debate, given utterance to many of the striking and important truths, so startingly announced by the Senator from Maryland, there is reason to believe that the work of conviction would have been scarcely consummated in the minds of many deluded citizens, who will now see that to doubt the justice and honor of this war, and all the minor points involved in this sweeping proposition, is to stultify their own understandings, and to close their hearts to all the ennobling sentiments which swell and animate the bosom of the patriot. Who will ever be unblushing enough hereafter, to deny the honor and justice of this war? Who will hereafter deny that the Rio Grande was the boundary line of Texas, before annexation, and of our country since? Who will dare to call in question the authority or policy of marching our army to the left bank of this now famous river? Who will doubt the previous determination of the Mexican government, as promulged in grave public documents, to carry on a cruel, and devastating war upon all our peaceful citizens who might at the period of intended invasion be found west of the Sabine? Who will not now perceive that a large military force had been already concentrated in the neighborhood of Matamoras, which was almost ready to light up the flames of war along our whole frontier, before the movement of our heroic army from the west bank of the Nueces? Thus might I have indulged in the language of interrogation a few days ago. Alas! We can do so no longer. Several gentlemen standing high with their party, and of deservedly respectable rank in a learned profession, have lately attempted to put the country afloat again upon the ocean of disputation. But, I trust they will forgive me for saying, what I think all save themselves must have most sensibly felt, that I could not perceive anything which fell from either of them at all calculated to weaken the force of the argument of the Senator from Maryland, as to any of the points discussed by him. These, I proclaim, so far as partisan opposition is concerned, are settled points; in the language of the law-books, res adjudicata. The arena of controversy as to all these questions heretofore so fiercely disputed, should be regarded as being now forever closed; and according to the Senator from Maryland, the President is only to blame for not having caused a larger force to march under the command of General Taylor, than that distinguished officer saw assembled around him upon the battle-fields of Palo Alto, and Resaca de la Palma. So that the President was not censurable for ordering the march to the Rio Grande, but for not discovering the intention of the enemy still earlier than he did, and for failing to assemble a sufficient body of men under the standard of our country to have at once demoralized the foe, and have caused him to abandon his hostile design forever. I am persuaded, that if the Senator had looked into this matter somewhat more carefully, he would have ascertained that there was as little ground for condemning the Executive on this score, as for ordering the march to the Rio Grande; as it is at least certain beyond contradiction, that General Taylor had full authority to procure the increase of his army to any extent which he might judge necessary, and that though he had but a small force, in point of numbers, to contend with the large army at the moment known to be concentrating upon the Rio Grande, yet his army was just as large as he desired it to be, or supposed to be at all necessary; and that he had been seasonably given the power to increase his force according to his discretion. How the admissions of the Senator from Maryland as to the justice and honor of the war, can be made to harmonize with a position afterwards taken, that though Mexico was entirely to blame, yet that the President is to blame also, and that it was the duty of the President, though commander-in-chief of our army, and bound by his oath of office as such, first to consult Congress before he sent a single order to our commander at Corpus Christi, directing him in accordance with his own views of the propriety, as antecedently expressed to the government, to place the troops under his command in an attitude which might enable them to defend the soil of our country from threatened invasion, I shall leave to the Senator himself and the country to determine. I shall not debate this point; a discussion of it, it seems to me, would be wholly profitless; and I was too highly gratified with nearly all that fell from that distinguished gentleman, to seek controversy with him upon subordinate questions. I would rather believe that any apparent inconsistency in the views of the Senator from Maryland, arose from haste and inadvertence; from a natural unwillingness to part company altogether with those who have been heretofore his political associates; or from a disposition sometimes evinced by legal gentlemen to show to those around with how much skill and adroitness they are able "to confute, change hands, and still confute." Instead of censuring the Senator from Maryland for what may have appeared to savor somewhat of illiberality and unfairness, I would prefer saying, that whilst the distinguished Senator was speaking I observed the tempestuous excitement which he was awakening, around him; and discerning in countenances wont to be serene, the signs of rising wrath, I could not help recurring to that scene of elemental conflict, so vividly portrayed by a poet of our times, when he exclaims:

> "The sky re-changed! and—new re-changed! oh night!
> And storm, and darkness, ye are wondrous strong, yet lovely in your strength
> As is the light of a clear eye in woman! Bless'd
> From pole to pole, be each recurring close
> Leaps the live thunder! Not from one lone cloud,
> But every mountain now hath found a tongue,
> And Jura answers, from his misty shroud,
> Back to the joyous Alps, who call to him aloud."

And pursuing the description a little farther, I would beg leave to say of the Senator from Maryland:

> "Now where the quick Rhone thus hath cleft his way,
> The mightiest of the storms hath ta'en his stand:
> For here, not one, but many, make their play,
> And fling their thunderbolt from hand to hand,
> Flashing and cast around: of all the band,
> The brightest through these parted hills, hath forked
> His lightnings—as if he did understand,
> That in such gaps as desolation worked,
> There the hot shaft should blast whatever therein lurked."

Sir: The President has been much complained of in this discussion, for having suggested in his second annual message, that "aid and comfort" had been imparted to Mexico in this war, by a few persons in this country who are exerting a zealous opposition to the further prosecution of hostilities. I deem this complaint wholly unfounded, and will endeavor to demonstrate it to be so.

Sir: In this age of cultivated reason, which may be emphatically called the age of moral influences, when the mind of man is every day achieving new victories, more brilliant and decisive than the old, over the serious impediments of various kinds which have heretofore obstructed its progress along the pathways of knowledge; when the matured thoughts of gifted and powerful minds, upon subjects both practical and speculative, by means of innumerable printed volumes, the newspaper press, periodicals, literary and scientific, convenient mail arrangements, steamboats and other vessels of great celerity of motion upon the water, railways and the electric telegraph upon the land, are communicated almost with the rapidity of lightning, from the closets of the learned to the toiling millions of all civilized countries under the sun; when arguments, and statements of fact, and the beautiful embellishments of poetic fancy, and the dazzling and overwhelming influence of inflammatory eloquence, are constantly finding their way to the palaces of the great and the cottages of the humble, penetrating towns, and villages, and country-places, and reaching even the most retired nooks and corners of social existence—dreadful, oh dreadful is the responsibility both to God and man, of him who perverts truth or propagates falsehood, or sophisticates for the delusion of the masses, or shows a reckless disregard of the consequences likely to be produced in the minds and conduct of others, by what he either utters as a public speaker, or throws upon paper for more extensive dissemination. There are distinguished statesmen in this country, whose speeches and letters are read with attention, and are known to wield an influence not inconsiderable among all nations where the art of printing has been introduced, and with which we have heretofore established relations of commercial intercourse. Some of these personages have been at one time members of this body; some are, perchance, bustling and noisy politicians still, who delight in frequenting the thoroughfares of social life, and in keeping their political friends in remembrance of their own peculiar merits. But there is still another class of American great men whose opinions are interesting to the world: I allude now to the Nestors or Methuselahs of party: a few of whom have retreated long since to the calmer walks of private life, but who still, through some dim loop-hole of "philosophic retiracy," occupy themselves alternately in watching the ominous and exciting fluctuations of the stock-market, or in spying out the "signs" in the political or financial sky; and who are heard over and anon, to whisper to themselves, and a few infatuated and interested votaries around them, with something perchance of doting dignity and delphic solemnity of manner commingled; "Felix qui potuit rerum, cognoscere causas." There are others, perhaps wiser still, who have chosen to bury themselves in rural solitude, absorbed it may be, in the comfortable and more primeval business of tending herds, and "mending fences," raising for market far other "stock," than that which is known familiarly on 'change, as "bulls generally of bullocks or virgin heifers," on holiday occasions; and who, every now and then, are seen emerging from their dearly prized places of repose, in order once more, if they can, to seize the direction of the understandings and sensibilities of their countrymen. Some of these personages, unmindful of the example of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts; who, when the Oregon question was under discussion in this body, for some days, and perhaps weeks, refused positively to enter into the debate then in progress, and finally declared in most emphatic terms, the obligation which he felt to be resting on his conscience, whilst the title of his country to territorial domain was undergoing diplomatic discussion, not to breathe a single syllable calling that title in question; have not hesitated, in this war with Mexico, when questions much more important than claimed the attention of the two countries; when puted territory were pouring between the two countries; when millions of money, and the most precious blood of the nation were all placed at hazard upon the issue of arms; when national honor and individual fame were both in a condition to be dangerously affected by imprudent and mischievous speaking and acting, to arrange, in the most ostentatious manner, for the fulmination of fierce and fervid harangues, denunciatory of their own country and commendatory of the enemy; at a moment and under such circumstances too, as must have made known to themselves in advance, the material fact, that almost as soon as their speeches should be delivered, they would be read in the United States, and thus serve to dispirit their own countrymen and indispose them more or less for the hard service of the tented field; would circulate in Mexico, and encourage the enemy to renewed hostilities; would be republished across the Atlantic and come back with a rebound from foreign shores, to multiply the original effect, both here and in Mexico. These gentlemen could not well avoid knowing all these things; and yet have they been wholly unmindful of them. Indeed a few are reported to have grown more furious under the just censures with which they have been visited. Will any man say now, thatthese persons were not warring against their own country? That they have not, morally speaking, joined the enemy? Well do we know the opinion and feelings of our own noble officers and soldiers on this melancholy subject. The speech of the heroic Doniphan, at St. Louis last summer; the recent statements of Wyncoop and Morgan, which we have all read in the newspapers, have administered most damning proof against these mischievous and meddlesome haranguers, and will eventually consign them one and all, if they shall not speedily exhibit satisfactory signs of a genuine repentance, to an infamy as undying as their offences, whilst unatoned for, are unpardonable, either upon earth, or in Heaven.

Hear what the heroic Col. Burnet said the other day in Philadelphia, at a dinner given in honor of him:

> He Col. Burnet could not refrain from thanking the company assembled for the compliment more eloquent and himself that it did not vainly become him to speak of the policy of the war, but he would give great weight upon in regard to the feeling in Mexico, and that in order to prosecute the war with effect, we should be united as a people. (Three cheers.) Col. Burnet said Santa Anna had prepared a document made up from speeches and editorials put forth in this country concerning the war, among which was the declaration of an American Senator that he would not vote for supplies. These things operated against us very much."

Let no man hereafter complain of the President; he told but the truth about this matter, and with a republican boldness and simplicity becoming his character and station. As our executive sentinel upon the watch-tower of the nation, he but imparted seasonable notice to his countrymen of the fierce dangers with which moral treason was rapidly encircling them. Had he not administered this warning he would have proved himself as faithless as those whose treachery he has been censured for denouncing. I will not pursue this disagreeable subject farther. I am pained at feeling it to be my duty to refer to it all. But the denunciations which have been so lavishly poured forth upon the head of the President, even in this debate, in connection with this part of his Executive conduct, has rendered it necessary that the whole truth should at last be told. I hope not to be misunderstood upon this delicate point: no one is more than myself an advocate for the utmost freedom of debate upon all public questions, consistent with the established rules of decorum and a due regard to the present safety and true honor of this great republic. And, if any one of the speakers alluded to can clearly make out the case for himself, that his country was really in the wrong, and in danger of getting more and more in the wrong in regard to this Mexican war: that his particular interposition was evidently needed in order to check the government in a career of folly and madness in which it was fast rushing to destruction, as has been alledged: and that he did really interpose with the bona fide intention of rescuing the nation from infamy and danger, either actual or impending, why then he may perchance escape condemnation for what appears prima facie to be so very censurable. But woe be to them if they fail in their justificatory proof on this point; for I tell them, and all of them, that it were better that they should never have been born, or that being born, they should have died in infancy; or that they should now have a mill-stone tied about their reverent necks and be cast into the bottomless sea, than to stand convicted before the present generation and all posterity, of having joined in soul and voice with the enemies of their country. A distinguished citizen of Kentucky, a leader of the party opposed to the Administration, said in a public speech delivered by him last summer, in the city of Philadelphia, amidst the acclamations of patriotic thousands, that "without now enquiring into the origin of the war, (I quote from memory and hope not to do injustice) it was the duty of every American citizen to give his head, his heart, and his hand to his country." The same gentleman, it is said, a short time before, in New Orleans, had expressed himself as being in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war, spoke fiercely of vindicating the wrongs of his countrymen, and actually talked about going into battle himself with the view of slaying a Mexican, or at the least, taking one prisoner. This was all very deliberately and patriotically said, and contains the strongest rebuke upon the class of men to whom I have been referring that could well be imagined. I hope the distinguished statesman and sage of Ashland has not yet changed his mind about this matter; the spirit breathed by that gentleman during the last war, and which broke in thunder upon a certain son of New England in the other wing of this capitol, for daring to oppose the then pending war with Britain, when he told him that he polluted the very carpet upon which he was treading, was the true American spirit, and is known to have awakened a hearty response from every hill and valley of the republic.

Mr. President, I do not feel that I hazard any thing in asserting that if the pages of history, ancient and modern, shall be ransacked, it will be impossible to find a case precisely analagous to the one under consideration. In fact, the only attempt which I have seen made to justify by precedent, is the case of certain distinguished orators of Great Britain during our revolutionary war, vindicating the then colonies in Parliament, and struggling to put an end to a long course of oppression and violence, in which George the Third and his ministers had involved themselves. The inapplicability of this case to the one under examination is too obvious to need more than a bare suggestion. We were then, or our forefathers were, British subjects—fellow-subjects of those who defended us, and who only defended one portion of the British nation against the wanton aggressions of another. Now, I have not yet heard any one assert that Santa Anna, Ampudia, Canales, and their myrmidoms, were our fellow-citizens; though I have certainly often heard Mexico in this debate called a sister republic. I suspect, that if gentlemen will look into this matter specially, they will find that, passing over the Athenian case alluded to, there is nothing that approximates to the conduct which I have been reprehending, in all republican history, except perhaps the single instance of opposition presented to Hannibal, touching the war which he had unauthorizedly and wickedly commenced with the Roman republic. For, it will be recollected, that Hannibal had, without consulting the Carthagenian Senate, by a deliberate breach of an existing treaty between Carthage and Rome, suddenly crossed the Iberus, pushed his vast army through Gaul, and over the Alpine heights, and precipitated it down upon Italy, almost before any one either in Carthage or Rome knew that he had yet left Spain at all. Well, Hannibal, after a series of brilliant victories over the Roman armies opposed to him, despatched his brother to Carthage to demand additional supplies of men and money of the Senate. That brother is reported by Livy to have thus expressed himself—"The nearer their prospect was of finishing the war, the more vigorous support of every kind ought to be afforded to Hannibal; for that it was carried on at a great distance from home, in the heart of the enemy's country. The consumption of money and corn was great; and so many engagements, while they ruined the Roman armies, had diminished in some degree those of the conqueror. It was, therefore, necessary to send a reinforcement, and likewise to send money for the pay, and corn for the maintenance of the troops, who had merited so highly of the Carthagenian nation."

In this moment of general exultation, it is said that Hanno, the chief of the faction opposed to Hannibal, though he knew the war to be unjust and unauthorized, and was full of anxiety as to its ultimate consequences to Carthage, acted with great dignity and composure: nor did he utter a syllable in opposition, until stung by certain sarcastic reflections which were cast upon him, he replied briefly in his own defence, and commenced his speech with these memorable words: "I should have remained silent this day, lest in a time of general joy, I might utter some expression tending to damp it." And after denouncing Hannibal and his unprincipled ambition at some length, he finally refused to vote supplies, expressly on the ground that Hannibal, who needed them, "had deluded his country with groundless hopes." Now, as I believe that the same accusation cannot be justly preferred against Gen. Scott in this case, who avows himself to be in need of the troops proposed by this bill to be sent to him, I beg leave here to observe, in addition, that whatever the necessity was at the time of Gen. Scott's demand for aid, that necessity may have been greatly enhanced since he has been directly heard from, inasmuch as we have just learned that a proposition has been brought forward lately in the Mexican Congress, having in view the raising of 10,- 000 soldiers for immediate offensive operations. That I do not misunderstand Gen. Scott's application for additional troops, will at once be obvious to all who will examine his letter, an extract of which has been read here and runs thus: "Augment the army to 50,000 men, to enable it to occupy at the same time nearly all the State capitals, and the principal cities; to drive guerrillas and other robbing parties from the great highways of trade; to seize into our hands all the revenues of the country, internal as well as external, for the support of the occupation, and to keep the central government in motion and alarm, until constrained to sue for peace." And now what say the Hanno's of the American Senate? Why, they fiercely attack the whole arrangement for augmenting the army in Mexico—assert that no more troops are needed—that Gen. Scott has not actually requested re-inforcements—and indirectly charge him with a scheme of annihilating the nationality of Mexico, though he expressly speaks of keeping the government in motion and alarm, which, both among governments and men, I have always heard heretofore to imply vitality and capability of continued existence.

Mr. President, I listened to the speech of the honorable Senator from Delaware, (Mr. CLAYTON,) the other day, with feelings of unmixed surprise and mortification. The Senator commenced by denouncing our claim to territorial indemnity at the hands of Mexico as dishonest, and even charged us with an attempt to commit the vilest robbery upon our weak and defenceless neighbor. Being but a novus hospes within this hall, I am not prepared to say whether such language is in strict accordance with what I hear so much talked about in different circles, under the name of Senatorial usage; but I take leave to say in reply, that in the first place, my mind is not able to perceive the legal analogy between territorial indemnity, obtained in a just and honorable war, (for the recognition of which I believe the distinguished Senator himself voted, and also for supplies both of men and money to aid its prosecution,) and a lawless attempt, by putting in bodily fear, to deprive an innocent and unoffending traveller on the highway, (which was the case he cited,) of his personal goods and chattels. And, second, that the implication of dishonesty against all on this side of the chamber which his words convey, if they were not indeed intended to be meaningless, will not, I fear, be regarded by the public in general as entirely in keeping with the character which I am glad to learn that the honorable Senator has heretofore sustained for courtesy and high breeding.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Will the Senator allow me to correct him? I think the Senate will bear me witness that I cast no imputation on the personal motives of any one in this chamber. That is not my habit.

Mr. FOOTE.—The honorable Senator does not deny, still, that he brought the charge of robbery against the whole democratic party—but says he intended no accusation of dishonesty. Now, how he can reconcile the charge of robbery with perfect honesty of purpose, I leave to him to explain.

Now it is certain, that where I reside, and in all the neighboring country, high-way robbery is regarded as quite a serious affair, both against law and morals, insomuch that it is uniformly punished, when the perpetrator is detected, and brought to justice, by death upon the scaffold. It would seem though that the Senator from Delaware has been accustomed to quite a different code of ethics; and that in his judgment, robbery, or the taking away of personal goods and chattels, by violence from the person of the owner, by putting him in serious bodily fear, may be in Delaware, (I hope there is some mistake about this matter though,) a very creditable, virtuous, and praiseworthy act, and the robber himself may be altogether a decent and estimable gentleman. I know that Mr. Jefferson has charged upon Mr. Hamilton, that he entertained the opinion, that it was quite possible for a man to be honest in private life, and yet practice gross corruption, in his public capacity; but I belong to a class of politicians who believe out of the heart of man, are all the issues of life; that no honest and pure minded man, is either capable of stooping to the perpetration of iniquity himself, or of giving his sanction to it in others; and that corruption in a public man, necessarily implies the existence of private dishonesty. But, the honorable Senator disclaims any design of being personally offensive, to any on this side of the chamber; and with this explanation I am bound to be satisfied. I commend the Senator to a more circumspect employment hereafter, of the terms of declamatory rhetoric.

The Senator from Delaware insists, that the troops proposed to be raised by this bill are not necessary in Mexico; and in support of this view, relates an anecdote relative to General Scott, which, it strikes me, was rather amusing in itself, and more humorously told, than calculated to reflect honor upon the commander-in-chief, whom, I certainly hold in the most profound estimation. He says, that before General Scott went to Mexico at all, in conversation with friends here, he said "give me a column of 5,000 American troops, and I will take the capital of the enemy, if it rains Mexicans for a week." I suspect there must be some mistake about this matter, as I have always understood, and have yet reason to believe, that he was supplied with a much larger force than 5,000 men, at his own request, and that all the additional troops who have gone to him since, have been sent because he stood in want of them.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I wish to say to the honorable Senator that he misunderstands what I said. I did not say that General Scott had asserted that with four or five thousand men he could take the Capital in a week, or within any other specified time. I did mention this, however—an anecdote, as the gentleman termed it:—I said General Scott had stated, when speaking of the relative prowess of Mexicans and our own countrymen, that he did believe that with a single granite column of five thousand American soldiers—to use his own expression—he could whip any Mexican force that could be brought against him, if it should rain Mexicans for a week.

Mr. FOOTE.—The Senator from Delaware was pleased to read from a newspaper, an account of some 50,000 persons not belonging to the army proper, mere attendants upon its movements, who, he says, are actually about settling in Mexico, and who, with true yankee enterprize, are already preparing to establish a railway from Vera Cruz to the city of the Aztecs, and intend also, to supply the ancient capital of Montezuma with the blessing of the Electric Telegraph; and of these things the Senator most dolorously complains. Well, indeed, I cannot join him in his solemn jeremiad; on the contrary, I had heard of all these things before, and had rejoiced over them exceedingly. I hope that American enterprise will shortly connect every city in Mexico by railways, and that the electric telegraph may speedily supply commercial communication between every important place of trade on the Pacific coast and those parts which are located on the shore of the Atlantic.

He says, that if we send ten additional regiments there, they will never come back; the country is so very delightful they will never leave it. Indeed, he says, "if you wish them to return, you will be cruelly disappointed; it will be like calling spirits from the vasty deep: they will not come when you do call them." Well, sir, if they do not come back because they shall have bettered their fortunes in Mexico, and find that they are more likely to live happily and prosperously there than in the United States, I shall certainly not bewail their new-found felicity; and if the spirits that the wizard Glendower was wont to call around him, had at any time, half as good an excuse for not obeying his summons, I am of opinion, that he should have put up with the loss of their society without complaining.

The truth is, that I have suspected for a long while, that Mexico was a sort of earthly Paradise; and I hold in my hand a book, written by a person sustaining very particular relations with myself, in which I find Mexico described in the most glowing terms imaginable; and, by way of strengthening the suggestions of the Senator from Delaware, as to its desirableness as a country hereafter to be settled by enterprising men of our own race, I will read the poetic description of Italy, by Goldsmith, which, the author just alluded to, has not hesitated to apply to Mexico.

"Whatever fruits in different climes are found,
That proudly rise, or humbly court the ground,
Whatever blooms in torrid tracts appear,
Whose bright succession decks the varied year,
Whatever sweets salute the Northern sky,
With vernal tints that blossom but to die,
These, here disporting, own the kindred soil,
Nor ask luxuriance from the planter's toil,
While sea-born gales their gelid wings expand,
To winnow fragrance round the smiling land."

The whole South will doubtless feel particularly grateful to the Senator for so seasonably and solemnly warning them against the dangers likely to arise to their peculiar domestic institutions, from the annexation of Mexico; as the Senator from Delaware was one of those special friends of the South who voted for the Wilmot proviso last winter, it cannot be at all doubted that he occupies the very best possible attitude for assuming the guardianship of our peculiar local concerns. The honorable gentleman will forgive me though, I trust, for exclaiming, in the name of one Southern State: "Timeo Danaos: et dona ferentes." With all due deference to the honorable Senator's judgment about the matter, sir, I am of opinion that it will be easy, in the event of any considerable acquisition of territory from Mexico hereafter, to reconcile all the local interests and feelings heretofore existing on the subject, upon principles which I may yet state before this session of Congress shall draw to a close.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I voted not only for the Proviso, but for all amendments offered to defeat the bill appropriating three millions of secret service money to be expended among the Mexicans.

Mr. FOOTE.—The members of this body will not fail to recollect the imposing and exultant manner in which the Senator from Delaware paraded before us, towards the close of his speech, the celebrated resolutions of 1803, providing for a re-seizure of "the place of deposit," as it was called at the time, in the island of Orleans, and supplying the President with an armed force to resist all future aggressions on the part of Spain. The resolutions, when amended, it seems, left out the proposition to seize violently "the place of deposit," and increased the military force prepared to be raised from "fifty" to "eighty thousand" "effective" men; yielding to the President full power, "whenever he should judge it expedient, to require of the Executives of the respective States to take effectual measures to organize, arm, and equip, according to law, and hold in readiness to march, at a moment's warning" all these eighty thousand effective militia, officers included," and these resolutions in their modified form, were enacted into a law, as I find, in a short time thereafter.

Now, what is the comment of the honorable Senator from Delaware upon this transaction? Why he says: "Did Mr. Jefferson raise an army to march upon and seize the territory, or to point our cannon into the windows of New Orleans, and thus provoke a conflict? Did any such spirit as that which seems to rage here with an unbridled fury, pervade the Democracy of that party? No, sir—no, sir. The love of justice had not abandoned the American bosom: the honor of the American character was still dear to American statesmen.

"Thomas Jefferson, with his friends, dropped the proposition of Mr. Ross to seize on the country on the Mississippi, sent an envoy extraordinary to join Mr. Livingston in France; and they negotiated the celebrated treaty of 1803, by which Louisiana was ceded to this country for the sum of fifteen millions of dollars. Negotiation treaty, (the Senator continues,) these were the means resorted to by the democracy of another day." I have several observations to make on this part of the honorable Senator's speech, any one of which might of itself be deemed decisive, and 1st, in the case mentioned, Spain had neither invaded our territory, nor threatened to do so. She had only refused to permit us to continue in the enjoyment of a place of deposit, for goods of produce which our citizens and others might be inclined to land upon the Mississippi and its tributaries might be inclined to land at any time upon the island of New Orleans within her territory. By the treaty of [illegible], limits, and navigation, of 1795, it had been solemnly agreed, that his Catholic Majesty would permit the citizens of the United States, for the space of three years from the date thereof, 'to deposit their merchandizes three years from the date thereof, 'to deposit their merchandizes and effects in the port of New Orleans, and to export them from thence, without paying any other duty, than a fair price for the stores;' and the King of Spain furthermore bound himself 'either to continue this permission, (if he found, during the three years specified, that it was not prejudicial to the interests of Spain,) or, if he should not continue it, then to assign to said citizens of the United States, on another part of the banks of the Mississippi, an equivalent establishment.' On the 16th of October, 1802, Juan Ventura Morales, the Spanish Intendant of the Province of Louisiana, issued a decree, which, in violation of said Treaty of 1795, prohibited the bringing in or depositing American merchandize within the limits of the City of New Orleans, and not against equivalent establishment, mentioned in the Treaty, elsewhere upon the banks of the Mississippi. Among the documents then submitted by the President of the United States to Congress, was one from William E. Hulings, some time before appointed Vice Consul of the United States at New Orleans, two from William C. C. Claiborne, Governor of the Mississippi territory, and a third from James Garrard, the Governor of Kentucky. Mr. Hulings announces to the Governor of the Mississippi territory the fact, that the decree of the Spanish Intendant, already described, had been posted up in the City of New Orleans, on the 18th of October; states that 'the port of New Orleans is shut against foreign Commerce, and not against foreign Commerce only, but against the American deposit in this city. No mention is made,' he says, 'of any other place appointed for a deposit.' Governor Claiborne's letters, one to the Spanish Intendant, and the other to Mr. Madison, testify high indignation at the faithless conduct of the Spanish government; and he says to the Secretary of State: 'This late act of the Spanish government at Orleans, has excited considerable agitation at Natchez and its vicinity. It has inflicted a severe wound on the agricultural and commercial interests of this territory, and will produce no less injurious to the whole Western Country.' The Governor of Kentuckey, in his communication to the President of the United States, under date November 30th, 1802, says: 'The citizens of this State are very much alarmed and agitated; as this measure of the Spanish government will, if not altered, at one blow cut up the present and future prosperity of their best interests by the roots. To you, sir,' he continues' they naturally turn their eyes, and on your attention to this important subject, their best hopes are fixed.'

This, then, is the history of the affair. Mr. Jefferson says in his annual message of 1803, anterior of course to the introduction of resolutions by Mr. Ross: "previously," that is to say, previously to the period of excitement on the subject, "a proposition had been authorized to negotiate for the purchase of Louisiana from Spain," which proposition was then pending. Spain had sometime before ceded to France the whole country, then called Louisiana, but had not yet relinquished actual possession of the same. Whilst the temporary occupancy existed, the right of deposit was discontinued by Spain, which she had a clear right to do, under the treaty of 1795; but she had failed to "assign the equivalent establishment," as she was bound to do. This was hardly just cause for immediate hostilities; yet Congress authorized the creation of an extensive military establishment, and gave the fullest discretion to the President on the whole subject. No warlike movement, it is true, was immediately made by Mr. Jefferson. But why? Because he had then a negotiation pending with Napoleon, (not with Spain at all,) for the purchase of the whole country. The Senator from Delaware will now easily perceive doubtless, that there was no necessity for "pointing our cannon at the windows of New Orleans" at all. The honorable Senator will scarcely now himself contend, that there is really any analogy between the two cases under review. But he will allow me to tell him, I trust, in a spirit of unalloyed kindness, that the number of errors which he has committed in connexion with this affair is really surprising. He appears to think that Ross's resolutions proposed to "seize on the country on the Mississippi." Why, this was not the case. They only proposed "to take immediate possession of such place or places in the said island or adjacent territory, as the President might deem fit and convenient for the purpose of deposit." Nothing more. This, the Senator will see at once, by a re-examination of the resolutions. And why was this proposed? Simply because the original "place of deposite" had been discontinued, and no equivalent establishment assigned." What the honorable Senator means by talking about pointing cannon at windows in New Orleans, I am not able to divine. He surely does not mean to cast censure upon the officers in command at Fort Brown. But it really looks very much like it. The Senator will not find it a very easy matter to fix the responsibility of pointing the cannon at windows in Matamoras, upon the President or Secretary of War; for I am positively assured that no precise orders on this particular point ever emanated from Washington.

But what if I open to the Senator a fact or two more in regard to Mr. Jefferson and the democratic party of that time, in order to enable him to appreciate the almost Jackson-like energy of that high-souled executive? Spain publicly protested against the cession of Louisiana to the United States by France; and her citizens bordering on Louisiana and Mississippi had committed various aggressions upon our population.

Mr. Jefferson refers to these acts of violence in his annual message of 1805, thus:

"Inroads have been recently made into the territories of Orleans and the Mississippi. Our citizens have been seized, and their property plundered in the very ports of the former, which had been actually delivered up by Spain: and this by the regular officers and soldiers of that government. I have, therefore, found it necessary to add to our forces on that frontier, to be in readiness to protect our citizens, and to repel by arms any similar aggressions in future."

The Senator from Delaware has referred us to the pure times of Jeffersonian democracy, and would have us to understand that Mr. Jefferson and the democrats of his time were a particularly gentle and forbearing body of men, and that they especially evinced this temper and disposition towards Spain; and the Senator recommends in a very solemn and imposing manner, to us of this generation, their example and precepts. He seems particularly struck with Mr. Jefferson's preferring, in the instance of Louisiana, negotiation to war—negotiation by which so much valuable territory was to be peaceably acquired. I am charmed to hear that the Senator would have been a territorial annexationist in 1803, had he acted then as a politician, and hope that he may yet abandon the no territory ground upon which his party have now fairly pitched their political tents for the campaign of 1848.

As the Senator from Delaware appears to be so much enamored of the charms of Jeffersonian democracy, I will do myself the honor of calling his attention to the letter of Mr. Jefferson, written in 1807, to our minister, Mr. Bowdoin, in Paris, which appears to me to be strikingly marked with the true democratic spirit of that period:

"Never did a nation act with more moderation than Spain has constantly practised towards us; and it has been kept on hooks off of her red now, it has been ready out of respect to France, and from the calls we set to the nobility of France. We expect, therefore, from the friendship of the Emperor, that he will either compel Spain to do us justice, or abandon her to us. Bread, but no mouth to be in the city of Mexico."

I imagine that by this time, the Senator from Delaware is getting a little tired of Jeffersonian democracy. He will excuse me though, I hope, for one more experiment upon his patience. In a letter written by Mr. Jefferson, in 1789, to A. Stewart, Esq., he uses the following language:

"I learn from an expression in your letter, that the people of Kentucky think of separating, not only from Virginia, (in which they are right,) but also from the Confederacy. I own I should think this a most calamitous event; and such a one as every good citizen should set himself against. Our present federal limits are not too large for good government, nor will the increase of votes in Congress produce an ill effect. On the contrary, it will drown the little dissensions still existing there. Our Confederacy must be viewed as the nest, from which all America, North and South, is to be peopled. We should take care, too, not to think it for the interest of that great Continent, to press too soon upon the Aborigines. Time enables us to [illegible] better hands. My fear is that they are too feeble to hold them till our population can be sufficiently advanced to [illegible] piece by piece. The [illegible] of the Mississippi must have. This is all we can as yet, ready to receive."

Now, I will tell the Senator, that if he if he is a Jeffersonian democrat, I am one too; and as such, I fully believe, that our confederacy "must be viewed as the nest, from which all America, North and South, is to be peopled," and I am decidedly in favor, with Mr. Jefferson, of getting fairly and honestly, the whole continent, "piece by piece." And this I hold moreover to have been the doctrine of the democratic party always heretofore; and the opposite or no territory ground, has been that of the federalists of the olden time and of their whig successors since.

The usual hour for adjournment having arrived, Mr. FOOTE gave way to a motion to adjourn, and

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 20, 1848.

REPORT FROM THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, made agreeably to law, accompanied by a list of the names of persons who have applied for relief under the Navy Pension Laws, and whose claims have been rejected.

PETITIONS.

Mr. ATCHISON presented the petition of David H. Leeper, praying the confirmation of his title to a New Madrid location; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STURGEON presented the petition of citizens of Greene County, Pennsylvania, praying the establishment of a mail-route from Greensborough to Taylor's Store, in said county; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HANNEGAN presented the petition of Robert Piatt, praying compensation for his services as Deputy Commissary of Purchases in the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the memorial of Robert Piatt, heir and legal representative of Daniel Piatt, late an officer in the Revolutionary Army, praying to be allowed an undrawn balance of his seven years half pay; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BREESE presented the petition of the heirs of Robert Morrison, deceased, praying the confirmation of their title to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, the petition of the heirs of Josiah Bleakley, deceased, praying the confirmation of their title to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PEARCE presented the petition of James C. Wilson, a Clerk in the War Department, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOUGLAS presented the petition of G. Edmunds, jr., for himself and in behalf of the Des Moines Rapids Improvement Company, praying the assent of Congress to the making of a canal around the Des Moines Rapids, in the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. UPHAM, it was Ordered, That the petition of John McCloud, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. DICKINSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Elijah Buchanan, and the petition of Hector St. John Beetley, on the files of the Senate, be severally referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. CORWIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of George Wingard, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Eugene Van Ness, and John M. Brush, executors of Nehemiah Brush, deceased; and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

MONUMENTS TO DECEASED SENATORS.

Mr. HANNEGAN submitted the following resolution for consideration.

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire whether it may be necessary to adopt any measures for the future construction and preservation of the monuments to the memory of deceased members of the Senate; and also under what circumstances monuments have been so erected, and may hereafter be erected.

The resolution was ordered to be printed.

GEN. TAYLOR'S VIEWS, ETC.

Mr. BERRIEN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish to the Senate, copies of the letters, reports, or other communications which are referred in the letter of General Zachary Taylor, dated at New Orleans, 28th July, 1847, addressed to the Secretary of War, and which are so referred to as containing the views of General Taylor, previously communicated in regard to the line proper to be occupied at that time by the United States.

Mr. CALHOUN suggested a modification by adding the words:

And any similar communication from any officer of the army on the same subject.

Mr. BERRIEN.—The honorable Senator from South Carolina suggests an amendment to the resolution which I am perfectly willing to accept.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the resolution by unanimous consent.

Mr. CASS.—I would rather, for my part, that the resolution should lie over. It seems to me exceedingly sweeping in the terms, calling for the views of all the officers, from the highest to the lowest. I do not know what particular information it refers to, but the communication of some of it may be highly improper, and it gives no discretion to the Executive to withhold it, if, in his opinion, its publication would be inconsistent with the public interests.

Mr. BERRIEN.—In regard to calls for communications from other officers, it is a modification of the resolution which was proposed by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, and which I have accepted; but, of course, he will explain what he proposes by the amendment. In regard to the discretion of the Executive to withhold such information as he may think the interests of the country require should be withheld, I presume that he has the power to exercise that discretion at all times; but I have no sort of objection to add to the resolution a proviso "if not inconsistent with the public service." All that I desire is to know what is the purport of the letter. However, if the Senator from Michigan still insists that the resolution shall lie over, of course I must acquiesce.

Mr. CASS.—Do I understand the Senator to say that he accepts the amendment.

Mr. BERRIEN.—Certainly. The chair will be good enough to add the ordinary qualification.

The following was added: "unless he be of opinion that a communication of the same be inconsistent with the public interests."

Mr. CASS.—I move that the resolution be laid upon the table for the present.

Mr. BERRIEN.—The resolution lies over, as a matter of course if the Senator objects to its consideration now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The Senate has already unanimously agreed to proceed with its consideration. The question now is, on laying the resolution on the table.

Mr. BERRIEN.—On that question, if it be intended to dispose of the resolution by laying it on the table, I must ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. CASS.—I have no disposition, as far as relates to myself, to prevent a vote of the Senate being taken upon the resolution at some future day. I merely desire that it shall be laid over for the present.

The motion was adopted.

JESSE E. DOW.

Mr. DICKINSON submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That Jesse E. Dow be admitted to a seat in the Reporters' gallery from which he was excluded by an order of the Senate of 16th March, 1846.

ADJOURNMENT.

A motion was made that when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next; upon which the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered.

Yeas,	.	19
Nays,	.	28
Majority against the motion,	.	9

So the motion was not agreed to.

ILLINOIS RAIL ROAD.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. DOUGLAS asked, and obtained leav to bring in a bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way and a donation of public lands, for making a rail road connecting the Upper and Lower Mississippi with the chain of Northern Lakes at Chicago; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. ATHERTON asked, and obtained leave, to bring in a bill supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the better organization of the Treasury, and for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue;" which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

RETIRED LIST FOR THE ARMY.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to increase the efficiency of the army by a retired list for disabled officers; which was read and passed to the second reading.

FOREIGN MAILS.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the transportation of the mail between the United States and foreign countries;" which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. NILES said that he was instructed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to report this bill for the better regulation of our foreign mail service. It was probably known to Senators that our mail to Southampton and Bremen, had encountered difficulties in England, from the illiberal and unjust policy of the British government. All letters conveyed in our mail, to be left at Southampton, not only for England but for France and other countries in the south of Europe, intended to be sent from Southampton to Havre in France, were subjected to a postage of twenty-four cents. So unfriendly was the conduct of the British authorities, that instead of permiting the letters conveyed in our mail to go to and from England without postage, as we permit the letters conveyed to and from this country in their mail, they subjected the letters conveyed in the United States mail to a higher rate of posttage than letters conveyed in private vessels. By their law, eight pence is the postage on letters to and from Great Britain to the United States. This is the general rate. But to discourage and undoubtedly in hopes to break up our mail line, the government increased the postage on letters transmitted in our mail to one shilling, or twenty-four cents, equal to our own postage. This proceeding subjects letters transmitted in the American mail to forty-eight cents postage, whilst those in the British mail pay but twenty-four. It is evident that our mail cannot compete with the British lines under such circumstances. This bill subjects letters brought in British or other foreign mails to twenty-four cents postage, to counteract the operation of their law, and also provides for regulating the transmission of letters to and from the United States to all foreign countries.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of David Whelply, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Samuel W. Bell, a native of the Cherokee nation, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

INSTRUCTIONS TO GEN. SCOTT.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. MANGUM, on the 19th instant:

[illegible]

Mr. CASS inquired whether the usual clause referring the disclosure to the Executive discretion was contained in the resolution: and if not, he suggested that it should be there.

Mr. MANGUM.—I have no objection, sir, if the Senator desires it.

The question being about to be put on the adoption of the resolution as modified

Mr. CASS suggested that it would be better to let the resolution lie over till to-morrow.

Mr. MANGUM. I am extremely unfortunate, sir. I cannot please the gentleman in any way. The resolution which I presented the other day was drawn, as I then stated, with a due regard to that official decorum which has always been observed towards the Chief Magistrate of the United States. I proposed to insert the usual qualification, if in his opinion the same may be communicated consistently with the public interests. It was objected to. I afterwards inserted an amendment, that the resolution might be answered either confidentially or otherwise. That necessarily excluded the latter clause, because I suppose the principle will not be affirmed here, particularly when sitting in another capacity, that any thing that is necessary to enlighten us in regard to any matter pending before us, which may be in the possession of the Executive—which can be taken by us confidentially, only if the Executive chooses to give it to us in that way is not a part of Executive business, which we are as much entitled to as the Executive himself. I say, too, that as legislators, we ought, unless there is some particular reason which makes it improper that it should be communicated to the public, to be put in possession of the fullest information. However, in this respect I endeavored to restrict the call for the communication which might be covered by the resolution, and simply asked to be informed if an order had been issued from the Executive or War Department to the general commanding-in-chief in Mexico, directing him to overrun all Mexico, if instructions to that effect had emanated from the War Department or from the Executive department; and if so, we desire to see those instructions simply as to that point—and restricted to that point. If there are other matters of a general character which it may be deemed improper to give to the public, let the information be confined to that point solely. I do not desire to have the information in all the ramifications into which it may be pursued, but simply in regard to this point. The point is this, did an order to the general-in-chief issued from the Executive or War Department, directing him to cover the whole of Mexico, or to take possession of all the strong points. If this be the case, then I desire to know the opinion of the general-in-chief in regard to the extent of the military means necessary to effect that object. It is particularly, vastly, important in regard to these thirty regiments, that are asked for in addition to the military force already authorized by law. And, sir, who are the best judges of the extent of the military means necessary in any of these military movements? General Taylor and General Wool, in one line of our defences, are unquestionably much higher authority that can be derived from any other source, either in this country or out of it. In regard to the other division of our forces, sir—those in the city of Mexico, and on the line between that city and Vera Cruz—where is there authority to be found higher than that of Gen. Scott? There is none, sir. And I believe the inclination of Gen. Scott is to ask ample means for the accomplishment of the object which he seeks to attain. I think, sir, that he will not risk the safety of his army, nor will he risk his exalted military reputation in embarking upon an enterprise without the means which will enable him to accomplish what he undertakes. I therefore take it for granted that he asks for the amplest means; and if the means asked for by him will not amount to so much as the thirty regiments, I think it will be an unanswerable argument against the application of the Secretary of War for these regiments. Sir, I desire to extract nothing that ought to be withheld. I desire to ask for nothing that will embarrass the Executive, or in any way complicate our relations with Mexico. There is no such purpose. I desire two objects, which must be apparent to the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I desire first to know the scope and extent of the Executive purposes on this subject; I have a right to know them, and the country has a right to know them; and after having ascertained the extent and scope of the Executive purposes, I desire to ascertain the extent of the means necessary to accomplish those purposes. Knowing these things, there will not be much difficulty in forming a decision as to the course which we ought to take when we come to vote upon the bills which are presented to us for increasing the forces. I feel very sure that there is an over-sensibility—a sort of tender-footedness, if I may use such an expression, in regard to marching up to the point, and conveying direct information, on the part of the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs—I mean it in no offensive sense—a sort of skittishness, sir, which is not, I think, what we have a right to expect. If the gentleman desires to make the resolution entirely decorous by adding the ordinary clause of qualification, a proposition of that sort will be acceded to with great pleasure on my part.

Sir, I have not seen within the halls of one or the other of these Houses of Congress for many years anything even approaching to such a degree of sensibility as seems now to be felt by the honorable Chairman of the Military Committee, as if we were to sit here with resolutions on our table asking only for that which already belongs to history, and the communication of which might be regarded very much as a matter of course, without adopting them! Is it intended that we shall not have the information which will enable us to act understandingly? I hope not, sir, for the sake of the spirit of our institutions, for the sake of this Executive's sense of right, I hope it may not be even implied, that no decent investigation shall be permitted, that no light shall be afforded us

Mr. CASS.—I disclaim entirely, any tenderness on this side of the Chamber with regard to an examination of the policy of the administration in the prosecution of this war. The tenderness which we feel has reference to the rights of the country. We do not wish any information to go out from the Departments which would be useful to the enemy. That is the only motive which influences us. We are perfectly willing, and I for one am anxious, that every proper information should be spread before both Houses of Congress; but as I said the other day and beg to repeat now, the honorable Senator must be himself aware, that there are many things which a wise and discreet government will not disclose in the face of the enemy.

Mr. MANGUM, (in his seat.)—We do not want that.

Mr. CASS.—If we are "tender-footed", then, it is for the country. But the honorable Senator says, that he desires this information for two purposes; first, in order to ascertain the objects of the Executive, and, second, the opinions of the Generals in command. I hope that the Executive will communicate fully to the Senate and to the House the whole objects it has in view. I hope that the Executive will say in so many words, that its object is, in any circumstances to conquer Mexico.

Mr. MANGUM, (in his seat.)—To conquer Mexico?

Mr. CASS.—I repeat, to conquer Mexico.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—The whole?

Mr. CASS.—The whole, but not to hold it all. To conquer Mexican injustice—to conquer Mexico until she seek a fair and honorable peace—and I hope that the Executive will carry on its operations in every part of the Mexican country till that object be accomplished. If I know my countrymen, they will sustain the President in doing so. That I take to be his purpose—and the manner of obtaining that object must be determined by the Executive in consultation with military men who understand the country and the situation of the Mexican government. I do not profess myself to know the country, and do not speak ex cathedra on the subject. I believe it would be proper to communicate all important facts relating to the general operations of the campaign, withholding those which relate to the numbers, material, and destination of the troops, with other information which might be useful to the Mexican government. With this exception, I believe that every thing else had better be laid before Congress and the public. I do not believe the Executive has any secrets to withhold. I have no doubt that General Scott acted under full instructions from the government, though I do not know the fact. I do not doubt it, because no commanding general in the circumstances in which he was placed, would so act without the instruction—expressed or implied—of his government. And the order he issued is just such an order as, in the existing state of things, an American general should have issued. These are to go forth to the army and the enemy, and are to be followed by prompt and vigorous execution. With these impressions, if the honorable Senator from North Carolina will permit a clause to be inserted in his resolution allowing the exercise of Executive discretion in this case, in order to withhold such information, if any there be, as might be useful to the enemy, I would vote for his motion.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I do not know, sir, that during the whole period of my service here, I have ever witnessed more jealousy with regard to calls for information, than has been exhibited on the present occasion. The Senator who has just taken his seat does not believe that the Executive has a single secret in relation to this war that he desires to withhold, and yet he is signalized by the continual opposition which he makes to every appeal to that department of the government for information. That Senator may well be a little sensitive under the application of the term "tender-footed" upon this subject. For, certainly, he has manifested a high degree of readiness upon all occasions to question and scrutinize very closely any, and every resolution offered, merely for the purpose of enquiry and information. Now, why is this? Here is a great subject, upon which we are legislating—a question of peace and war—of raising armies; and when we ask for the opinions of our military officers—who are engaged in the war, and are acquainted with the country in which the war is carried on—on this great question, it is treated as though it were a State secret, and we are not permitted to appeal to the Executive department for information, or communications received from these officers. This is most strange and unaccountable. We are subjected to a sort of trial by the ordeal here, and made to walk blindfold over burning red-hot-iron. We want light to guide us. We want all the information that the government possesses, and are we not entitled to it? Talk about secrets, and the importance of keeping them! Sir, this has a very diplomatic sound—there is a tinkling of wisdom in this sort of governmental art of keeping secrets! We are to carry on war by keeping secrets!

No, sir. The world has long since come to regard secrets according to their true value. There are no secrets but those not worth keeping, in this world, and the whole idea of keeping secrets is a sort of mystery, with which little governments surround themselves for the purpose of obtaining a coloring—a complexional dignity. There is no worth in them. The people—Congress—have a right to know everything concerning the projects of the Government and the purposes of this war—everything of the least importance. You may keep secret things of no consequence. If you employ an agent, or a spy, or a mercenary, keep his name secret, in God's name—if you have such an one in your employ; but if the information relates to public affairs—to anything which interests the people of the United States—any public political aspect and point of view—they have a right to know it. They have set up no department of this Government for the purpose of keeping knowledge, wisdom, and information a secret from them. I know there are limits prescribed by prudence, and will recognize them when a case is made out. But this is the stereotyped argument employed on every application for information: "Oh! there are some things which every government must keep secret"—and therefore the Government must keep everything secret! The gentleman is willing to enlighten us with his information, but he does not want to enlighten the Mexicans. What an argument! Enlighten the Mexicans—give information to our enemies—when we ourselves are walking in darkness here, not knowing what our own functionaries think we ought to do! To refuse to give it to us, and say they refuse it out of kindness and charity to us, lest it should operate as information to the Mexicans, when the very gentleman who makes use of this argument proclaims that he wants it distinctly understood that he is for conquering Mexico! What other secrets can you have? What secret will the gentleman pretend to have? Does our success depend upon secrets? Is that the way to carry on the war, or to facilitate the prosecution of the war? Our enemies have learned by this time that we are strong-handed enough to work our pleasure, be it what it may. The general orders issued in the heart of Mexico till them that we intend to take and occupy San Luis Potosi—that we intend to take possession of Zacatecas, and that if that phantom of a government is allowed to sit longer at Queretaro, it is simply by our toleration of it. What is the secret? That you intend to go by this or that road? Where is the mighty secret in that? or where is the secresy in saying that you were to take possession of their cross-roads in Mexico, which the gentlemen seems to think so exceedingly important to the success of your military operations?—He himself has given the Mexicans all information about it. They have all the information that he has been pleased to communicate to us. But what has Gen. Scott or Gen. Taylor communicated to our own government as to the most proper course to be pursued? That is what we want to know? It is all idle to talk of keeping secrets, lest Mexico should know them.

The gentleman from Michigan is I think making considerable progress on this subject. I understood him to say when the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina against destroying the nationality of Mexico were before the Senate—that they presented a proposition with which every one must agree. The other day he thought we might swallow Mexico whole and not be the worse for it. Now he says and wishes it distinctly to be understood that he goes for the conquest—the entire total conquest of Mexico. I think then that he is making some progress. Well he tells us what we are to do with Mexico—swallow her, as he said whole? That would I think makes us a very mis-shapen sort of republic if we could perform that operation? But we are now "warring for peace." Well, Mr. President, it seems to me that we have, as I said, already conquered Mexico. Where is her army? Where her treasure? Where any of the material of war with which she could contend against us? She is powerless and disarmed, and stands unresisting before you, and you talk of keeping secrets from her, of keeping secrets from us lest this poor down-trodden republic shall have some light shed upon her mind as to the further proceedings which we intend to adopt in relation to the prosecution of this war! This argument cannot satisfy the Senate or the country. It ought not to satisfy the country. You have got peace in effect now. Mexico is at this moment at your feet, and subject to your dictation. The general orders from your commander issued to your armies, show that he is intending to spread them over that country, making them a sort of armed collectors of revenue. That seems to be the employment which now remains for your armed forces in Mexico. Is she not conquered when she has no army left—no government left—no materiel of war, no money no credit? When a nation is thus depressed and disarmed, what is wanting to her conquest and subjugation? She is conquered, sir, and every body will acknowledge it in six weeks from this time, as I vetily believe. And this war, and this country, and this peace, will become a proper subject for the legislative department! I hope to see that question come speedily, and then it will depend upon the wisdom and discretion of Congress on what terms and in what manner it is to be determined—whether Congress will declare that we shall swallow Mexico whole, in the figurative but strong language of the honorable Senator, or what else we shall do—what member of her we shall swallow—whether a leg, or an arm, or the head—in what manner we shall address ourselves to the new species of cannibalism prescribed to the American people. All this we will have determined by Congress. Its appetite will regulate us in what we are to do. This, however, is going beyond the question; and I have been led into these remarks by those to which I am attempting to reply. The question is on obtaining from the President of the United States that information which is necessary for our intelligent action. Is this war to shut up these departments and restore the ancient time when diplomacy dwelt in darkness, or when the arcana of State were to be kept within the inter penetralia of the temple where the people with unclean feet had no right to go—where the people had no right to meddle with the mysteries of state? These days have passed by, and I hope and trust that the Senate will find no sort of objection to the passage of this resolution. If the gentleman desires the clause allowing the exercise of discretionary power to the President may be added. If there be any little secret spot—any plague spot—in all the communications upon this subject, it can be kept back. Give us only what is useful to us. That is all that is wanted—that is all that is asked for. But it seems that gentlemen are not willing—I need not say gentlemen—the honorable Senator is not willing that we should be be permitted even to interrogate the President. I hope we may be allowed to interrogate him, and that we may have the information.

Observe how this thing operates. Amongst the information called for there is embraced a letter from General Scott and that is communicated to the honorable Senator himself, and a part of it is read to the Senate. Now he knows that it is contrary to all legal rules of documentary evidence to read only a part. We have a right to the whole. Is the right to be circumscribed in this way?—a portion given to one member and a portion to another, whilst those who are blest with the full blaze of day are to have the whole of it; the great body of us being left to wonder in ignorance of those great subjects which demand our most solemn consideration and responsible action? It cannot be so, sir. The gentleman, if I understand aright, has read an extract from a letter. We insist if the letter can be confided to the head of a committee it may be confided to the Senate, either in confidence or not, as the President pleases. I have no feeling of captiousness upon this subject, and not the slightest personal feeling. I think it is the right of the Senate to have this information, and that if access to the Executive departments by the legislative bodies is to be precluded, if understand aright, his read an extract from a letter. We insist if the letter can be confided to the head of a committee it may be confided to the Senate, either in confidence or not, as the President pleases. I have no feeling of captiousness upon this subject, and not the slightest personal feeling. I think it is the right of the Senate to have this information, and that if access to the Executive departments by the legislative bodies is to be precluded, if this way, we must become nothing but the shadow of a legislature. It is altogether contrary to former practice to refuse this enquiry. Few indeed have been the instances in which such a resolution has been opposed, and never upon the vague generalities now put forward.

Mr. CASS.—One word, Mr. President. I cannot suffer myself to be misunderstood by the exertion of the great talents of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, nor by his manner, always imposing, though often sarcastic. I must say, that the honorable Senator has exhibited great ingenuity in putting his own construction upon my meaning. I wish now to give my own. In the first place, the extract read to the Senate was all that related to the subject. The government determined upon a certain plan of operation, and to carry that into effect asked for fifty thousand men. General Scott has submitted one three or four plans without giving the preference to one. The government had adopted one of these plans and asked for the necessary legislative measures to carry it into effect. All that relates to this plan was contained in the extract that I read, and the Senate was thus put in possession of the views of the government and the commanding general on the topic which occupies their attention. All else was, in fact, but speculations. Well, now, the honorable Senator from Kentucky seems to think that I see a secret in everything, whilst he sees a secret in nothing. The subject is exceedingly clear. I did not say that there were any secrets at all involved in this call. All I maintained was the great principle in all governments, that during the time of war caution was to be exercised in giving publicity to specific plans of the campaign. In that connection there must be secrets.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, (in his seat.)—Certainly there may be.

Mr. CASS.—What sort of war would it be in which there were no secrets? War is a game played by intelligent and experienced men, not by men who show their hands to their adversary. The thing is impossible. No such war has ever been waged successfully, and no such war will be waged so long as men are compelled to resort to wars. No secrets! They are dishonorable! Everything should be known! And a commanding General who sits down before a city, must begin by sending to his opponent with the summons to surrender, a true abstract of his force, of his munitions of war, and his means of subsistence! And from day to day this must be renewed with the morning report, because there should be no secrets. And when he proposes to make a movement, with the same abhorrence of secresy, he must send in with a flag of truce, his projet of operations—when he will march each day—where he will encamp each a night—and what he proposes to do—and with what amount of men and materiel. This may all be very chivalric, but it would not be very well received in this age of the world. No sir, there must of necessity be secrets with regard to the conduct of the war. With respect to the general operations which the government directs, I see no objection to disclosing them.

The honorable gentleman says, that I advocated the swallowing of Mexico, and he will pardon me for saying it, but in a sneering tone he asks, shall it be done limb by limb—and, sir, would it affect digestion? Mr. President, I will not stop to dispute with the honorable Senator about words. He may talk sarcastically, of a just indemnity, of taking Mexican territory, limb by limb, and swallowing it. There are few things, however serious, which may not be turned into ridicule. It is, however, no test of truth. Mr. Jefferson spoke of the gradual augmentation of our country which he foresaw and approved, and called it extending freedom piece by piece. Now, sir, I prefer this expression of Mr. Jefferson piece by piece, to the expression of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, limb by limb. Though, if we cannot get the territory, that we are justly entitled to, without that expression, I am willing to take it limb by limb.

My allusion to this subject was in this wise. The honorable Senator from Kentucky, on one or two occasions a few days since, deprecated the absorption of all Mexico, which measure, if adopted, he considered to be fatal to this government. Now, sir, what was my remark in reference to this? Rather light in manner, perhaps, but sufficiently clear in its meaning—that this government would stand a great deal of killing; and that I did not believe even the swallowing of all Mexico would be fatal to it; though I was not myself in favor of the measure. I was satisfied with taking a reasonable territorial indemnity, if the Mexicans would cede it, leaving the subsequent relations of the two countries to be determined by subsequent events. Well, sir, I repeat again that I have no belief that if Mexican independence were annihilated to-morrow, and the whole country annexed to the United States, it would kill us.

And I believe there is nothing under heaven, which can kill this government, but the people themselves. That is my opinion of its power of vitality. Ever since I have been upon the stage of action our country has been killed by prophets of evil, crying "woe, woe, to Jerusalem." Cassandras predicting a crisis to day and destruction to-morrow. Yet we have gone on from increasing to increase. And where our final boundaries are to be, He who controls the fate of empires alone can tell. I did not suppse that the honorable Senator from Kentucky could misunderstand me, or have converted a figure of speech, such as swallowing a nation, into an argument to be refuted by a serious analogy to the human body. War and conquest are means to attain an end, and they are controlled in their general operations by the law of nations. They are to be directed by the Executive government, upon its responsibility, subject, of course, to the supervision of Congress, with the great object, in the present instance, of making a speedy and honorable peace with Mexico. The honorable Senator says that we are now, "in fact" at peace. What this qualification "in fact" means, I do not know. The Mexican government is resisting; a native Senator sometimes travelling from place to place, still resisting, still unable or unwilling to do us justice. When Mexico is willing to do us that justice which you, Mr. President, and I believe all this side of the Senate believe, and some portion on the other, to be due to us, then, and not till then, we may relax our exertions—as we shall have conquered a peace. But I repeat what I before said, that the longer Mexico continues her obstinate rejection of reasonable indemnity, and the greater the exertion she compels us to make, the greater will our demands, and the heavier her losses. What we would have accepted last year, or even the commencement of the present campaign, we may well refuse now; and what we would accept now, we may well refuse after a few months. And how much the public sentiment of this country may demand a year or two years hence, if the war continues so long, I do not pretend to predict. We may have to make the great experiment, so dreaded by the Senator from South Carolina, and the Senator from Kentucky, and annex the domains of Mexico to our own. This is the penalty which national injustice has often been called to pay, and which Mexico may be preparing for herself.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I know that in time of war in the conduct of armies and campaigns, the general does not communicate to the enemy the route by which he intended to march, or the plan which he has adopted for attaining his objects. But the information now sought for, the Executive is of an entirely different character. The argument of the honorable Senator, it is evident, is one to which he has been driven by the necessity of his case; and I say again, although there may be secrets, and certain circumstances what it may be important to keep concealed for the time, these now asked for one net of that discription: I really wonder how the gentleman can repeat in this solemn style without a smile upon his face, the assertion that it would be dangerous to communicate this information as it would be advantageous to the enemy! As well might it have been said during the war against the Seminoles, that information should not be given lest the Seminoles might get it! Because in another state of affairs, it might be proper to withhold information, it does not follow, that anything is to be kept a secret. If, as the Senator says, the Executive has no secrets what it is not willing to reveal, why this opposition to these resolutions of inquiry? The Senator now tells us the contents of the letter from General Scott, a portion of which he read the other day. I ask if this sort of verbal information is to be communicated, instead of the official information to which the Senate is entitled? Is the inquiry of the Senate to be stifled by some gentleman taking upon himself the responsibility of getting up here and speaking for the government, and giving us what he reports as the substance of information? No. We have a right to the information in its authentic and official form, in that we may see what it contains; no more and no less. So that we have a right. I have every confidence in the honorable Senator. His statement to me personally in relation to a matter of our private confidence would be as satisfactory as any testimony, but as he will perceive is not the question now. We have a right to the official information, that our constituents may see and read it; and that it may go to them, not in the unauthenticated form of verbal communication here, but in the authentic form of a government document. He knows and perceives this; and I ask again, with great deference to the honorable Senator, and without detracting, or intending to detract, from his just and deservedly eminent station here, and in the country at large, why is it that the secrets so important to be kept, should be communicated to him standing on the same footing with us, but withheld, as sacred, from us? Is this to be a chosen body of enlightened legislators here, and another body, who, at their peril, are to follow them without information and in darkness? Will the gentleman contend for that, and does not see that to that his argument leads? He is furnished with information, and any other Senator may be furnished with information, and he is to deal it out to the Senate according to the exigency of the case, and his knowledge of that portion of light, or of twi-light, is to ensure their concurrence in the measure proposed! There is to be a great distinction of light and knowledge; and when we ask for more, we are told it may be mischievous, and may get to those to whom we do not wish to give information! This argument is of universal application. It applies equally to your call for useful information as to any other. To every inquiry, you will have the reply—"Secrets! secrets! government secrets!" All nations must have secrets—you cannot expect us to give you the secrets!—There is an impenetrable region into which the curiosity of the profane must not seek to enter!" This is, I must say, a novel doctrine, and a new sort of argument—a new sort of application, altogether, of a principle acknowledged by all in its proper place, and with its just appreciation. I hope, sir, such a doctrine is not to be sanctioned by a vote of the Senate, refusing the information asked for in the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN.—I understood the honorable Senator from North Carolina to say, that he had no objection to the insertion of the usual words in the resolution, "if not incompatible with the public interest," so as leave it discretionary with the President.

Mr. MANGUM.—I said so, sir.

Mr. ALLEN.—I shall have no difficulty then in voting for the resolution—none whatever—so far as the General Order—that has appeared in Mexico—is concerned, it is not to be supposed that any General officer under any circumstances would issue an order of that magnitude, without the authority, either express or implied, of his government. I do not suppose, therefore, that any secrets can be disclosed upon this subject. I am glad that the subject of "secrets" has attracted so much attention in this body, as I think it is always of advantage to to the interests of the country that the question of "secrets" should be considerably canvassed.—I shall therefore embrace this occasion for renewing my ancient motion for opening the doors of the Senate on all occasions, save one. But, why, sir, are we so much affrighted at "secrets" when we ought to begin by making our own acts public? It is only because a large portion of our own acts are not made public, that I am now not permitted to recur to facts which I could adduce, with overwhelming influence on the discussion of this questionof secrecy. But, sir, I shall tender my ancient resolution, and I shall test the spirit of publicity which is now displayed in words in this discussion. I believe, sir, that if every document upon file in the Department of State and in the Department of War, were this day opened to the full light of the sun, the government would be strengthened far more than weakened by the disclosure. It is rather an Executive habit than an Executive necessity; it is because the preceding Executives have done this thing that the present Executive does it. He feels himself more bound by precedent than by principles upon this subject.—His predecessors have uniformly acted upon the principle that the disclosure of some parts of the information in their possession might tend to the prejudice of the public interest. And it is upon the authority of the practice of his predecessors that the Executive acts rather than upon the existence of any secret reason for his conduct. And I am willing as far as my vote is concerned—if I could give it detached from other considerations—to vote—to let in the full blaze of the sun upon every transaction that paper contains growing out of this war. I should like myself to see the estimates made by the Generals-in-Chief, commanding those two columns in Mexico, and also their advice given to the Executive at the incipient stages of the war—advice sought because one of the parties from whom it was sought, was at the head of the American army and had therefore a right to be consulted by the Executive who is not a military man. I should like to see all these things, so that I might know to what extent any one or all of these Generals' may be responsible—I do not say for the origin of the war but for the manner in which it has been prosecuted.—Sir, I do not speak authoritatively. I am not now at the head of any committee which authorises me to go into the several departments and make inquiry in relation to these subjects. I am not charged particularly or expressly with any branch of the Senate's business, and therefore I know nothing personally as to what facts are or are not contained in the archives of the Executive department. Now, sir, upon another branch of this subject.—The honorable Senator from North Carolina who has the lead upon the question of opening the doors and admitting all the information that may be in the possession of the Executive, agrees with me upon this question, and I shall introduce my ancient resolution to-morrow, or at the next meeting of the Senate. I hope then to have the aid (so potential in all matters in which he takes part,) of the honorable Senator.—But the honorable Senator from North Carolina wants the information called for by this resolution and other information for a certain purpose. Now, what is this purpose? Why it is to know what are the political designs of the Executive in regard to the war; that is to say what are his desires as to the result of the war! Now the President of the United States is only one branch of the government of the United States. Congress is another. A leading statesman of this country, whose voice, possibly, is as potential within as it is without these walls, has laid it down as a right belonging to the two Houses of Congress, not that they should call upon the President to know what he means, but that they should express what they mean should be the end and objects of the war. Therefore, if the honorable Senator from North Carolina has any extreme solicitude upon this subject, it is of far more importance for him to know what Congress means, than to know what the President means; because the President cannot act without the consent of Congress. Now, if the Senator desires to know what Congress means to do, what object they desire to accomplish, the mode in which he can ascertain it is simply to offer a resolution declaring what Congress means shall be the objects aimed at in the prosecution of this war. It is of no consequence, sir, upon this great question to quibble about what the President may secretly design. We are told by the high authority with the gentleman and his friends, that it is the right and duty of Congress to declare what shall be the objects and purposes of this war. Let them come up to the mark, and lay before us their views.

Mr. SEVIER.—I would suggest, Mr. President, that the time has arrived for the consideration of the special order of the day.

Mr. ALLEN.—Yes, sir, I am doubtless trespassing upon the time that ought to be devoted to my honorable friend's speech. I have, however, but a few words more to say, and really I did not intend to enter at all into this discussion, but the debate seems to have spread itself out to such an extent that I could scarcely avoid engaging in it. I shall vote for the Senator's resolution when the addition is made which he says he is willing to make. I desire that addition made, because this has always been the practice, out of respect of the executive branch of the government, as, for instance, we use the word "request" when we address the Executive, and the word "direct" when we address the various subordinate departments. It has been for the purpose of expressing these views that I have trespassed upon the time of the Senate.

Mr MANGUM.—I am extremely reluctant, sir, to encroach upon the time which belongs to the honorable Senator from Mississippi, but some remarks have been made which absolutely demand some reply.

Mr. FOOTE.—It will give me much pleasure to give way to the Senator.

Mr. MANGUM.—I have very few observations to make, and they will occupy but a few moments: and I must begin by congratulating the honorable Senator from Ohio, on the advance he has made within a few days in regard to disclosing all secrets. And I congratulate the Senator from Georgia, on the prospect he has of the powerful assistance of the Senator from Ohio, upon that resolution of his, which was laid upon the table this morning, calling for information as to the communications of the commanding generals, about the period of the beginning of this war, either of advice, suggestions or otherwise.

This resolution, sir, was drawn with great care, (hastily to be sure,) and was not designed to trench on any thing that might be supposed to affect injuriously the interests of the country. But, sir, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs very properly says that many things should be withheld on account of the contest in which we are engaged. But does he mean to say that he is to be entrusted with information which we are not to be entrusted with? We want light on this subject. As one of the minority, sir, how can I look into the Executive mind and disclose the purposes which are there intended? Let the world have the information, sir, and the world will either sustain you or refuse to sustain you. I should like to know from the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs what we are to do when the conquest of Mexico is complete? If there is no government to treat with us now, what will we do with Mexico then, sir? These are important matters that involve ultimately, in my judgment, the stability of our free institutions. For one, I would like to know if the public of Mexico falls into our hands, what is to be done with it? This is the main point that I desire light upon; I do not care a fig for the views expressed to-day, farther than they relate to this point. Will the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs condescend to inform us what he means to do with Mexico after it is conquered? Will he enlighten us as to the distinct purposes of the Executive respecting her? What shall be done with this unfortunate Republic, after it falls into our hands? I think that Congress has a deep and profound interest in this enquiry. Sir, I care not a fig, as I have already said, whether this resolution passes or not, if the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in his official capacity, will only give me light on this single point. He goes for the conquest of Mexico, which, I take it, implies the annihilation of that government. How then are you to make peace? I only wish to add a single remark in reference to the honorable Senator from Ohio in regard to his "ancient" resolutions. I shall go for any additional light—for the removal of any secresy—and for the obtaining of any information that may be necessary to aid us in the discharge of our duties.

Mr. ALLEN.—Will the honorable Senator accept of the amendment?

Mr. MANGUM.—I said I would do so.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—Do I understand that the modification is made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—It is

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. FOOTE—

Mr. President: I think it must be acknowledged that this debate has been marked with peculiar rancor, on the other side of the Chamber, and that terms of scurrilous reproach have been freely indulged towards the President of the United States, equally derogatory to the dignity of this body, and to be applied to the first magistrate of this great nation, and entirely unmerited in point of fact. One gentleman has not hesitated openly to charge the Executive with falsehood, in regard to his declaration of the objects of the war; which is nothing more than a coarse version of what is reported in a paper, which I hold in my hand, to have emanated from a distinguished Senator now in my eye, at Springfield last September, about "pretexts, evasions, pretences, afterthoughts," &c., &c. Another gentleman charges false blood by inuendo, and assumes with something of peculiar grace, and certainly with more than the ordinary dramatic emphasis, to blush for the President. Another charges "disonesty," "robbery" "pillage," and "murder;" another, "hypocrisy," another a "violation of the constitution," another, "the usurping of powers properly belonging to Congress." Now, if the President be half as guilty as he is accused by honorable Senators of being, he ought, for the honor of the country, to be immediately impeached; and I a little wonder, under all the circumstances, that a great Hastings affair has not been before now gotten up; considering the lusty menaces which we know to have been thundered forth in various quarters, and the pregnant fact, that at least one member of this body is reported to have already declared that he is impeachable. I wish distinguished Senators would recollect the wise requisition of the common law, that even jurors, who only determine the facts of the case, must be majores omni exceptione; and that Justice was by the ancients painted blind, in order to indicate, that all who approached her sanctuary, should do so, free from all preconceived prejudice, and exempt from all exterior influence. I take the liberty of reminding honorable Senators, whilst indulging these suggestions, of one of the most imposing judicial scenes which is recorded in ancient annals, the trial of Lucius Cataline by the Roman Senate. The beautiful sentences with which Julius Cæsar commenced his noble speech on the occasion, contain a maxim which I fear is almost too elevated for even this Christian generation. "Omnes homines, qui de rebus dubiis consultant, ab odio, amicitia, ira, atque misericordia vacuos esse decet. Haud facile animus verum provident, ubi illa officiunt. Neque quisquam omnium lubidini simul et usui paruit. Ubi intenderis ingenium, valet. Si Lubido possidet, ea dominatur; animus nihil, valet." Now, if certain menaces which we have all heard of in regard to grave proceedings elsewhere against the first magistrate of the nation, were as honestly announced, as they have been indecently paraded before the country, there may be yet some possibility of illustrious Senators, when called on to perform a high judicial duty, with the Chief Justice of the United States presiding in this Chamber, either challenging themselves or being challenged by others on the score of incompetency to discharge the highest functions belonging to the body. I hope to witness no such painful and perplexing predicament; but if it should occur, it would perchance not be without a salutary influence in the way of example.

Mr. President: Before I conclude what I have to say upon this occasion, I feel called upon to notice, and if possible, in some degree to counteract certain views expressed a few days since by the venerable Senator from South Carolina; and, in doing so, I believe that he at least will not question my sincerity in declaring that, such is my high respect for his extraordinary powers of intellect, and his numerous virtues, that it is to me painful to differ with him in opinion on any great public question. It would certainly be my wish to remain silent, notwithstanding my dissent from his views, but that I shall be compelled by a sense of duty, to vote in opposition to the honorable Senator's profound and ingenious reasonings; and if I fail to state sound and substantial grounds for doing so, I shall incur the risk of being misunderstood by the whole country.

I understand the Senator from South Carolina to oppose the measure under consideration, on the ground that no additional troops are necessary for the attainment of any legitimate object, or for any object heretofore avowed by the Executive. He argues, that the conquest of the interior regions of Mexico has advanced so far, that, if the troops now there are not speedily withdrawn, to what he calls a defensive line, we will incur the hazard of annihilating the nationality of Mexico, and of thus failing to obtain a treaty of peace at all, for want of a valid government with which to conduct our future negotiations. Mr. President, I will not undertake to decide whether or not the Senator from South Carolina be right in supposing that Mexico is in such imminent danger of loosing her nationality. This may, or may not, be the case. It is certain that those who are best acquainted with the precise condition of things in Mexico, think otherwise. The President still continues to avow his warm desire, and confident expectation, that a treaty will yet be effected with the Mexican government, which will be, at the same time, honorable to us, and neither unjust nor ungenerous to our obstinate adversary; and such is my respect for his wisdom and thorough sincerity of heart, that I do not feel at liberty to refuse him any aid which I am capable of rendering for the eventual attainment of this long-sought object. Gen. Scott, too, seems still to calculate upon an early pacification, and has just announced a most imposing, and, as I think, most judicious plan for bringing it about; and I have too high an esteem for him, also, both as a commander and a patriot, not to feel a most decided deference for his judgment about this matter. Cui libet credendum est in sua arte, is as much a maxim in military affairs, as in the concerns of civil life; and I freely acknowledge, that the commander-in-chief in Mexico, with his extensive experience as an officer, and his familiar acquaintance with the resources, devices, and present temper of the foe, is to be presumed to enjoy a peculiarly favorable opportunity of determining whether or not we will be at all likely to succeed in ultimately conquering a peace; and so long as he seems to testify a generous confidence in his being able eventually to accomplish that for which we have been so long struggling, I should as soon do any thing else which might be calculated to put the honor of the country in danger, as refuse to vote him supplies of men and money, to any extent which may be judged necessary to the complete and early success of his operations. I can never consent for one to withdraw our army to any merely defensive line, so long as any hope of obtaining a treaty of peace may remain; nor will I consent to do so, so long as there may be a chance of practical pacification, of a nature to be relied on, independent of treaty, provided a treaty turn out to be unattainable. I cannot perceive any possible advantage which would be likely to accrue from the adoption of a defensive line; but, on the contrary, I behold manifold evils and inconveniences too obvious in themselves and too often insisted upon heretofore, in different forms, to need any special citation at this time. This defensive line project seems to be with the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, a perfect panacea for all the troubles of this Mexican war, in whatever stage of it we may be. Last winter, when General Taylor had only penetrated the States in the neighborhood of the Rio Grande, a withdrawal to a defensive line was earnestly recommended. Now we have attacked and captured the strong castles of San Juan d'Ulloa, taken Vera Cruz, Jalapa, Perote, Puebla, and Mexico, and are proceeding rapidly to seize all the remaining strong places, to possess ourselves of the public revenues, put down Guerilla warfare, and reduce the enemy to such straits as must infallibly render him in a short time altogether hopeless of being able to make further resistance; and the Senator from South Carolina, with a consistency which seems to bid proud defiance to everything like change of circumstances, is heard to exclaim, still more emphatically than before; "Why do you not fall back to my defensive line?" with this notable alteration, which the events of the last twelve months have been able alone to effect that the honorable Senator does not find it convenient to tell us now where this same defensive line of his should run; and he proposes, therefore, to convoke a council of officers to settle this important point. A strange council this would be, by the bye; as it would be composed necessarily of gentlemen, all of whom would infallibly and very promptly declare their opinion to be, that nothing on earth could be imagined more injudicious or perilous than the adoption any defensive line whatsoever. I hope not to exhibit the appearance of dogmatism on this point; but, after the most diligent inquiries which I was capable of instituting, I feel authorised to assert my belief, that it would be exceedingly difficult, if it would not be impossible, to find in the whole army, a single officer of respectably high grade, who would risk his reputation as a military man so far as to give his sanction to the adoption of the defensive line of policy recommended by the honorable Senator. But says the Senator from South Carolina, if you remain in the central portions of Mexico much longer, and especially if you increase the strength of your army there, you will break down the Central government, and destroy the last vestiges of nationality. As I before observed, this may be so, or it may not be so; but no matter what may be the precise effect of remaining in Mexico, in regard to our own municipal condition, I am of opinion, that as we marched into the country in order to achieve indemnity for the past, and security for the future, we never can honorably withdraw our troops until we obtain them both in the most unequivocal manner. And though it is true as urged by a Senator on the other side of the chamber, that we went to war for free trade and sailors rights in 1812, and came out of it in 1815, without having secured either; notwithstanding, the delay of a few months, as we now know, through the instrumentality of the battle of New Orleans, would have given us all for which we assumed hostilities; yet I can see no sufficient reason in this melancholy example of national discredit, which should induce us now to yield to the triple counsels of the yet surviving sages who negotiated the treaty of Ghent, and who are at present so happily agreed in the policy of getting out of this war with Mexico by a resignation of all the objects for which it has been heretofore prosecuted; so far even as to strike down our national flag again without further ceremony, and confess by implication at least, that we went to war unjustifiably, and have spilled blood and wasted treasure without even the appearance of decent pretence; much less of full justification.

The Senator from South Carolina thinks though, that our remaining in Mexico may, by putting an end to Mexican nationality, effectually prevent our reception of indemnity and security, through the medium of a treaty of peace; inasmuch, as though one nation may make war, it requires two to make a peace. Here I differ with him again—it requires two to agree upon a peace by treaty, but whether we get a treaty by remaining in Mexico, or not, we are certain, at any rate, of obtaining a practical pacification, accompanied with all we have demanded, and perchance more; whether Mexico shall have intermediately lost her nationality by our failure to retreat to a defensive line at a great distance from her capital, or shall have retained it.

The venerable Senator from South Carolina will permit me to remind him of the fact, that he was opposed to the invasion of Mexico last winter, at the point of Vera Cruz, in part at least because he deemed the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa impregnable; and not alone from a fear of destroying Mexican nationality; and this excessive fear as to the extent of injury which our inveterate enemy may happen to receive at our hands, I consider one of the most remarkable events in this age of misdirected philanthropy and "idle and masterly inactivity." Let me recur to the pages of classical history for a moment. Livy informs us that when Scipio Africanus proposed to the Roman Senate to enter upon his scheme of invading Africa, the aged Fabius Maximus, always a remarkably cautious man, and in whom we may well suppose that the effluxion of years had greatly cooled the fervor and diminished the hopefulness of earlier days, opposed the scheme most stoutly, and even inveighed against Scipio as a rash, visionary, ambitious young man, who was willing to expose his country to unnecessary peril, in order to gratify his morbid and eager cravings after military fame. The noble old Roman—for still Roman he was, despite his foolishness for "idle and masterly inactivity" in attempting to counteract the scheme of invasion—spoke of "the enormous expense of the undertaking; not a single harbor open to our fleet; no part of the country at peace with us; no State our ally; no King our friend; no room anywhere either to stand or advance." Well, Fabius failed in his attempt to defeat the African expedition, as a greater than Fabius did last winter in regard to the expedition to the coast of Mexico, whose complete success is now one of the most glorious pages of our history as a nation. Scipio sojourned for a few months in Sicily, as General Scott did at the island of Lobos last year; and finally landed on the African coast and strided rapidly from victory to victory, overturning in his impetuous course several large armies under Syphax and Hasdrubal; and finally prepared to strike a fatal blow at the vitals of Carthaginian nationality. Now, what would have been the surprise of his own country, and the regret of all posterity, had Fabius Maximus, in his moment of exultation and hope, exclaimed in the Roman Senate-house, as we have heard in this debate, that he always had thought this expedition would end in misfortune, and that now it must be apparent to all, since Carthage was actually about to loose her nationality, and would be therefore unable to appoint commissioners after a while to make a treaty of peace. This melancholy page in Roman annals has not descended to us, and the war with Carthage was ultimately closed on terms that the Romans themselves, so far as I have heard or believe, never complained of. There was no talk in the Roman Senate such as we have had here now, that to deprive Carthage of any portion of her territory, by way of indemnity, would be as bad as highway robbery, and that a treaty of peace even for that purpose would be a mere nullity, on account of its having been extorted by force; as more than one of the profound jurists on the other side of the Chamber have not hesitated to avow.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The honorable Senator from Mississippi has misconceived my views. It was my opinion that the practicability of taking the Castle from all that I then heard was very justifiable. My impression was that it would be very difficult, if not impracticable, to have carried it by direct attack by slup—but I never doubted that it might be taken if Vera Cruz was first attacked by land;—for such an attack, if successful, would almost necessarily have been followed by the surrender of the Castle. The President did me the honor to consult with me during the last session in reference to that campaign then approaching. I expressed these views then through the course of the conversation which took place, and also made reference to the policy of capturing Vera Cruz with the Castle.

But the Senator from South Carolina takes what he calls "high ar ground," and urges that if Mexican nationality be extinguished we shall be forced in the end, either to fall back to his defensive line, or to do what he supposes to be much worse, either to incorporate all Mexico, within our limits, or establish a provincial government there. I take issue with the Senator at once as to both these alternatives; I deny that, in the case he has stated, if it ever should occur, we should be forced either to incorporate Mexico, and her whole people, Indians, Negroes, half-breeds, and all, in the sense in which the Senator from South Carolina uses that term, or that we should be compelled to treat her as a province, in the Roman sense of that term; or that, not doing either of these things, we then should be compelled to fall back to a defensive line. I will discuss these points more fully after a while; but I desire at first with great and heartfelt deference to the Senator's excellent memory, to set him right, if I can, in regard to certain points of Roman history, a correct understanding of which is, perhaps, material to this branch of the controversy. The following paragraph of the honorable Senator's speech contains the errors which I suppose him to have committed:

"What is the object of a vigorous prosecution of the war? How can it be successful? I can see but one way of making it so, and that is by suppressing all resistance on the part of Mexico, overpowering and dispersing her army, and utterly overthrowing her government. But if that should be done—if a vigorous prosecution of the war should lead to that result, how are we to obtain an honorable peace? With whom shall we treat for indemnity for the past and security for the future? War may be made by one party, but it requires two to make peace. If all authority is overthrown in Mexico, where will be the power of entering into negotiations and making peace? Our very success would defeat the possibility of making peace?

"In that case the war would not end in peace, but in conquest; not in negotiation, but in subjugation, and defeat. I repeat, the very success of the war would defeat, absolutely, and accomplish that which you disavow to be your intention, by destroying the separate existence of Mexico, overthrowing her nationality, and blotting out her name from the list of nations, instead of leaving her a free republic, which the President has so earnestly expressed his desire to do.

* * * * * * *

"The President is right. If the vigorous prosecution of the war should be successful, and the contingency on which he expects to make a treaty fails, there will be no retreat. Every argument against calling back the army and taking a defensive line, will have double force, after having spent sixty millions of dollars, and acquired the possession of the whole of Mexico, and the interests in favor of keeping possession would be much more powerful then than now. The army itself will be larger—those who live by the war, the numerous contractors, the merchants, the sutlers, the speculators, the land and mines, and all who are profiting directly or indirectly by its prosecution, will be adverse to retiring, and will swell the cry of holding on to our conquests. They constitute an immense body of vast influence, who are growing rich by what is impoverishing the rest of the country.

* * * * * * *

That it would be contrary to the genius and character of our government, and subversive of our free popular institutions, to hold Mexico as a subject province, is a proposition too clear for argument before a body so enlightened as the Senate.

* * * * * * *

Let it not be said that Great Britain is an example to the contrary; that she holds provinces of vast extent and population, without materially impairing the liberty of the subject, or of exposing the government to violence, anarchy, despotism, or destruction. It is so. But it must be attributed to the peculiar character of her government. All of governments that ever existed, of a free character, the British far transcends all in one particular, and that is, its capacity to bear patronage without the evils usually incident to it. She can bear more, in proportion to population and wealth, than any government of that character that ever existed. I might even go further, and assert that she developed itself in its most absolute form. I will not undertake to explain why it is so. It will take me further from the course which I have prescribed for myself, than I desire; but I will say, in a few words, that it results from the fact that her Executive, the House of Lords, the crown, over-balance, or hedge against, what are both hereditary, while the other House of Parliament has a popular character. The Roman government exceeded the British in its capacity for conquest. No government ever did exist, and none probably ever will, which, in that particular, equalled it; but its capacity to hold conquered provinces in subjection, was as nothing compared to that of Great Britain; and hence, when the Roman power passed beyond the limits of Italy, embracing Africa, the Mediterranean, and the Alps, liberty fell prostrate; the Roman people became a rabble; corruption penetrated every department of the government; violence and anarchy ruled the day, and military despotism closed the scene. Now, on the contrary, we see England, with subject-provinces of vastly greater territorial extent, and probably of not inferior population, (I have not compared them;) we see her, I repeat, going on without the personal liberty of the subject being materially impaired, or the government subject to violence or anarchy!

Now, I shall not here stop to discuss the meaning of the term province. It is obvious that the Senator's view of the matter is, that the extension of territorial dominion by Rome had the effect of prostrating her liberties. I confess I never met with this opinion before. It is certainly not in Gibbon, or Niebur, nor do I think it can be found in the pages of any other philosophic historian who has written of that wonderful people. On the contrary, the freedom of Rome commenced with territorial conquests—grew and strengthened continually with farther conquests—and never became very seriously impaired, until the God Terminus began to think of receding. "But though Terminus (says Gibbon) had resisted the majesty of Jupiter, he submitted to the authority of the Emperor Hadrian." The first emperor of Rome for the first time announced the territory policy to Roman ears, and, as ordinarily, the same illustrious historian just quoted, says "the principal conquests of the Romans were achieved under the Republic; and the emperors, for the most part, were satisfied with preserving those dominions which had been acquired by the policy of the Senate, the active emulation of the consuls, and the martial enthusiasm of the people. The seven first centuries were filled with a rapid succession of triumphs, but it was reserved for Augustus to relinquish the ambitious design of conquering the whole earth, and to introduce a spirit of moderation into his councils."

The Senator from South Carolina was pleased to designate a period in Roman history as the commencement of the ruin of free institutions, nearly four hundred years anterior to the age of the Antonines, selected by Mr. Gibbon as the beginning of the decline and fall of Roman power. He says: "As soon as the Roman power passed from Italy beyond the Adriatic on the one side, and the Alps on the other, and the Mediterranean, liberty fell prostrate." Well, if the Senator is correct in this statement, Roman liberty perished before the five hundred and fiftieth year from the building of the city, and nearly two hundred years before the reign of Augustus; as Illyricum, beyond the Adriatic, was certainly subdued as early as the year five hundred and fifteen, ab urbe condita, Spain was conquered by Scipio in the year five hundred and forty-seven, of the same era; and the Macedonian Kingdom was overthrown, and all Greece delivered from the tyranny of Nabis, about ten years later. To recognize Roman liberty as having been prostrated thus early, would be to take away from the honor of free institutions more than I am willing to do, and would inevitably cast a multitude of great names, heretofore associated with the career of Roman liberty, into a dim and dusky eclipse which would be seriously dispiriting to the champions of freedom throughout the world.

The truth is, sir, that there never was a year when Rome was free that she was not advancing rapidly along the pathways of territorial conquest. Let me cursorily mention a few names of conquered and annexed peoples, who had fallen before the Roman power anterior to the period of prostration specified by the Senator from South Carolina; commencing with the Albans, we have then, the Latines, the Sabines, the Fidenatians, the Falisceians, the Veientians, the Prenestines, the Campanians, the Samnites, the Hernicians, the Tiburtians, the Privernians, the Apulians, the Etruscans, the Umbrians, the Marcians, the Peligninns, the Equans.

[illegible] Salientines, the States of Sicily, Carthage, Spain, Sardinia, Corsica, the Legions, &c. &c. [illegible] to the Senator from South Carolina [illegible] protected [illegible] he has specified!

But, I will not pursue this topic further; and, indeed, should not have discussed it at all, but for the apprehension which I felt, that the powerful argument of the Senator from South Carolina on this point, going wholly unanswered, might have an effect upon the public mind more or less detrimental in its character.

If the Senator had ascribed the prostration of Roman liberty to her badly balanced frame of government, into which those most incongruous and antagonizing elements had found entrance and maintained unceasing discord;" to her defective system of jurisprudence, which, until the days of Justinian, was confessedly one of the most imperfect ever known; to her want of the representative and confederative principles of government; to her want of trial by jury; and, her want of the means of rapidly communicating intelligence [illegible] and had ended with asserting that corruption, the means of perpetrating which, had [illegible] and confiscation in foreign and remote regions, which is impossible in this country under our constitution, I should have concurred with him most heartily. But to give all these considerations the go-by, and ascribe the downfall of Roman freedom to a single cause, and that not the true one, strikes me to be hardly as practical as to settle the matter summarily, by repeating the language of poetry, and [illegible]

[illegible]

But let us advance a little further in examination of the honorable Senator's view of the danger to arise to our institutions from the incorporation or provincialization of Mexico; one of which he says we will have to do in a short time if we do not come over to his defensive line theory. The complete denationalization of Mexico, he says, will bring us to the necessity of choice between these alternatives.

Admitting the denationalization of Mexico to be at hand, then I contend that, without falling back to a defensive line, and without consolidating a Provincial government over the [illegible] of her people, in their present condition at least, measures could yet be taken, without varying at all from the policy necessary to be pursued in order to ensure a vigorous prosecution of the war, and, indeed, in pursuance of the [illegible] promulged by General Scott, that would inevitably lead to the gradual civilization and Americanization of Mexico, and, possibly, her eventual annexation to the confederacy, when qualified for this honor. I am proposing [illegible] presumptuous in me to do so. The [illegible] express, are my own, and may be, for aught I know, in their entirety, confined to myself; nor is any other person, official, or unofficial, at all responsible therefor. Though I am happy to believe, that they will be generally concurred in by those whom I represent here, and that, in the main, they are sanctioned by two distinguished citizens of my own State, judging from their published views, whose high reputation for abilities, for moral worth, and profound acquaintance with this particular subject, will secure for any opinions which they may be known to approve, the utmost respect from their countrymen. I allude to the late Governor of Mexico, General Quitman, and another personage, whose name, for certain delicate public reasons, I may not mention here, but whose [illegible] on this floor, has since associated himself in endless connection with the great principles of free trade and [illegible] be recognized [illegible] the Ocean and [illegible] Western World.

Thus premising, I proceed to declare, that if hereafter driven by stress of circumstances, such as have been anticipated by the Senator from South Carolina, to despair altogether of the effectuation of a treaty with Mexico, and we should be forced to keep possession of the country, [illegible] its own present inhabitants, on fair and honorable terms, why, even then, I should not unite with the Senator from South Carolina, in the sentiments of profound hopelessness, to which he has given such eloquent expression in our midst; but should endeavor to educe, as much good as practicable from what might be considered by many as only unmixed evil.

And upon some such plan as I will proceed now to suggest, I should hope still further to provide for the happiness and glory of our own country, and the ultimate diffusion and perpetuity of the great principles of civil and religious liberty. And,

1. After such a temporary occupancy of Mexico by our armies as [illegible] state after state of it, for the re-establishment of civil government, taking care, in due season, to introduce our invaluable territorial system—that noble nursery of State sovereignties—and to entrust the inhabitants of each territory, as soon as it might be deemed entirely safe to do so, with the indispensable power of self-government.

2. Whilst a temporary military occupation of Mexico might be deemed necessary, I would station detachments of troops at three prominent points in the interior, Orizaba, Mexico, and San Luis Potosi, with a view of giving protection to the three commercial ports of Alvarado, Vera Cruz and Tampico; thus securing the mining districts from encroachment from any quarter, and establishing peace and perfect social order throughout the whole extent of the region thus occupied.

3. The next step which would be advisable would be the introduction of our system of import duties, bringing with it the blessings of free trade to Mexico, for the first time, and all their civilizing and Americanizing influences. By this means the commercial monopoly heretofore enjoyed by Great Britain, would cease [illegible] products heretofore, to a great extent, prohibited, would find ready entrance into the country, and be seen to float quietly along all the channels of domestic trade; the beneficial effect of which, in a moral point of view, will be easily inferred, by those who have given their attention, heretofore, to such considerations, and which will be found beautifully and powerfully illustrated by one of the most distinguished writers of the present day, in a speech delivered in the great city of Manchester, in the month of November last, an extract from which I beg leave to submit. Mr. Alison, the historian, on taking the chair at the Athenæum soiree, in Free Trade Hall, on the occasion referred to, after a few introductory remarks, thus [illegible]

[illegible] Mr. Alison [illegible] speech it considerable [illegible]

1. [illegible] immense body of valuable public land in Mexico, heretofore unappropriated, there being, as I am assured, from twenty-five to thirty millions of acres of the richest lands in the world, yet unoccupied, [illegible] of the [illegible] of the States which have not yet become densely peopled. By bestowing farms of moderate extent upon actual settlers, the whole country would soon become occupied by a population equal to any under the sun, in all that is necessary to good government and high social advancement.

5. There are resources in Mexico not necessary to be particularly specified, which might be conveniently and legitimately applied, after paying the present national debt, to general education purposes.

6. Religious toleration, heretofore prohibited, would now prevail, and every man be allowed to worship God according to his own conscience.

7. Our system of trial by jury would be sure very early to comment itself to respect and adoption.

8. These and other regulations which will occur to all astute minds at once, without suggestion, cannot but work wondrous effects in the next five or ten years. Eight years ago, he who is now speaking used the following language:

[illegible]

The scenes herein described have been in part at least realized; and they are destined to be still more fully realized, if we shall dare to do our duty, regardless of illiberal cavils and factious opposition.

In answer to the objections of the Senator from South Carolina, it has become necessary to take a short view of the character of the population at present in Mexico. There are said to be now about seven millions of people; their number having rather diminished than increased in the last ten years. Of these about four millions are, as they have been described by the Senator from South Carolina, Indians—who, though gentle in their manners, docile, obedient, orderly, and industrious in their habits, are yet nothing more than Indians in their capacity for exercising political rights. They live together in towns and villages, have property in common, and enforce their former tribal usages, except so far as they may be restrained by special law. They are cultivators of the soil exclusively; and constitute no part of the population of Mexico subject to do military service. They have not enjoyed political rights, in other words, they have not voted at elections, since 1833. Nor are they desirous of being allowed to do so. Whatever they may become in future, under judicious and humane regulations, such as we have applied to our Chickasaw, Choctaw, and Cherokee Indians, remains to be seen. In the present state of things, though, no man of sound practical intellect, I suppose, would think of entrusting them with all the rights of American citizenship. An experiment of this kind formerly tried in Mexico is known to have been a total failure.

Three millions remain to be disposed of. Of these the military [illegible] the twenty-two [illegible] office-holders, and their servile dependents constitute perhaps a body of two hundred thousand. These, with a portion of the priesthood, and their dependents and servants are known as the aristocratic party.

The Peons, or ribbon appendages, [illegible] are a mixed race, slaves in the most miserable sense of the word, and transferable with the soil which they till. They are said to number about seven or eight hundred thousand souls, and constitute the chief resource of the military [illegible] recruiting sergeants.

The negroes are too inconsiderable in point of numbers or influence to be entitled to any serious regard in this view of the Mexican people.

The remainder, in number more than two millions, are the Puros or democrats—Vicente [illegible] always friendly to our people and government, and especially so in this war, as is provable by much and satisfactory evidence; far more friendly with us certainly than to their cruel oppressors, the military tyrants. The Puros are the bone and sinew of the country, the most intelligent, virtuous, and orderly people in Mexico. They recognize us, and justly, as their deliverers, and are full of apprehension & [illegible] the cruel oppression from [illegible]

As the retention of Mexico by the United States, should we be forced to retain it, is objected to by some on the ground of the enormous expense [illegible] I would here submit a few remarks touching [illegible]

1. It is estimated by our Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, that the domestic commerce between the States of this confederacy amounts annually to the sum of $[illegible]. Upon the basis supplied by this estimate, when a general free-trade intercourse shall have been once established between the States of this Union and Mexico, this new branch of domestic trade would amount to $[illegible] of which at least one-fourth of the trade to Mexico to be $83,000,000; we have an increase of more than $82,000,000 complete. Under the control of British councils, and by the instrumentality of prohibitory and peculiar duties, many of our most valuable staples—such as flour, tobacco, manufactures of cotton, &c., have been heretofore excluded. This would be no longer the case were Mexico part of the Union.

2. For our produce and manufactures, we should receive from Mexico—1. There great staple exports, gold and silver. 2. Their other mineral products derivable from mines almost wholly untouched, consisting of quicksilver, copper and tin. 3. Their valuable woods, consisting of mahogany, &c. 4. Cochineal, logwood, and other dye-stuffs. 5. Coffee, cocoa, and wine of a flavor equal almost to any in Europe. 6. Hides. 7. Tobacco, equal to the best Cuba tobacco. 8. Silk, of which there is a considerable quantity manufactured at present; and, under the fostering protection of free institutions the quantity could not but be greatly enhanced in a short period of time. 9. Sugar, to the raising of which the greater part of Mexico is admirably adapted in point of soil and climate; and it is a fact, (not a little remarkable it is too,) that though the State of Vera Cruz, possess native resources as a planting region, but little inferior to the island of Cuba itself, until the landing of our army under General Scott, there was no loaf sugar to be found in the vicinage of the city of Vera Cruz, except what was most inconveniently and expensively brought there on the backs of mules, from the Pacific slope, a distance of four hundred miles.

3. The quicksilver mines of Mexico have not been regularly worked; but enough is known of them to authorize the opinion, that they are greatly the most valuable which have ever been discovered. The article of quicksilver, in consequence of its having been, to a great extent, monopolized by the Rothchilds, has lately reached a price in market which may be well deemed enormous. The opening of the mines of quicksilver under our supervision and direction, would at once cheapen the article everywhere. The value of quicksilver as an amalgam, so indispensable as such in [illegible] operation is [illegible] remarks on this head.

4. I feel bound to add, that without the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, which can never be fully and availably under our control, except as an incident to the annexation of Mexico low enough down to embrace it, we can hardly calculate upon retaining the permanent possession either of California or Oregon. The difficulty of reaching any place on the Pacific coast from the densely settled portions of the United States, and the immense consumption of time now unavoidable in performing such a journey, seem to make it more than probable, as one sagacious and profound statesman of New England has already predicted as to Oregon, that at no distant day, if no canal or railway across the Isthmus shall ever be effected, an independent State or States will be likely to spring up on the Pacific, which will claim and hold all the territory rightfully belonging to us in that part of the world. With the Isthmus and a canal across it, all danger on this score would be effectually obviated. With the Isthmus, and a convenient commercial communication between the two great oceans, this Republic will at once become the greatest commercial nation in the world.

5. Lastly. If we fall back to a defensive line, the military aristocrats will reorganize under the protection of Great Britain or some other foreign government, and then we shall have a war on our hands which will be interminable. The fact that Great Britain has long struggled to control the destinies of Mexico—that she is known to be quite jealous of our present prospects in that country—that Lord Palmerston has recently in Parliament thrown out very distinct intimations of a disposition to seize upon the whole of Mexico, as indemnity for certain debts due to British subjects—together with the striking fact that the British government is known to be already in possession of the pass of Nicaragua, should solemnly admonish us not to withdraw our troops and evacuate the country too lightly, for, in the emphatic language of the day, without having obtained complete indemnity for the past, and entire security for the future; by which I understand full indemnity in money or territory, and full security for ourselves and our posterity. I am satisfied, sir, for the present, with having presented this hypothetical view of the compensating advantages likely to arise [illegible] Mexico in case the overtures of that nation, encouraged as she has been from this country to continue the struggle of arms, should finally constrain us to take possession of all the country and hold it forever.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I have listened to the speech of the honorable gentleman who has taken his seat, with all the attention which his own high character, and, if he will allow me to add, my regard for him, could inspire. In the course of his very animated and eloquent remarks, there was one passage which I regret, and I now rise simply for the purpose of recalling his attention to it, and making a single remark upon it. I allude to that part of the gentleman's remarks in which he alluded to Mr. Clay, in language too plain to be misunderstood, and described him as "the magnetizer," employing certain acts for the purpose of promoting certain pretensions to the Presidency, which the gentleman thought proper to attribute to him. Sir, Mr. Clay is now a private citizen—a man venerable for his age; and (I think I may say without fear of dissent from any gentleman,) illustrious on account of his character and his public services. He is now unconnected with political life; and I submit to the honorable gentleman, whether those considerations might not have protected him from such an allusion, and from such imputations as have been cast upon him?

Mr. FOOTE.—If the honorable gentleman will allow me—

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—In a moment, sir. I have had the honor of knowing Mr. Clay, and of calling him friend, and being called friend by him, for the last twenty-five years of my life. I think I know him, sir, and I think I can venture to assure my honorable friend from Mississippi, that there is no man in this country more incapable of the practice of any ignoble arts than he is; and that he would not have the Presidency at the price of any such arts practised by him. To him the Presidency could add but little. He will adorn a bright page in the history of his country; and there, sir, when the passions, and prejudices of party shall be hushed, his will, indeed, be held by all Americans, the a name honorable and illustrious, which, combined with the names of his great and distinguished opponents will, with their blended light, forever illuminate and illustrate the annals of our country. I regret then, sir, that in the course of these animated remarks—and much, I know, escapes us in the heat of debate, which we would willingly retract—a passage should have occurred, which may perhaps be construed more seriously than it was meant. I think I can assure the gentleman, that whatever information he may have received to the contrary, Mr. Clay has practised no art, neither the art of the mesmerizer, nor of the magnetizer, nor of the political, nor any act whatever, to promote his pretensions to the Presidency. The highest official station could add but little to him—but little to his name or fame. Office itself is comparatively an ignoble object of ambition. His has ever been the higher object of ambition, to serve his country and be rewarded by his country's approbation. He is altogether incapable of any art to circumvent, or to obtain any object. I can assure the gentleman that he has practised no means whatever, that he, himself, in the exercise of his nicest judgment would condemn; and I make this appeal in the most kind and respectful manner, in vindication of a private citizen, and my friend, now absent, and represented here by my honorable friend, [Mr. UNDERWOOD.] and however unworthily by myself.

"Clarum et venerabile nomen"

Mr. FOOTE.—I concur heartily in what has fallen from the Senator from Kentucky, in praise of his distinguished friend. Even the Latin quotation applied to him has my cordial sanction. I will even go farther, and supply a word, to be found in the original, and which the Senator has accidentally omitted, and I will say, "Clarum et venerabile nomen gentibus." For surely, Mr. Clay is known most conspicuously to all the nations of earth. The Senator seems to be dissatisfied at my using the phrase magnetic influence, in connection with Mr. Clay's present visit to Washington. Now, I must think that if the Senator had duly considered the meaning of the phrase in question, he would have taken no offence. A magnet is a substance distinguished for a certain mysterious, yet powerful influence, which may be called attractiveness. Magnetism is attractiveness, or, in the present more ascertained sense of the term, a subtle, ethereal, mysterious, incomprehensible, and irresistible influence, possessed by one substance over another, or by one man's spirit over the spirits and sensibilities of others; which enables the magnetizer in the latter case, even without actual contact, physically speaking, to control the will and conduct of all who come within range of his influence. Now, I have heard a distinguished countryman of the honorable Senator, Dr. Buchanan, give instances of the exercise of this power by himself, Dr. Caldwell, and others, in certain towns and villages of Kentucky, exceedingly surprising. Had I charged Mr. Clay with coming to Washington at this particular time to electioneer for the Presidency—to solicit support from prominent politicians for this high place, or even to plead with his old friends not to abandon him, I should have called very unwarrantable. But I did no such thing. I used the most delicate and respectful terms possible, and only suggested that his very presence here was calculated to operate with magnetic power. And cannot this be used with propriety? Does not this distinguished personage awaken a profound sensation wherever he appears to go? Did not the citizens of Philadelphia turn out to do him honor on a late occasion, without distinction of party? and was not the crowd so great, and put under such powerful attraction by him, as almost to obstruct his progress along the streets? I have been once or twice placed under this influence, more or less, myself, and was delighted to join my fellow-citizens of Mississippi on one occasion in affording to Mr. Clay a hearty welcome when he visited our State. There is a charmfulness about the whole man very difficult to resist. He is an orator of most captivating powers, too, and a poet by nature. Even his person would suggest to a casual observer that he "he does not belong to the roll of ordinary men." My opposition to Mr. Clay is strictly political; but it is most decided. And though I hope never to give personal offence to him or his friends by the use of discourteous language, as long as God permits me to live I expect to be strenuously opposed to his principles as a statesman, and his advancement to Presidential honors. I would notify the Senator that the celebrated lecturer on electro-magnetism, Dr. Boynton, is now in the city, and he could not fail to derive both pleasure and instruction from his discourses.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I am exceedingly gratified by the explanation of the honorable gentleman. I know that his own generous feelings and sense of propriety would lead him to assure us that he meant nothing that was unbecoming or improper.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

[The following remarks should have been inserted in page 138, immediately before the last paragraph in the first column:

Mr. SEVIER.—I beg leave to interrupt the honorable Senator from Mississippi for a moment only. He has referred to the journals, but has omitted, what I consider, a very important point considered in its bearing upon the subject at issue. I refer to the act of 1803—an act based upon the Ross resolutions, and very pertinent at the present moment. I call for the reading of the said act.

[The Secretary here read the act called for.]

FRIDAY, JANUARY 21, 1848.

On motion, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn it be to Monday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk.

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed the following bills of the Senate.

An act concerning certain collection districts, and for other purposes.
An act to provide a bounty for volunteers in the service of the United States.

The House of Representatives have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to reorganize the General Land Office,' approved July 4, 1836;" in which I am directed to ask the concurrence of the Senate.

THE LATE JOHN W. HORNBECK.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk.

Mr. President: I am directed to notify the Senate of the death of the Hon. JOHN W. HORNBECK, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and of the proceedings of the House of Representatives thereon.

The resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives having been read,

Mr. CAMERON said:

It is my duty, Mr. President, to detain the Senate for a moment, before I move the customary resolutions which here mark the death of one of our number.

JOHN W. HORNBECK, a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, died at his residence in the county of Lehigh a few days since.

It was not my fortune to have been acquainted with him, but from those who knew him well, I learned that he was a native of New Jersey—that hegraduated at Union College in New York, and that he settled, about 16 years since, at Allentown, Pennsylvania, where he studied law, and where he was, till the time of his death, a respected and successful member of the bar.

He was a man of learning and of ability, of quiet and unobtrusive, but of social habits, and of a disposition so kind and benevolent—so willing to serve others, rather than himself, that he won the esteem and love of all who came within his circle. Honorable, high minded and generous, he commanded the respect of all, and died as he had lived, without an enemy.

His election was a tribute to his private virtues. Living in a district opposed to him in politics, he was elected by a decided majority over a man of sterling worth and high character.

At the meeting of Congress he came here to fulfil his trust, but the disease which had marked him for his victim made such rapid inroads upon his constitution, that he was compelled to leave his seat the first week of the session. He returned to his home, where he died in the midst of his family and friends. Those whom he had cherished and protected, were around him to smooth his pillow in the last struggle between time and eternity; and he died as the good man only can die, calmly relying upon the mercy of the Redeemer. Whilst we mourn his early death, we should rejoice that his life was so pure as to warrant the hope that he has only exchanged mortality for a happy immortality.

Mr. CAMERON concluded by submitting the following resolutions:

Resolved, unanimously, That the Senate has received with deep sensibility the message from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of Hon. JOHN W. HORNBECK, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of paying every mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions having been unanimously adopted,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 24, 1848.

Mr. RUSK presented the credentials of the Hon. SAM HOUSTON, elected a Senator of the United States, from the State of Texas, for the term of six years from and after the 4th day of March, 1847; which were read.

Mr. HOUSTON, having taken the oath prescribed by law, took his seat in the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:
In compliance with the request of the Senate, in their resolution of the 13th instant, I herewith communicate a report from the Secretary of War, with the accompanying correspondence, containing the information called for, in relation to "forced contributions" in Mexico.
JAMES K. POLK.
Washington, January 24, 1848.

On motion by Mr. DAYTON, it was Ordered, That it be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a petition of Importing merchants of the city of Boston, praying a modification of the 8th Section of the Tariff Act, of July 30th, 1846, relating to assessments of duties on invoices; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

On presenting this petition, Mr. WEBSTER remarked that its signers, persons of eminent respectability, complained of a provision in the 8th section of the law commonly called the Tariff Act of 1846, to which he desired to call the attention of the Finance Committee. It would be remembered that under that law all duties were ad valorem, to be assessed upon the value at the port where entered, and that, to determine the quantity, the articles were to be weighed, guaged or measured by the proper officers at the Custom Houses. Now this 8th section of the law, while it very properly provides for the payment of duty upon any excess beyond the amount of the invoice, also declares that, in assessing the duty upon goods imported, "under no circumstances shall the duty be assessed on an amount less than the invoice value." The petitioners complain that under this provision, when the goods invoiced fall short of the invoice, either in weight, guage or measure, they are compelled to pay duties on that which they do not receive. They therefore request that the section referred to should be so amended as to read "that on all articles usually bought and sold by weight, guage or measure, the duties thereon shall be computed and paid according to the returns of weight, guage or measure, of the sworn officers of the United States in the several ports."

Mr. WEBSTER presented the petition of the citizens of Bedford County, Pennsylvania, praying a reduction of the rates of postage on newspapers; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a memorial of ministers and laymen of the Unitarian denomination of Christians, praying the adoption of pacific measures for securing an immediate and permanent peace with the Republic of Mexico; which was laid upon the table.

Also, the petition of citizens of Billerica, Massachusetts, praying the adoption of measures for terminating the war with Mexico; which was laid upon the table.

Mr. BERRIEN presented a memorial of J. J. Flournoy, praying the adoption of measures for establishing a tribunal for the peaceable adjustment of international disputes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LEWIS presented a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, praying the establishment of a national armory near the city of Tuscaloosa, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BAGBY presented a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, praying the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DICKINSON submitted additional documents relating to the claim of the heirs of Jethro Wood; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Also, the petition of citizens of Nunda, New York, praying a reduction of the rates of postage and the discontinuance of the franking privilege; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BRADBURY presented the petition of Amos Doughty, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ASHLEY presented the petition of Reynolds May, praying to be released from a judgment rendered against him at the suit of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Md., presented the petition of Alexander Murdock, Treasurer of the first Presbyterian Church of Baltimore, praying the return of duties levied on certain articles imported for the use of that church; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. BELL, it was Ordered, That Susan Coody and others, Cherokee Indians, have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of La., it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of Nicholas Barra, on the files af the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

ROUTE TO CALIFORNIA.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered. That in printing the documents communicated by the Secretary of War, on the 15th December last, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 9th December, all papers not connected with or appended to the report of Lieutenant Emory, transmitted to the Senate, and with the report of Lieutenant Colonel Cooke to Colonel J. J. Abert, Chief of the Topographical Bureau, dated December 6, 1847, be excluded.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. ASHLEY gave notice that he would, at an early day, ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill to extend the maritime jurisdiction of the United States' courts to all the navigable waters of the United States.

Mr. RUSK gave notice that he would, at an early day, ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill authorizing the President of the United States to increase the Naval establishment.

CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. CAMERON submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be authorized to employ a Clerk, to whom no greater yearly compensation shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

MR. WISE'S CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. HUNTER submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not inconsistent with the public interest, the correspondence of Mr. Wise, late Minister, &c. of the United States at the court of Brazil, with the Department of State, of the United States, and with the Minister and Secretary of State for foreign affairs of Brazil, with the accompanying papers, accompanying the despatches from number 53 to number 64 inclusive, and in his despatch from off the capes of Virginia, dated October 9th, 1847, and in his letter to the Secretary of State, dated at Washington, November 3d, 1847, and the despatches of Mr. Buchanan, Secretary of State, to Mr. Wise, number 30, dated the 2d February, 1847, and number 32, dated 20th March, 1847, all relating to the imprisonment of Alonzo B. Davis, Lieutenant of the United States' Navy, and three seamen of the United States, by the police authority of the city of Rio de Janeiro, on the 31st of October, 1846.

UNITED STATES' DISTRICT JUDGE FOR SOUTH FLORIDA.

Mr. WESTCOTT submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the propriety of increasing the salary of the United States' District Judge for South Florida.

EXPLOSION OF STEAM-BOILERS.

Mr. WESTCOTT submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Patents be directed to report to the Senate such information as he may have in his possession, or may obtain, that he deems important, with reference to further legislation by Congress, for the prevention of the explosion of steam-boilers used in boats, or for engines on railroads, and, whether any amendments to the Patent laws are advisable to effect such object.

RETROCESSION OF ALEXANDRIA.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom had been referred the bill supplementary to an act passed the 9th day of July in the year 1846, entitled "An act to retrocede to Virginia the County of Alexandria, District of Columbia," reported it without amendment.

MILITARY LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to repeal the proviso of an act to authorize the issuing of scrip to the late officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on Continental establishment, entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of scrip to the late officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on Continental establishment," passed the 9th of February, 1852; which was read and passed to the second reading.

[illegible]

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of [illegible] praying to be allowed a right of way, and a small piece of ground for making a railroad connecting the upper and lower Mississippi, with the chain of northern lakes at Chicago, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BREESE [illegible] was of leave granted.

ADJUTANTS OF THE MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. BADGER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill providing for the appointment of Adjutant at the Military Academy, on an equality, as to pay and allowances with the Adjutants of Regiments.

[illegible]

Mr. ATCHISON [illegible] Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Jonathan Lewis, submitted a report accompanied by a resolution for his relief.

The resolution was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Jeanette C. Huntington, widow and sole executrix of William D. Cheever, deceased, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BALDWIN also submitted a report upon the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Don Carlos Blake, adjutant of the 3d. regiment of Infantry, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed, together with an accompanying letter from the Quartermaster General on the subject.

Mr. DAYTON, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill for the relief of Oliver C. Harris; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. UPHAM, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of [illegible] praying [illegible] Revolutionary services, submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of John Michen and others, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for the relief of John Milliken and others, to secure certain rights to pre-emption in the State of Louisiana; which was read and passed to the second reading.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

MR. CLAYTON'S VIEWS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BERRIEN on the 20th instant; and it was agreed to:

[illegible]

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution authorizing the erection, on the public grounds in the city of Washington, of a monument to George Washington, and recommended [illegible] reported to the Senate.

Ordered. That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read a third time by unanimous consent.

[illegible]

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this resolution.

[illegible]

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted on the [illegible] by Mr. BALDWIN:

[illegible]

Mr. HALE moved [illegible] the resolution, and after it had been read, remarked that before the vote of the Senate was taken upon the resolution, he would like to have some [illegible]

Mr. BALDWIN.—I will state, Mr. President, in a few words, the object which I have in view in moving that resolution. The President of the United States, in his message at the opening of the session, has informed Congress that the republic of Mexico has [illegible] payment of three millions, with a view to negotiate with the government of Mexico, to acquire a cession of territory from the republic; and to acquire probably the cession of territory of greater value than the amount of the claims which might be due to our citizens. Now, sir, the object of the first part of the resolution is to inquire whether the President possesses any information, and if so, to request him to communicate it to the Senate, in regard to the extent and value of the public domain of Mexico, which it is in the power of that government to cede to the United States—whether Mexico has any public domain whatever—whether she has any land, any mines, any available property which may be converted into the means of paying the United States claimants; or whether the President, in his recommendation to pursue the war for the purpose of acquiring territory, has in view simply the acquisition of dominion over the people, or any part of the Mexican republic. And, sir, if the latter be the object—if Mexico has no public domain [illegible] sir, the object of the second part of the resolution is to inquire of the President whether he possesses any information, and, if so, to request him to communicate the information to the Senate, in reference to the power of the Mexican republic to cede, either to the government of the United States, or to any foreign government, either of the States of that confederacy, the sovereignty over either of the States of that confederacy, or any portion of the people thereof.

I ask this information, sir, to enable me to act intelligently and to enable Senate to act intelligently, not only upon the recommendation of the President, but upon the resolutions which are now pending before the Senate. The resolutions offered by the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HANNEGAN,) assert the right of the United States to acquire the dominion, and the possibility that it may be [illegible] Mexico. I ask it for the purpose of enabling me to act intelligently upon those resolutions. I ask it also in reference to the resolutions of the Senator from New York (Mr. DICKINSON) asserting that it is the true policy of the government of the United States to strengthen its commercial relations and its political relations, also, the annexation of contiguous territory wherever it may be justly acquired. I wish to know whether Mexico has the power of ceding to the United States any portion of her sovereignty over any of the members of that Republic—whether we can lawfully and justly acquire the sovereignty, either by demanding a treaty of cession, or in any other way. [illegible] need be known to the members of the Senate that when Mexico was an empire under the government of Iturbide, he was required to take an oath on entering upon the administration of the government, that he never would cede or alienate any portion of the territory. [illegible] overthrown and a confederated republic was established in its room, by the union, for that purpose, of the nineteen States composing the Republic of Mexico, that union was based upon the same principles upon which our government is founded, the Constitution of the United States [illegible] the model of that of the Mexican Republic. And, sir, need I ask whether any authority could be derived from a Constitution modelled after our own, for the cession to a foreign government of any portion of the sovereignty over any of the territories of States composing that Republic? Does any citizen of the United States suppose that it would [illegible] of a foreign government against us, any one of the States of this Union? Did the framers of the Constitution of the United States hold to any such doctrine, when the North-Eastern boundary question was in agitation before the country? Did the government of the United States suppose that they could, for the purpose of settling that great national controversy, cede to Great Britain any portion of the State of Maine, without the assent of that State first obtained? If, then, these are the doctrines of this republic, I wish to know whether, when the President of the United States [illegible] Congress to [illegible] assumed territory from the Mexican republic, and to present them to the view of the people of that republic, until the resolution of cession is adopted—I want to know whether the Mexican republic has the right to make this cession, before I can decide intelligently the question whether this republic can in honor make the demand of Mexico? I wish first to know whether Mexico has the power to comply with that demand consistently with the fundamental principle upon which that government is [illegible]. Would it have the power to [illegible] the law of nations, recognised by our government to dismember itself by the cession of the sovereignty over any portion of its people to a foreign power; and that if it attempts, for the promotion of its own interests, to make such a cession, it is optional with [illegible] to assent to such a session and yield obedience or not, as it may be able to sustain a position independently or not. But, sir, who are the parties in the present case?—What are the principles upon which [illegible] public is based by its constitution modelled after our own?—and to what result do the considerations derivable from these institutions lead us, other than I have stated, unless there be in the possession of the President information which he may have it in his power to communicate to the Senate which would change the result? Our government is based, sir, as we all know, upon that great declaration, that the right of sovereignty is inalienably in the people. The Mexican government was, as I have remarked, based upon the same principle; and are we who sent forth this declaration of popular right—a declaration at war with the then existing institutions of the world and utterly at variance with the great dogma, upon which they were based, of the divine right of Kings to govern and the duty of [illegible] discovered and promulgated for the first time, the inalienable right of sovereignty in the people, now about to ask of a sister republic that she shall transfer to another government a portion of her people, loyal to their own government and desirous of remaining under its protection? The object of my resolution is to seek for such information as the President may possess, other than that which we can derive only from our knowledge of the institutions of these two republics, which will enable us to judge of the propriety of demanding and endeavoring by force of arms to compel that republic to make a cession of a part of itself, with a portion of its people, thereby transferring them as property to be governed by the people of the United States.

The United States it is true, sir, have heretofore acquired territory by the cession of other governments. But in what circumstances have these acquisitions been made? In the first place, the United States claiming the proprietorship of all the territories included within the original jurisdiction of the States which had extensive domains, held that inasmuch as those territorial domains had been acquired by the common efforts of the confederacy, the jurisdiction should be ceded to the government of the United States under certain conditions; and after a long struggle a compromise was made by which the United States acquired the territory and jurisdiction which they claimed, and which had been also claimed by the ceding States. That was the first instance, if such it can be called, of an acquisition by the government of the United States of that which they claimed to be already their own, by the cession of the States within whose original territorial limits the domain was included. The next instance, was the cession of Louisiana by France. But that was the cession of a distant colony, claimed by a monarchical government in the Old World. We stood in that case upon an entirely different principle from that now assumed in seeking a cession of territory by a sister republic on our own continent. Then came the cession of the Floridas, a cession made under similar circumstances to that of Louisiana, the territory being but an appendange to a monarchy of the Old World. Next we have the cession of Texas. That was a cession made by the people themselves, who claimed to have established an independent government—who claimed to possess the sovereignty of the territory which they undertook to transfer and annex to the Union. They wielded up voluntarily, by convention, by the unanimous consent of the people, the sovereignty which they felt they were, of themselves, unable to maintain.

But, sir, we are now called upon for the first time, by the President of the United States, to enter upon the career of conquest—to seek the acquisition of territory by a forced cession from a sister republic, of territory now under the dominion of the people of another government. We now seek to transfer that people to our government, and to transfer them, as an appendage to this republic—or a "territorial appendage," in the language of the resolution—and perhaps that may be inferred to be the object of the recommendation contained in the message of the President. I can hardly suppose that it is now seriously intended by any one, to incorporate that domain, as an integral part of the United States—to invite them to come in and participate in the government of this republic? If incorporated at all, we are asked to incorporate them as a "territorial appendage" to this government. Now the object of the resolution, which I have had the honor submit, is to ascertain from the President of the United States, whether he possesses any information which he can communicate to the Senate, showing that such a cession can be made of the republic of Mexico, in consistency with the fundamental law of the republic?

Mr. HANNEGAN.—So far as the first branch of the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut is concerned, I do not know, sir, that I have any objection to offer. I presume the answer to it would necessarily be, that the President has no information upon the subject. It amounts to nothing. I pass then to the second branch of the resolution. The Senator in the course of his remarks, thought proper to refer to certain resolutions, which I had the honor to submit to the Senate, a short time since. I was not in the Senate on Thursday last, at the moment when the Senator introduced his resolution, and I knew nothing of its introduction, or of its import, till I heard it read this morning at the Secretary's desk. With regard to my own resolutions, I do not feel myself called upon, to say anything on them now; but with reference to the second branch of the resolution offered by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, I must make a few remarks. I object to that part of the resolution, on several grounds. And in the first place, I remark, that that information which it calls upon the President to communicate to us, is presumed to be as fully in the possession of the members of this body, as it can be in that of the President himself. The resolution asks the President to communicate information, relative to the fundamental law of a foreign government. Well, sir, it is I believe to be presumed, that we ought to know as much as the Executive, about the fundamental law of a foreign government. The call is, therefore, altogether unnecessary.

The question discussed at some length by the Senator from Connecticut is one, not for us, but for Mexico to determine. It is for [illegible] whether, under [illegible] to cede territory. That is fundamental law she has—there is power to cede any or every foot of territory which she possesses. That power Mexico herself has already recognised. She has already asserted that power. Pending the negotiations anterior to the annexation of Texas, Mexico, as every member of the Senate well knows, made the offer to Texas of a recognition of her independence on condition, that she should refuse annexation to the United States; thereby admitting that she had the power to dispose of any portion of her territory at her will. She always claimed Texas as hers till that period. I did not catch distinctly the whole of the remarks made by the Senator from Connecticut, but if I understood the purport of his argument, he holds that the power of making a cession of territory may belong to a monarchy, but does not exist in a republic. The Senator shakes his head. Does he then deny the existence of that power in a monarchy? If he does, he denies a principle as old, I was about to say as time—certainly one coexistent with the monarchial form of government. There never was a monarchy upon the face of the earth where the question could be raised as to the right to dispose of her territory or dominions, or any part of them—never. It is quite enough to refer to the treaties of peace, concluded at the termination of wars between great monarchies, in order to show that under that form of government the power of ceding territory was always exercised. That right has always been exercised in monarchical governments, and I will briefly show that the majority has asserted the same power in this country. But I contend here that Mexico, being neither a monarchy nor a republic, nor an aristocracy, but an anarchy, must have the right somewhere. The Senator speaks of a fundamental law in Mexico, about which he would call upon the President to deliver a message. What is that fundamental law? What has it been from 1832, till the present hour? Why, sir, it has been nothing but the arbitrary will of each successive military despot, who has raised himself to supreme power by his sword.

But with regard to the power of making a cession of territory in a republican government, we know that the majority have twice decided in this body that it existed here. First, in the settlement of the North-Eastern boundary, you find, by the unanimous vote of the Senate recorded upon your journals, that it was declared that the whole of that disputed territory was the property of the United States, and yet by the Ashburton treaty, a large portion of the territory thus declared to be ours, was surrendered. I repeat, by a unanimous vote of the Senate—(if I am in error I can be corrected; but I believe I am right)—the whole of that territory was declared to be the property of the United States, and yet a treaty ratified by the Senate surrendered a large portion of that territory, and the most valuable in a military point of view. Then, again, a second instance is afforded in the darkest [illegible] ture in our history—the settlement of the Oregon question—in which, after almost every department of the government had declared that our title to the whole of Oregon was unquestionable, we yielded up a large part to England. There exists, then, in this government, as in a monarchical government, the power of ceding territory [illegible] of course [illegible] ded in an anarchical government, such as that of Mexico. At any rate, what does the Senator's argument amount, when we come to bring it directly home to the case as it exists? Mexico has for a series of years urged war upon us. She has urged a war upon us by every act which has ever been held a just cause of war; nay, by a series of acts, running through a period of twelve [illegible] years, from the [illegible] of Palo Alto, there has not been an hour in which Mexico was not resolved to provoke a war with the United States. The whole history of the intercourse between the two nations proves as clearly as the sunshine, that that was the studied and constant effort of Mexico. On another occasion, however, I shall take an opportunity of entering at length upon that subject, and of demonstrating, I think irrefragably, the soundness of the position which I have thus assumed. Mexico, then, urges us into this war. She forces upon us a conflict involving an immense sacrifice of life and expenditure of treasure; and at the close of this conflict, the Senator from Connecticut, according to the doctrine this day enunciated, would suffer Mexico to go "scot free," insisting only that she should say she was sorry for her conduct!

Sir, I do not approve of such a course of policy. I hold, that in common with all nations that have ever existed, we have a right to make this offender pay the penalty of her transgression. She has no gold wherewith to reimburse us, but she has land, and that land we want and I hope and trust we will get. I call, if it be in order, for a division of the question.

Mr. BALDWIN.—The Senator from Indiana says, that the information sought by the resolution, is presumed to be in the possession of every department of the government. Undoubtedly, it is always presumed that we are acquainted with the general historical facts in regard to the republic of Mexico. But, when the President of the United States recommends to Congress a specine course—when he recommends to Congress the acquisition of dominion by forced cession of that republic—and when a knowledge of the fundamental institutions of that republic does not lead us to the conclusion that she has the power which the President asks us to demand her to exercise, then it appears to me, that it is proper and respectful to the President himself, to ask that he shall communicate to the Senate the information which he possesses, and which has led him to a different conclusion. I have endeavored to show that upon our own knowledge of the fundamental principles upon which that government is based, we could not, either upon any principle recognized by ourselves, or upon any principle to be found in the law of nations, infer that such an authority existed; and it is, because I have felt that we could not from our own knowledge, perceive that Mexico had the power, which it is necessary she should possess, to enable her to make the cession we require, that I deemed it due to the Executive to call upon him for any information he may possess which has led him to arrive at a different conclusion. But, sir, the Senator from Indiana, says that this is not a question for us—it is for Mexico alone, to decide whether she has the power to cede or not. Is that so, sir? Are we called upon to expend millions of the public money for the acquisition of territory without being permitted to inquire into the nature of the title which we may get? Is it enough that the Mexican republic under the pressure of our arms will be willing to vacate her own jurisdiction? Does that satisfy the United States that they thereby, will rightfully acquire sovereignty over that people? I desire that the President may inform us upon what principle recognized by ourselves—upon what principle recognized by the republic of Mexico, the sovereignty of the people is transferrable like property for the payment of claims against that government. Is that the doctrine of the American people? Do they hold that sovereignty is no longer inalienable, as it was declared to be by our fathers in the days of the Revolution? Do they hold that it is a commodity to be transferred from one people to another in payment of demands against that confederated government, which is found to be inconvenient for that government to discharge, except by ceding a portion of the confederacy to another government? How would this doctrine be regarded if its application were attempted by a foreign government either to the people of this country or to the people of Mexico? My friend from Indiana has introduced a resolution affirming that this government could not look with complacency upon the establishment of monarchical government over any portion of this continent. But, sir, Mexico owes to subjects of monarchical governments a debt immensely greater than the amount due by her to our citizens. Mexico owes, as we are informed—if I mistake not, by Mr. Slidell—a debt of one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, of which by far the largest portion is due to the subjects of monarchical governments in Europe. If Mexico has a right to pay her debts by the cession of her territories, has not any other government, whose duty it is to protect its own citizens and obtain indemnity for their just claims, the same right that we have to demand that the claimants shall be paid in territory? And how can we, a sister republic, justify ourselves before the world in making a solemn declaration that we will not look with complacency upon the establishment of any monarchical government upon this continent—that we will resist the cession of any territory to any foreign government, when we are ourselves asserting the right of Mexico to transfer dominion over the States of that confederacy in satisfaction for the claims of our own citizens? I should like to be consistent before the world. I would make no avowal of right, claimed by us, which I would not equally concede to any other government.

But, sir, I deny entirely the power of Mexico to cede either to a monarchical government or to this republic, any portion of the sovereignty of the people of that confederacy, without their consent. I deny that the government of Mexico has a right to cede to the government of the United States a jurisdiction over Tamaulipas, for the purpose of satisfying the demands of our citizens against the Mexican government, which it is not convenient for her at this time to discharge. I deny that she has any more power to do so than the United States would have to cede one of the States of this Union, for the purpose of discharging any claims which might exist against the government on the part of the people of any foreign government. I ask, Mr. President, is it in the power of any of the States of this Union—of Mississippi, for example, or of any other State, owing debts which, at this moment it may not feel itself able to discharge—to cede a portion of its sovereignty for the purpose of discharging the debt? Has this Republic that power? If not, why? Because, like every other free government, ours is based upon the great principle that sovereignty vests in the people, and is ever inalienable without the assent of the people. We are, I believe, about to enter on a career for the establishment of a new principle which calls for the avowal by this republic of the doctrine—that we can deprive another people of their sovereignty, in order to obtain payment of the claims which we have against them. This, sir, is entirely in accordance with that spirit of rapacity which in other countries has led to the conquests made by kings claiming to govern by divine right. We hold a different theory. We have promulgated a different doctrine heretofore. We claim that all men are to be regarded as capable of self government—that in regard to their political rights they stand on the broad platform of equality, liberty, and freedom. It is our boast, sir, to cherish these principles—to manifest our sympathy wherever the spirit of republicanism exists. Europe now feels the influence of our example, and the great principles of free government begin to be acknowledged. Are we then now about to establish a different doctrine? Are we about to relapse into despotism? Are we to offer in our policy a justification of the conduct of those who have claimed by the divine right of Kings to indulge in rapacity and conquest? I hope not. And if the President of the United States asks us to wage the war with Mexico for the purpose of forcing from her a cession of her territory, it is due to him—it is due to ourselves—that we should respectfully ask of him to inform us upon what principle in the Government of that republic, we are authorized to demand that cession? I wish the President to inform us whether if Mexico should cede to us this territory which we are thus seeking to acquire, we should thereby acquire a right, independently of the will of those thus ceded to us, to exercise dominion over them; or whether we shall then be obliged to make a new treaty with those who are thus attempted to be transferred, before we shall acquire any right whatever over them. I do not deny—it is not necessary that I should deny—the power of one republic, feeling its inability to maintain its own sovereignty, to merge itself in that of another, as was done by the Government of Texas, though I do deny the power of this republic to acquire territory in the manner in which Texas was acquired without the consent of the people. But the Senator from Indiana says Mexico is not a republic, and it has always been conceded that a monarchy had the power to cede territory. I have an extract from a well-known writer on inter-national law which applies to this subject.

> "A nation ought to preserve itself: it ought to preserve all its members: it cannot alienate them, and it is under an obligation to them of maintaining them in the rank of members of the nation. It has not then a right to make a cession that would, on account of some advantages, put a part of the nation in a condition to be no longer united to the society, to be its members: they acknowledge the authority of the State to consider in cases of the common welfare such a step, and to take it at its disposal has a claim to a share of its strength."—Vattel, B. I. Ch. 16.

This is the basis upon which that confederacy was formed. The States of which it was composed, united themselves with the confederacy forming the republic of Mexico for the purpose of being protected and governed by it; not for the purpose of being transferred like cattle to another government, for the discharge of the debts of the republic. The doctrine that these States supposed that they might be dismembered and ceded away by the federal government, is equally at war with the principles of our own government and those of the government of Mexico.

But, says the Senator from Indiana, Mexico is not a republic—she is an anarchy. If so, I would ask, since when has she been a republic? When the United States declared war against her—when the act of Congress, May 13th, 1846, was passed, it was declared that "by the act of the republic of Mexico a state of war existed between that republic and the United States." We, therefore, recognized Mexico as a republic at that period. When did she, then, cease to be a republic? If she has ceased to be a republic, it is owing to the conquests of our arms. But, I trust, that that conclusion is not yet so complete that Mexico has ceased to be one of the nations of the Earth. I trust that the time never will arrive in which Mexico shall cease to be an independent republic, maintaining and cherishing the great principles upon which our own government is based, and under which we have enjoyed for so many years such a remarkable degree of prosperity.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I shall detain the Senate but an instant, and beg the indulgence of the Senator from Rhode Island, who has the floor on the special order. As to the position now assumed by the Senator from Connecticut, that if Mexico has the right to cede her territory to us for any purpose, she has the right at the same time to cede it to European monarchies, I have only to say that it involves a far higher principle, than has yet entered into this discussion—a principle in which I presume never will be settled, until the hour shall arrive, when the attempt shall be made by any European power, to establish a government upon this continent, out of any existing government. It involves a far higher principle than any involved even in this war. It will be time enough to discuss it, when the day arrives, which brings it up before us. The Senator asks if Mexico has ceased to be a republic—by whose act has she lost that character? He asks, if we have not gone there with the sword, and firebrand, pulling down her altars, and in lieu of an established government, giving the land to wild anarchy. I refer the Senator to history, for a reply to these questions. I refer him to the history of Mexico, from the downfall of Iturbide to the present hour, for the proof of her having been an anarchy. Her history is made up of a continued series of bloody revolutions, in which might and the sword have alone been regarded. She has no fundamental government or fundamental law that has ever been recognised. Santa Anna, and Bustamente, and Paredes, one military usurper after another, has by his arbitrary will constituted her fundamental law; and we, instead of being her despoilers, have gone to her as it were to scatter the manna of Heaven. Texas wrested herself from the clutches of that anarchical government, and see what she is to-day—a government of civilization, law and Christianity. Similar will be the result, I doubt not, with regard to all the territory that we may take from Mexico, if we take any. I do not know that we shall be able to take any, but so far as the subject matter of these resolutions is concerned, I must contend that they are improperly before the Senate at this time—that however germane they may become hereafter, (and certainly I think they never can be,) they are not now. When we have a treaty with Mexico which include within its terms the cession of territory by Mexico to the United States—then will be the proper time if ever, for the Senator from Connecticut to present his resolutions. Entertaining these views, in which I have been strengthened by the reflection which I have given the subject during the delivery of the honorable Senator's remarks; and with the most profound respect to the Senator, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were then ordered, and being taken, the result was as follows:

YEAS—Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Cameron, Cass, Davis, of Miss., Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Dawson, Felch, Fitzgerald, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Lewis, Mason, Moor, Sevier, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee—28.

NAYS—Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Butler, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Dayton, Greene, Johnson, (of Md.,) Johnson, (of La.) Mangum, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Sprague, Underwood, Upham, and Webster—22

So the resolution was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed an act for the relief of Pamela Cazen, legal administrator of John Cox, deceased, of Boston, in which I am directed to ask the concurrence of the Senate.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives has signed an enrolled bill, which I am now handed over to the Senate for the signature of its President.

SIGNING OF A BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the enrolled bill authorizing the issuing of a register to the barque Sarah and Eliza.

BILLS FROM THE HOUSE.

The following bills from the House of Representatives, severally had a first reading:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to reorganize the General Land Office," approved July 4, 1836.

An act for the relief of Pamela Cazen, legal administrator of John Cox, deceased, of Boston.

MR. HANNEGAN'S RESOLUTIONS.

On motion by Mr. MANGUM, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order of the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The special order of the day is the resolutions submitted on the 10th instant by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—When I introduced these resolutions to the Senate, I named this day for their discussion, as a distant day, not anticipating that the debate on the military bill would be protracted so long. It is now obvious, I think, that that debate will not be closed in two weeks, and I therefore propose, if the Senate will allow me, to postpone the consideration of my resolutions till the second Monday in February, and ask that they be made the special order for that day.

The resolutions were accordingly postponed to, and made the special order for the second Monday in February.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. BUTLER.—I ask the indulgence of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island whilst I make some explanation of a statement made in the course of my remarks the other day, relative to the march of General Taylor from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande. On that occasion, my distinguished friend from Mississippi, (Mr. DAVIS,) from the kindest motives, diverted my attention in some measure by reference to facts upon which I intended to have founded a somewhat more elaborate argument than I presented to the Senate. Since that time, I have found that it would be but just to myself that I should advert again to the subject, especially as I have reason to believe that both my friend and myself labored under some degree of misapprehension with regard to the real state of the facts. I have had an opportunity of receiving from several officers of the army a very minute detail of all the facts connected with the transaction to which I have referred. General Taylor received his orders to move from Corpus Christi in the month of January. These orders were published to the army, they were known to the traders between Corpus Christi and the Rio Grande, and as my informants give me to understand, it was notorious in Matamoras, before General Taylor moved at all, that he intended to take up a position upon the Rio Grande. On the 11th of March the army was set in motion; on the 22d or 23d of that month, it reached the Little Colorado, 110 miles from Corpus Christi, and only forty miles from Point Isabel. At the Colorado, General Taylor heard the sound of a bugle beyond the Western bank. There was some parley, and Major Mansfield was despatched to the other side of the river to learn the cause of the bugle being sounded. The Major was informed by a person at the head of a very small party, who represented himself to be the Adjutant General of the Mexican troops, but who was, as I understand, an apothecary from Matamoras—commanding eight or ten men, and who had no doubt sounded the bugle very magnificently, and went home loudly proclaiming that he had driven back General Taylor—that his object was not at all to oppose military resistance to the march of General Taylor, but only to warn him against crossing that river, as, if he did cross it, it would be deemed an open act of hostility. Well, General Taylor continued his march, and as he approached Point Isabel, the Custom House and other public buildings were consumed by fire and a settlement of about fifty inhabitants was broken up; from which time the American forces occupied the country from Point Isabel to Fort Brown opposite Matamoras. Well now, the inference which I intended to draw and which I shall not now take the liberty of drawing in anything like an argument—was simply this, that General Taylor had given notice of his march under orders of his government—that there was no declaration of hostilities on the part of Mexico at all until that march commenced—and that in my solemn conviction there never would have been any attack on the forces at Corpus Christi had not General Taylor, under the order of the President of the United States, gone on the disputed territory.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I thank the honorable Senator for the very kind and complimentary language which he has employed in reference to myself. I cannot, however, agree with any one of the inferences which he has drawn. I have nothing to say as to minute details which he has given with respect to distances and so on, the only vital question being who acted first—who gave the first order? That order came from Mexico—not to fight with General Taylor for the country between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, but to invade and reconquer the State of Texas. That order first emanated at the seat of government in Mexico before any order was issued from the seat of government in the United States. And now, sir, as to the time at which the Mexican forces moved to take possession of the Little Colorado. I believe they had been there for months. Their emmissaries had been in Gen. Taylor's camp in order to learn his position and movements. Gen. Taylor never gave notice of his march. He made his preparations for the march, and no doubt the spies and reconnoitering officers were cognizant of his intentions. But I believe the Mexicans had been at the Colorado for months; and when they gave notice that if he crossed, the Little Colorado it would be considered an act of war, the Mexicans but took the initiatory, as they have always taken it; for Mexico has always struck the first blow in every battle field on which we have met her. On some other occasion, however, I may dwell more at length on this point. I shall not now trespass longer on the time of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BUTLER.—Though I may in some measure encroach upon the time of the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, yet I cannot suffer myself to be thus far misrepresented. The information which I acquired was obtained not from one officer merely, but from three or four who happened to be in the same room. They knew this much, that from January, when Gen. Taylor received his orders, until the 11th of March when he put his army in motion, there had elapsed a period of forty days, and that during that time not only the officers in General Taylor's camp spoke of his projected movement upon the Rio Grande, but the traders who were there by implied license, attached to the army, had an opportunity to learn the same information, and it was notorious that he would march. Not that he advertised the enemy, because the gentleman will understand that at the time General Taylor marched on the Rio Grande it was with no purpose of meeting an enemy. The administration had not assumed to go there for the purpose of making war. General Taylor received no orders to disguise his movements; and the intelligence was as well known in Matamoras four or five days after he received his orders, as it was in his own camp. I am very far from questioning the military sagacity of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, and it may have been that orders had been issued by Paredes to cross the Rio Grande and attack General Taylor at Corpus Christi, but the act must rest on conjecture. It can never be reduced to anything like historical certainty.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I am reluctantly compelled also to solicit for a moment the indulgence of the Senator from Rhode Island, in order to set myself right with regard to some observations made by the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations during this debate. I had taken occasion to remark that the resolutions as introduced by Mr. Ross in the Senate of the United States in 1803, were not supported by the Jeffersonian democrats [illegible] as conveyed of legislation on their part; and now the [illegible] course of the Administration of that period was adverse to, or directly in conflict with the policy which now seems to have [illegible] to those who claim to be the followers of Mr. Jefferson. The honorable Chairman of the Committee undertook to [illegible] I was mistaken, and sent to the Secretary's table the act of 3d March, 1803, authorizing the President of the United States to call out 80,000 militia for certain purposes authorized by that act, and the honorable Chairman inferred from the act itself that I was in error when I said that the administration of that day had not sought conquest or seizure of any portion of the territory of Spain or France. Sir, I was entirely right in what I said in reference to this subject, as I think the Senator will admit, when he looks at the 4th section of the act to which he himself referred. That section on its face explicitly declares that the act was passed authorizing the President to call out militia "for the security of the territory of the United States"—not for the purpose of seizing upon the island of New Orleans, where the right of deposite had been denied us—not for the purpose of conquering or seizing any portion of the Spanish territory, but in the [illegible] words declares—"for the security" of our own possessions.

It will be recollected by gentlemen conversant with the history of that period, that by the treaty with Spain of October, 1795, ratified in '96, the right of deposite at New Orleans had been secured for persons trading on the Mississippi. The Intendant of New Orleans violated that treaty by a proclamation denying the right of deposite to our western traders. It was afterwards conceded by Spain, that this was a downright violation of a clear treaty right, as beyond all doubt it was. But what was the course of our government in relation to that case? I have now before me the correspondence which took place on this subject, and to it I beg to call the attention of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

[The honorable Senator then gave in a condensed form the historical details, which are here given more at length, in order that the whole matter may be clearly understood.

By the 4th article of the treaty with Spain of October 27, 1795, it is provided:

[illegible]

By the 22d article of the same treaty it was declared, that

"His Catholic Majesty will permit the citizens of the United States, for the space of [illegible] to deposit their merchandise and effects in the port of New Orleans, and to export them from thence without paying other duties than such as may be established for the inhabitants of the country, promising to assign to them, after the said term, another place on the banks of the river Mississippi, equally convenient."

So early as March 29, 1801, Mr. King, the Minister of the United States at London, informed his government of the probability of the cession of Louisiana by Spain to France; of the injurious effect of this cession upon the union or welfare of the United States, and of the importance of committing the interests of the United States to an able representative at the court of France.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, in a despatch to Mr. Livingston, the Minister of the United States in France, dated the 28th September, 1801, informed him of the rumored transfer of Louisiana by Spain, and instructed him, that the United States desired to obtain that country by purchase.

Mr. King, the 20th of November, 1801, communicated to his government a copy of the treaty between France and Spain, of March 21, 1801; by the fifth article of which Louisiana was conferred to France.

February 5, 1802, Mr. King, at London, communicated to his government intelligence, that it was definitively settled by France to send a colony to Louisiana and Florida under General Bernadotte; and Mr. Livingston, at Paris, corroborated the information, the 26th of February, 1802, with the addition that "ten thousand troops had been assigned to General Bernadotte."

In March, 1802, Mr. Livingston represented to Mr. King, in London, and to his own government, the uncertainty in which he was kept by the French government, but exhibited the danger which would attend the occupation of Louisiana by France, that it was impossible to say what influence it might exert over the western country, with the key of its trade in their possession; and an undefined and illimitable territory around.

On May 1, 1802, Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, instructed Mr. Livingston of the painful apprehension with which the cession of Louisiana to France was viewed by the United States, and to use proper means to divert France from her contemplated colony; to ascertain whether the cession extends to the Floridas; and to learn the price at which New Orleans and the Floridas would be yielded to the United States: and Mr. King, in London, was informed that the administration was aware of the troubles which might arise from the reported cession of Louisiana, and that it was their primary object to obviate such an event.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, instructed Mr. Pinckney, Minister of the United States at Spain, under date of May 11 1802, that if the cession of Louisiana by Spain to France, have failed for any cause, and Spain still retain New Orleans and the Floridas, it is the wish of the President that every effort and address be employed to obtain the arrangement by which the territory on the east side of the Mississippi, including New Orleans, may be ceded to the United States; and that in every view it would be a most precious acquisition. He also authorizes him to propose advantageous offers and guarantees to Spain.

On May 28, 1802, Mr. Livingston communicated to his Government more positive intelligence respecting the cession, applied to the Spanish Minister, in France, to know the terms of cession; asserted the right of the United States to be made a party to any convention affecting the free navigation of the Mississippi; but received only a general answer, admitting the fact of the cession having been made.

On the 16th August, 1802, Mr. Livingston informed the Secretary of State, that General Victor was appointed to command the expedition to Louisiana instead of Bernadotte: that his force was limited to 3,000 men, and his supplies to two millions of francs; that there are symptoms of ill humor between France and Great Britain; and that the claim of France under the cession, extends to the Floridas.

And again on 1st September, of the same year, Mr. Livingston was informed by the French Government, that his propositions on the subject of Louisiana were premature, and that possession must be first taken by France. He informed his Government that he had reason to believe the Floridas were not included in the cession; and that the armament (for Louisiana) will be ready in about six weeks.

Mr. Livingston, under date October 28, and November 2, 1802, communicated to the President the state of European affairs, and that he thought the conduct of France had excited the suppressed hostility of Europe. That in England especially events tended to a rupture; and that in this feeling the minority and majority coincided. That the military expedition to Louisiana had received a check; and, desiring to profit by events, Mr. Livingston asked from his Government more distinct authority, and more explicit instructions.

And again on November 11, 1802, Mr. Livingston addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, stating that the difficulty which had temporarily arrested the expedition to Louisiana was removed. That orders had been given for the immediate embarkation of troops (two brigades) for Louisiana. That the Government of France would give no reply to his notes concerning their objects, the limits of Louisiana, or the rights of the United States under the treaty with Spain. And, judging from the temper of General Victor, attempts might be made upon Natchez as the rival of New Orleans; and that the territory of the United States might not be exempt from danger.

On November 27, 1802, Mr. Livingston informed the American Minister in Spain, that the Spanish Intendant at New Orleans had prohibited the deposit of American effects, as stipulated by the treaty of 1795; and that, as the proclamation of the Intendant was interpreted, the war was spent against the external commerce of the United States from that port. He dwelt on the importance of the right of the Department to the Western States the general irritation, and difficulty to restrain it; and instructed, him, while presuming on a prompt disavowal by Spain, to urge measures to repair the past, and ensure for the future, an observance of the treaty.

Dec. 12, 1802. The President of the United States intimated to Congress that the cession of Louisiana to France might render necessary a change in the Foreign relations of the United States.

January 29, 1803. Mr. Madison informed Mr. King that a special mission to France had been resolved on; and that while the United States wished to preserve peace with all, they are bent on the maintenance of their rights.

1802, December 23. Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, in a letter to Mr. Livingston, says:

In the latter end of the last month, we received information from New Orleans of the infraction of the deposite there, for a year and indefinite, stipulated by the treaty with Spain, without an equivalent establishment being assigned. A copy of the proclamation is enclosed. * * * Should it not be revoked before the time of the descent of the boats, in the Spring, both the injury and the irritation from it will be greatly increased. The House of Representatives passed a resolution, the 19th of this month, calling for information on the subject. The result of their deliberations cannot be anticipated; but I may hazard the remark that while we have no clear foundation on which to impute this infraction to orders of the Spanish govern[illegible] [illegible] country, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

These references will all be found in the 2d volume of American State Papers, under the head of "Foreign Relations."

I next quote from Marbois' Louisiana, p. 230.

1803, January. Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Monroe:

"WASHINGTON, January 10, 1803.

DEAR SIR—I have but a moment to inform you of the heavy note which this packet must throw by, the affair at New Orleans, inculding [illegible] the most active and great wrath the federal interest. Decision to our rights, or war, is the [illegible] we are compelled to it, on [illegible] of [illegible] to prevent this GREAT OUTRAGE to the present possessors [illegible] alone. I shall to-morrow nominate you to the Senate for an extraordinary mission to France, and [illegible] state circumstances such as to render it [illegible]. [illegible]

Accept affectionate salutations.

THOMAS JEFFERSON."

March 3, 1803, the act referred to by the honorable Chairman of Foreign Relations (Mr. Sevier) was passed—"an act directing a detachment from the militia of the United States, and for erecting certain arsenals," by which the President was authorized to call on the Executive of the States for 80,000 militia; and the object of the act distinctly avowed in the 4th Section, to be "FOR THE SECURITY OF THE TERRITORY OF THE UNITED STATES." This is the object and the only object avowed in the act. It is thus clearly proved to have been an act passed not for conquest, but to meet the threatened danger of a French aggression.

Not a man was ever called for. The idea of seizure for conquest never was entertained for a moment, and the whole controversy was speedily settled by the treaty of 1803, which ceded Louisiana to the United States.

Such is the history of this most interesting period in our national affairs. It was distinguished for the moderation, prudence and forbearance of our rulers. The resolutions of Mr. Ross, to which I referred on a former occasion, were first deprived of their hostile characteristic, "to authorise the President to take immediate possession of such place or places in the island of New Orleans or the adjacent territories, as he may deem fit and convenient," every democrat voting to strike it out. See files of National Intelligencer for February 28, 1803. The bill reported in pursuance of the resolutions, as amended and adopted on the same day by the same party, avowed its object to be the same with these resolutions as thus amended—"the security of the territory of the United States," threatened, as we have seen, with invasion by the French army under General Victor.

Those who may desire to prosecute this interesting enquiry further, will find the whole pacific policy of the Republican party fully explained in the then existing organ of that party, by recurring to the files of the National Intelligencer for 1803: February 23, 25; March 9, 14, 23, 30, and April 22d. The essay published in that paper under the last date, shows that the party at that day scouted the whole doctrine on which this Mexican war has been and is now supported. They demanded a disavowal by Spain of the act of the Intendant at New Orleans, which denied to us our treaty right of deposit, instead of declaring war on account of it; and they obtained it without bloodshed. But in 1846, when the first aggression against us was committed on the Rio Grande, our government treated the act of the Mexican officer who took Thornton's dragoons, as an act of war instead of demanding a disavowal of it as the republican party did in the case of Spanish aggression in 1803.—The opposition in 1803 clamored for war on account of the proclamation of the Spanish Intendant at New Orleans denying our right of deposit. The answer given to this clamor by the democratic party is fully set forth in all their speeches and meetings at that day on the subject. The writer I have referred to in the party organ on the 22d April, 1803, thus meets the clamor:

"To involve the nation in all the horrors of war for the unlawful act of a subordinate officer, would be the height of political depravity. It would introduce a rule of which we could not complain, and under which the nation at future time might be involved in war by the unlawful or wanton act of any of her officers. It would be virtually, transferring the all important question of war and peace from the representatives of the people, and the government of the country to [illegible] regions. The act of an individual officer is not an act of the nation till sanctioned by the nation to which he belongs, so it is impossible for the latter to [illegible] and [illegible] governments to control the actions of its agents and subjects on all occasions. Hence it follows, that the government by declaring war would have committed an act of injustice against Spain, establishing a precedent which might prove fatal to the future peace of the nation, and justly merited the execration of the world!

Had these principles been applied in 1846 by our Executive, had a demand been made (as was then urged by the opposition in this chamber,) on Mexico to avow or disavow the act by which it was alleged, that American blood had been shed on American soil, and repair any injustice, there would have been no war. Such a demand was made by the government when the Leopard made the infamous attack on the Chesapeake, and the consequence was a disavowal which saved us the necessity of treating the attack as war. But in the case of Mexico, the principles which formerly governed us were abandoned, and the act which was unilateral and not even avowed or justified by Mexico herself, was immediately declared to be war by us without allowing the Mexican government any opportunity to disavow it. This was as hostile to the true principles of international law as it was in direct opposition to the whole former course of this government.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Really, sir, I think it hardly fair that the Senator from Rhode Island should be called upon at this late hour of the day, to go on and address the Senate.

Mr. CLARKE.—It was my expectation to have occupied the floor at the appointed hour, but as so much time has been taken up in the discussion this morning, and so much more will probably be required to finish it—so far as regards myself, I will readily give way if it be the wish of the Senate that the present discussion should continue. Indeed, I should myself prefer that the special order should be postponed until to-morrow, as it is now so late, that in all probability I should not be able to conclude my argument to-day, even if I should commence it. I wait the pleasure of Senators in regard to it.

Mr. SEVIER.—It is not my purpose to interfere with the time which belongs to the gentleman if he desires to go on now, but I wish to make a brief explanation in regard to what has been stated by the honorable Senator from Delaware. It will be recollected that, when the Senator addressed the Senate upon the ten regiment bill, he referred to Mr. Ross's resolutions with a view of contrasting the policy of Mr. Jefferson with that of Mr. Polk in reference to the disputed territory.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be and he hereby is authorized to call on the Executive of the several States to take effectual measures to organize, arm, and equip, according to law, and hold in readiness to march at a moment's warning, such [illegible] militia, [illegible] thereof.

Resolved, That the President may, if he deems it expedient, authorize the Executives of the several States to accept, as a part of the detachment aforesaid, any corps of volunteers, who shall continue in service for such time, not exceeding —— months, and perform such services as shall be prescribed by law.

Resolved, That —— [illegible] appropriated for the [illegible] the troops aforesaid, whose actual service may be wanted, and for defraying such other expenses as, during the recess of Congress, the President may deem necessary for the security of the territory of the United States.

Resolved, That —— dollars be appropriated for erecting, at such place or places on the western waters as the President may judge most [illegible]

I supposed he had not traced these resolutions through to their ultimate disposition, and I, therefore, asked him to give me the date of the resolutions, and he did so by sending the journal to my desk. I then traced the subject from the period to which the Senator had alluded to the final disposition of the resolutions, and what was that? I found they had been referred in secret session to a select committee, and in the formation of that committee, for reasons not apparent to me, the mover of the resolutions was not included. Mr. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, was chairman of the committee. That committee to whom Ross's resolutions were referred reported an act carrying out every substantial provision contained in them. And what were these provisions? Why, that in time of profound peace, the President was authorized to raise an army of eighty thousand men, and was further authorized to establish on the western waters two public armories, and finally the bill wound up with an appropriation of a million or so of money to carry these objects into effect. When I perceived this, the conviction in my mind was, that the honorable Senator in the hurry and heat of debate had not taken time to trace the thing to its final conclusion.

My friend from Mississippi a day or two afterwards, in commenting on this matter, referred to these resolutions, and in his haste I suppose that he had omitted to refer to what I certainly deemed important, which was the passage of the act to which I have referred, as carrying out the objects of the resolutions. I then put the matter right, as I understood it. Now, the Senator from Delaware again says that here is a case in which the father of democracy — to whose church we all profess to belong, at the instance of the Federal party of that day refused to do what? why, in a time of peace, to seize the territory of an adjoining power. Now, there was in the treaty of 1796 with Spain, a provision by which the rights of the government was secured to a depot at New Orleans for the term of three years; and there was a provision also that if the Spanish government, for any reason of hers, should choose to deny the right of this government to that depot in New Orleans, then for the term of three years she was bound to give us another location for said depot. This was in 1796. The time for the assignment of the depot to either place had run out by the limitation of this treaty; the people of this country—the people of the Western States, thus deprived of an outlet for their produce had resolved to obtain it. A claim was set up by Mr. Jefferson that inasmuch as we owned the navigable waters of the Mississippi, and owned the head of the navigable stream—set in had a right, under the law of nations, to follow the river into the ocean. That was the point of discussion, if my memory serves me right, by our minister at the French court, as well as by our statesmen at home. Well, sir, we could not get that, and then with closed doors we passed the act of March, 1803, before referred to, of which Ross's resolutions were the foundation.

Now, no man here, or anywhere else, would ever have made out what the law really meant from its terms, unless he had taken the precaution of connecting it with the resolutions upon which it was founded. Upon this claim, therefore, the law was passed; and upon no other, for there was no other. My friend referred to the act as an evidence that the party of which Mr. Jefferson was the head, intended to act thus in reference to the acquisition of Louisiana. Well, I say now—and I shall, if I have the opportunity, at some future time—proceed to demonstrate that every opportunity to acquire territory, to wit: Louisiana, the Floridas, and Texas, has been obtained by the democratic power of this country.

But this is not all. I have said that this act was passed, if I recollect rightly, on the 3d of March, 1803; and at that very time our Ministers were in Paris treating for this very country with Napoleon Bonaparte. They were treating for this very depot. He refused to sell us the depot, but proposed to sell the whole of Louisiana. That is the history of the matter. We sent our Ministers there to purchase a depot. They refused to sell a depot—but being about to go to war with England—and being loath to lose the territory of Louisiana by conquest, France proposed to sell it to a friendly power. Well, in the month of April, just one month after the passage of the bill, we succeeded in making a treaty, by which we acquired the whole of Louisiana. Thus that matter was accomplished. Again, in 1806, still in the time of this great patriot, Mr. Jefferson, the Senate still, with closed doors, conceived that it was necessary for the Government to own the country lying on the Mississippi river and between that river on one side, and the Perdido on the other. Thus the father of democracy submitted to the Senate with closed doors his proposition to seize this territory also; and a law was passed for that purpose; and under the act passed thus secretly—covered up with diplomatic phraseology—it was proposed to obtain possession of this territory. This act passed in 1806, and was carried into effect in 1809 or 11, when we took possession of Louisiana into the Union. A man by the name of Casares took it upon himself to revolutionize that portion of the country. He expelled the Spanish functionaries from it and made it his own, including Baton Rouge, calling it Fredonia. Mr. Madison took possession without the authority of any law, and at the next session an act was passed making it a part of Louisiana. But this is not all; we had afterwards a war with the Seminoles; and in the time of peace with Spain we followed these Indians into St. Marks and Pensacola, expelling from those places Spanish authority. All this was done without the authority of law, and one of the most designing Executive proceedings on our part was not that we had any claim to Florida, but that the British had built, during the revolutionary war, a fort near the junction of the Flint and Chatahoochee rivers, which fort was occupied by hostile Seminole Indians and Negroes.

I can refer my friend to another case; I mean the case in which the country lying upon the Aristook, was contended for between us and Great Britain. This was a case happening in our own time, when General Fairfield, whose death we have recently been called to deplore, at the head of our own troops marched his forces into the disputed territory, and took possession of it without the sanction of Congress. There are numerous cases, all tending to the same point, that whenever it becomes impracticable to obtain territory by purchase, we take it by force. All that strip of country lying between Natchez, and Baton Rouge, was taken possession of in that way, and we have done so in all cases, when we could not obtain territory by negotiation, as this course has been pursued throughout the world in all times, by all powers. Territories to which we have claim by negotiation, we take by force if we can, and think it expedient to do so.

Mr. FOOTE.—I regret that it seems so difficult to settle completely, the point now under discussion. It would really appear that enough had been said in the former debate on this subject, to convince even the Senator from Delaware, that he had committed a serious error in regard to the Ross resolutions, and the action of the Jeffersonian Democracy in 1803. The honorable Senator still insists, as he has formerly done, that Mr. Jefferson and the democrats associated with him, were so little inclined to efficient measures against Spain, that the proposition to seize upon territory adjacent to New Orleans, which the Senator, from Delaware still supposes to have been embodied in Mr. Ross's resolutions, was relinquished in consequence of negotiation being preferred to measures of a warlike character and tendency. I read the other day, for the elucidation of this point, an extract from the annual message of Mr. Jefferson, issued in October, 1803, showing that previous to the introduction of the Ross resolutions, negotiations for the acquisition of Louisiana had been in progress at Paris—and that the negotiation was not preferred simply as an alternative to war in the case mentioned, but negotiations for the purpose mentioned having been, for sometime, already in progress it was supposed judicious not to interrupt them as would inevitably been the case by the adoption of measures of a decidedly hostile character. The truth is, as has been repeatedly explained, that the Ross' resolutions did not contemplate the seizure of territory at all, but simply the restoration of the place of deposit in the island of New Orleans which had been discontinued by the action of the Spanish authorities. No one can examine the history of this case, as several times already exhibited, without being convinced of the total want of analogy between it and the movements in the neighborhood of the Rio Grande. I will not elaborate this point more at present, but am called again to refer to the extract from Mr. Jefferson's annual message of October, 1803, explanatory of the actual facts of the case, and shall submit the point in dispute without further discussion.

Mr. CLAYTON.—If I understood the honorable Senators on whose side they stand on questions of construction, that Mr. Jefferson and the democratic party ever since have proceeded on the principle that they will take what they want and what they can get from other nations in any way in which they can get it; if they cannot get what they want by negociation they will take it by force. The honorable Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations distinctly avows now, that this has been the past policy of the democratic party from the time of Mr. Jefferson down to this day; and therefore, he says, they are only acting in the same spirit that led Jeffersonians to consider that they propose that what they cannot get by negociation they will proceed to take by force. Sir, this is exactly the issue between the honorable Senator and myself. I not only seek to vindicate the memory of the statesmen of those times, but I seek also to show that I was previously right when, in the course of this debate, I pointed out the strong contrast between the conduct of this government in reference to Mexico and the conduct of Mr. Jefferson and the administration party of 1803 in reference to Spain and France. Sir, I have nothing to do now with the question, nor do I intend to be drawn into the discussion of it by the remarks of the honorable Chairman on Foreign Relations, as to the conduct of the various administrations in regard to this matter of the acquisition of territory, from the time of Mr. Jefferson. I think that on a former occasion the course of the government in 1806 was placed in a very satisfactory point of view before this Senate in the discussion which took place between the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and the honorable Senator from Maryland who sits near me. I will not, therefore, trespass upon ground which has been so well occupied before: all I wish is to bring the honorable Chairman back to the point from which he set out, and that he and the honorable Senator from Mississippi should acknowledge that they have mistaken the spirit of Jeffersonian democracy in 1803 in endeavoring to attribute to the administration of that time a disposition to take by force that which they could not obtain by negociation. Now, what application has the honorable Chairman given to the act of which he speaks? The fourth section of the act of 1803 expressly declares the object for which the act was passedt to authorize the President of the United States to call out eighty thousand militia; for what purpose? In its own words, for the security of the territory of the United States; not for the purpose of seizing upon the island of New Orleans or any portion of the country of the lower Mississippi; not for the purpose of taking an acre of ground any where by violence. I think this has already been clearly shown, and I do not intend to dwell upon it now. Mr. Livingston, in 1802, wrote to the Secretary of War, informing him that the Emperor of France was about to send ten thousand men to take possession of the country lying at the mouth of Mississippi, and General Victor was ordered to march thither with his two brigades; and from the known temper and disposition of that general there was every reason to believe that he would march and seize upon the territory. The act of 1803 proceeded from that cause, and the gentleman cannot make it appear that there was any other object than the security of our own territory contemplated. We know from the history of the times how that territory was situated.

Sir, I know I have had my full share in the discussion of this subject, and that I cannot again trespass upon the time of the Senate; I will not read the letters of the Secretary of War; I will, however, take the liberty of handing them to the reporters that they may be published to the world, and it will be seen from them whether my attempt to vindicate the character of those who administered the government at that time has been successful or not.

Mr. SEVIER.—Only one word, sir. The Senator from Delaware has referred to the fourth section of the act as being intended to protect the United States against invasion.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I referred to the whole act. It avows throughout the purpose for which it was passed.

Mr. SEVIER.—The Senator says it avows its purpose. Well, I ask it any man, in either country, ever heard or ever dreamed of a time when France and England were both at peace, or France intending to invade the United States?

Mr. CLAYTON.—Yes, sir. I refer the honorable Senator to the substance of these letters with which he seems not at all acquainted. I refer him also to the American state papers which he has in his possession.

Mr. SEVIER.—I have read those documents, but I have not drawn the same conclusion from them, which the honorable Senator from Delaware has drawn. No, sir, France, expecting a rupture with England, was on the eve of sending a force to protect her commerce. Not having a naval force sufficient to cope with England, she was for sending men to her possessions on this continent. The Senator talks about the territory between Natchez and Baton Rouge; well, we all know that was claimed by Spain as belonging to her. And it was with a view not only of protecting her own possessions but those of Spain also, that she took this precaution. Well, this happened in 1802, and it is really remarkable, if we had expected an invasion from France that earlier and more efficient preparation had not been made and that the fact was not noticed by Mr. Jefferson in his annual message of that year. No, sir, France never designed to invade this country. She was our early ally, and with all the opprobrium that was heaped upon her she could not be driven into hostilities towards this country. She has always been friendly to us, and I hope she ever will be. The documents which he has read, show that it was the intention of France in sending troops to this country, solely to protect French Louisiana from invasion by England. I before remarked, sir, that it is very difficult for us to ascertain the true meaning of an act, without looking back to the circumstances which existed at the time of its passage. In this way we may discover its object. Another act of a similar character, covering up its true meaning, was the act purporting to enable the President to carry on more efficiently, our diplomatic intercourse between this country, and foreign powers, when in reality the true intention of the act, was to enable the President to purchase Louisiana. Now, it happens as far as my argument is concerned, that these cases are not at all applicable to the case to which the Senator designed to apply them, for I never endeavored to show, and shall probably endeavour to show if I ever do on occasion, and shall probably endeavour to show it again, that our title to the country between the Nueces, and the Rio Grande, which the Senator has assimmilated to the cases which he has referred, is clear. I regret this controversy; but, I think, when the Senator looks upon it dispassionately he will admit that we have a good claim as I said before, and if we cannot obtainour rights by negotiation and purchase we will be compelled, from the necessity of the case, to maintain by force.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I will only say, sir, that in looking into the documents to which I have called the attention of the Senate, I find that there is much additional evidence. There are many other letters which, if the honorable Senator will examine them, will perfectly convince him that France entertained a deliberate design to seize upon that region of country—that it was a favorite object with her for a long period, and that there was every reason to believe on the part of Mr. Livingston, and he so wrote to his own government—that the French Emperor entertained this project, and as he refused to give any information as to the object of the expedition, or any explanation of the grants of Louisiana, which he intended to claim—Mr. Livingston had every reason to believe that the territories of the United States were in danger. That was the object, and the only object of the act of March, 1803, to protect the territories of the United States. Sir, I have done.

Mr. PEARCE.—The Senator from Arkansas, having referred to a controversy between him and myself at the last session of Congress, the Senate will indulge me, I hope, not in arguing the question afresh, but in restating what I then endeavored to maintain.

It will be recollected that the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. BADGER) had charged the President with being the author of the war, by ordering the movement of Gen. Taylor's army from the Nueces to the Rio Grande, which he considered an act of war.—He sustained himself in this position by the authority of Mr. Jefferson. In 1805 Mr. Jefferson informed Congress, in a secret message, that immediately after the acquisition of Louisiana, he had opened negotiations with Spain, to obtain from that power the delivery of certain portions of Louisiana, which she held in violation of the rights transferred to us by France—that his negotiations had been utterly vain—that he could not venture to take possession of these portions of Louisiana in the possession of Spain, because such an act might transfer the relations of the country from a state of peace to a state of war, which was not within the constitutional competency of the Exedutive, and belonged solely to the legislative power.

To this the Senator from Arkansas replied, that the example of Mr. Madison was contrary to that of Mr. Jefferson and that Mr. Madison had of his own authority seized upon what were called the Florida Parishes. To this I replied that Mr. Madison did not assume to have any other authority than that to which Mr. Jefferson limited himself. The situation of the Florida parishes was peculiar: a body of private individuals in 1810, seven years after the acquisition of Louisiana, had driven out the Spanish authorities in Baton Rouge, and had set up an independent government, though professing their willingness to come into the Union. In this condition of things Mr. Madison had issued his proclamation reciting these occurrences—saying that the territory in question had always been claimed as being within the limits of Louisiana—that a crisis had at length arrived subversive of the Spanish authority and that under the peculiar circumstances of the case, forbearance on the part of the United States to occupy the territory in question might be construed into a dereliction of their title; to which he added that though the laws of the United States had not yet been extended over this territory, yet they had been so framed as to be adapted to them, and contemplated their application to this region at some future time. Congress was not then in session, but as soon as they met Mr. Madison laid before them an account of his proceedings, which, if not expressly, at least impliedly recognized the paramount authority of the legislature over the subject. The difference between this case and the march of the troops to the Rio Grande, is palpable. Mr. Madison did not think himself authorizad to seize upon such parts of Louisiana as still remained in the occupancy of Spain, and consequently the country east of the Perdido and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi territory, remained in possession of these authorities.

In January, 1811, Congress passed a secret resolution declaring that a due regard to the safety of the United States required them to provide for the temporary occupation of these territories, and subject to negotiation. Mr. Madison would not act without the authority of Congress; he knew that he could not rightfully do so; and therefore he asked to be armed with that authority, which Congress only could confer. The bill which followed this resolution conformed to it. Still Mr. Madison did not suppose the contingency had arrived until in 1813, when the secret act of July 12 was passed, which authorized the President to take possession of the Perdido country. Then, and then only, did Mr. Madison employ the military force of the United States for this purpose.—Now, the difference is this—Mr. Polk, while Congress was in session, and without their authority, and without invoking their constitutional power, by his own authority seized upon the valley of the Rio Grande, while Mr. Jefferson considered that such an act on his part would exceed his power, because it might transfer the relations of the country from a state of peace to a state of war. And Mr. Madison, in relation to the Perdido country, recognized the same doctrine, and in regard to the Florida parishes, only occupied a territory of which the foreign authorities were no longer in possession, and which was likely to be considered derelict if, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the United States should quietly permit it to remain in the possession of the private adventurers who held it.

Mr. SEVIER.—The Senator and myself are still at variance in our opinions. My position was, that the southern boundary of Louisiana was fixed by this government, by an act of Congress on her admission into the Union. Well; after this act was accomplished, a man of the name of Thomas, at the head of some Tennesseeans and Kentuckians, expelled the Spanish authority east of a line formed by the river Iberville, Lake Maurapay, and Pontchartrain, and thence to the Perdido, and when he had done so, he organized there a separate government, and called the county Fredonia; and after having established such government, Thomas applied to this government either to guarantee his republic, or to annex it to this Union. Well, what was done?

Mr. Madison in a time of peace, sends his forces and takes from these revolutionary patriots, the country acquired by their revolution, without the athority of Congress. Well, the Senator goes back to the act of 1806, for the authority for this act. Why in 1806, the government of Fredonia had no existence. After this had been done, the President asks Congress to aid in this, what shall I call it? robbery? that is a harsh term, yet it is precisely similar to the terms employed in referrence to our proceedings now.—Mr. Madison applies to Congress to add this country, thus seized in time of peace, without the warrant of law to the State of Louisiana; and Congress does it accordingly, and the act is now on your Statute book. Mr. Madisan first seized the country from those who had revolutionized it, and Congress sanctioned the plunder, if I may so call it, by adding it to Louisiana. Louisiana embraced it within her limits. and there it is at this day represented by my honorable friend Mr. Johnson. The further consideration of the subject was postponed until to-morrow.

CLERK TO SIGN LAND PATENTS.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, the bill from the House of Representatives to amend an act entitled "An act to re-organize the General Land Office," approved July 4, 1836, was read a second time, and considered on in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BREESE asked for the reading of a paper, which he sent to the Secretary, setting forth the number of land patents remaining unsigned, which was read accordingly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I dislike to be frequently intermedling in what may be regarded as little matters. I know the effect which such things have upon the personal standing of Senators, but I cannot allow such a bill as this to pass, having been in the minority of the committee, without stating to the Senate how I think the matter ought to be disposed of. When I first came into Congress in the other branch of this building there was no secretary to sign patents. It was alleged then, that as the land patents that were issued were numerous, it was necessary to have such an officer, and one was accordingly created with a salary of $1,500. And no other duty under the sun was assigned to him than that of signing these patents; and now we are informed that he cannot discharge that duty, and that there has been an accumulation of patents to the extent of some thirty or forty thousand, and we are called on to appoint an assistant secretary. Now, the question is, can one man do it? We made some experiments in the Committee on Public Lands the other day, and though it may seem trifling to refer to such things, yet it will serve to explain this matter in a way that no man can doubt the capacity of a single officer to sign all these land patents, and even double the number if necessary. He then proceeded to show, by calculation of time, that one person would be fully capable of performing the labor within less than two months.

Mr. BREESE.—I apprehend that no individual can be found who could accomplish it in that time, for it must be remembered that the Secretary must sign the name of the President as well as his own, and this too upon parchment. No one can labour day after day in that way, as the Senator seems to suppose, without danger of seriously impairing his intellect. The bill makes no appropriation at all; it does not propose to pay the Secretary one single dollar for his services. It is highly necessary that these patents should be issued, as they are the only evidence of title which the parties have. Under these circumstances I cannot see how the bill can be objected to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I have seen patents filled out with the President's name by the clerks in the office, so that the Secretary would only have to sign his own name. If you, instead of passing this bill, give a reasonable remuneration to some clerk foi doing the work you will have it speedily done. My word for it there are hundreds of individuals in this city who would be glad to undertake the work for two month's salary.

Mr. DOWNS.—If the honorable Senator desires to make an attack upon the Administration, or to offer opposition to the government, he had better take occasion to do so upon some more important question. This is a small matter, and which does not confer much power or patronage upon the government. I hope, therefore, the honorable Senator will withdraw his opposition.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana.—I can see no objection to the passage of the bill, especially as it does not propose any salary for the officer who is to be engaged.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I take it for granted, that if we employed a person to do our work that we will not refuse to pay him.

Mr. BREESE.—There is no salary proposed to be paid in this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—That is all very true; you do not propose to pay now, but he must be paid at some time or other.

Mr. MANGUM.—I would enquire of the honorable Chairman of the Committee how many patents there are unsigned?

Mr. BREESE.—By the report it appears that there are now fifty-seven thousand, and that they increase at the rate of seven thousand a month.

Mr. MANGUM.—I propose, sir, with the sanction of the honorable Chairman, that this bill be committed with instructions to the Committee, to amend it by providing for the employment, for a fixed period and for a reasonable compensation, of a person who shall sign these patents, and when the arrears are once brought up there can be no difficulty in keeping from falling behind.

Mr. DOWNS.—This bill has already passed the House of Representeatives, and it is very important to the population of the new States that it should be passed without delay, inasmuch as we are informed that there are fifty thousand patents now awaiting to be signed. I hope, therefore, the bill will be allowed to pass without amendment or recommitment.

Mr. MANGUM'S motion was subsequently withdrawn.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate and ordered to be read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 25, 1848.

REPORT FROM THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, made agreeably to law, showing the names and compensations of the clerks and other persons employed in that Department during the year 1847.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DICKINSON presented a memorial of S. J. Bowen, praying remuneration for services in the office of the second auditor of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Clyde, Wayne county, New York, praying the adoption of measures for perpetuating the growth of the potato in the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. ATHERTON presented two petitions of citizens of Charlestown, Massachusetts, praying for the repeal of a patent granted to William W. Woodworth; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. DIX presented joint resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of New York, in favor of restricting the franking privilege of members of Congress, and a modification of the rates of postage on newspapers; which were read, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. YULEE presented a memorial of citizens of Florida, remonstrating against the removal of the land office from Newmansville, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FELCH presented the petition of Peter Godfrey for leave to locate a section of land in lieu of section six in the Indian reservation at Flint river, in Michigan, which was reserved to him by Indian treaty, but has since been parted with to Harriet W. Smith; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of Peter W. Knaggs for leave to locate a section of land in lieu of two sections which were reserved to him by Indian treaty, on the Flint and Shiawassee rivers, in Michigan, but which have since been patented to other persons; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented the memorial of A. A. Frazier and Alvin Baker, owners of the brig Douglass, praying indemnity for losses sustained by them in consequence of the illegal seizure and detention of their vessel by the British government, while pursuing their lawful commerce; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, it was Ordered, That the petition of Oscar F. Pittman, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Frederick Dawson, James Schott, and Elisha D. Whitney; and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. CASS, it was

Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Mary Morris Foot; and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY.

Mr. BAGBY submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

Resolved, That Congress has no constitutional power to abolish or to prohibit slavery in any State or territory in this Union.

Resolved, That conquest is a legitimate means of acquiring territory, and so recognized by the laws and the universal practice of civilized nations.

Resolved, That if territory is hereafter acquired by the United States, either by treaty or conquest, it shall not be competent for the treaty making power, or Congress, to exclude slavery from such territory, either by treaty stipulation or by act of Congress; but such territory shall be equally free and open to the citizens of all the United States without any limitation, prohibition or restriction in regard to slaves or any other description of property whatsoever.

Before presenting the resolutions—

Mr. BAGBY, said: Mr. President: Perhaps there is something in the nature of our free and happy political institutions, to justify a departure from what, under a different form of government, might be considered the proper course for us, in our legislative capacities, to pursue. It is admitted, at least by me, as a general rule, that all propositions introduced into legislative bodies ought to be such as are intended to be followed up by some act of practical legislation. On the other hand, it is one of the axioms of the republican creed, that a frequent recurrence to first principles, is indispensably necessary to the preservation of liberty. The resolutions which I hold in my hand and which I shall presently ask leave to introduce, relate to a subject of very great moment, as I conceive to the prosperity and of still more transcendant importance to the tranquility of the country, and one on which it is peculiarly desirable at this time to have a clear and decided expression of opinion, and to settle it possible, definitively and forever. The first of these resolutions simply asserts what I understand to be the true position in relation to the powers of this government, over the question of slavery. The second contains a proposition from the correctness of which I apprehend no one will disent, and which, I should not have thought of bringing before a body so enlightened as this, but for the extraordinary remarks made here repeatedly, and continually, in regard to the acquisition of territory, if any should be acquired by conquest, in the war in which we are now engaged with Mexico. A stranger to the history of this war, and one ignorant of the provisions of our Constitution and principles of government, and of the code of nations to read speeches almost daily delivered by Senators in the opposition, would think that the acquisition of territory was a thing forbidden by the laws of nations, prohibited by the constitution, and unsanctioned by the great principles of an elevated, national morality. So far from these things being so, I repeat in the language of the second resolution that conquest is a legitimate mode of acquisition and so recognised by the laws and the universal practice of civilized nations. If any Senator is disposed to controvert this distinct substantive proposition, it will be much more convenient, and his arguments will be much better understood, than by mixing them up with other matter, to which they have no proper affinity in a general discussion upon the merits of the Mexican war, and the manner in which it should be conducted. I apprehend, however, that when the question is fairly stated and stript of all disguise none will be found of sufficient temerity to controvert it. I do not intend now, sir, to go at all into the discussion of the Mexican war. I do intend, however, with the permission of the Senate, before the debate is closed upon the bill now pending to increase the army, to offer my views in regard to it, in reference to the origin and conduct of the war, the objects for which it should be further prosecuted, and to declare clearly, openly, distinctly, and explicitly the course which, in my humble judgment, the government of the United States ought to pursue towards Mexico. The third resolution, sir, differs materially from any hitherto presented upon the subject. If this resolution, Mr. President, is unjust to any State of this Union, or any citizen of any State of this Union, and I can be convinced of it, I shall be the first to abandon it. If, on the contrary, it shall be found to be fair, and just, and equal in its effect and operation upon all the States and all the people of all the States—if it be true that territory acquired by the joint blood and treasure of a common country ought, in the language of the resolution, to be equally free and open to the citizens of all the States of this Union, without any limitation or restriction in regard to slaves or any other description of property whatsoever—I think I have a right to expect the unanimous vote of the Senate in favor of it. How far this (to my mind) reasonable expectation is to be realized belongs to the future, and I shall not attempt to decide it in advance. I flatter myself, however, that I shall at the proper time be able to make this proposition so plain, that he who runs may read, and the wayfaring man, though a fool, cannot err in regard to it. At present, I respectfully ask, that the resolutions be printed.

The resolutions were read, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL ROUTE.

Mr. BREESE submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Cairo city, by Thebes, in Illinois, to Cape Girardeau, Missouri.

GRANT OF LAND TO LOUISIANA.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the State of Louisiana for purposes of internal improvement, a quantity of land equal to that granted to the State of Indiana for the same purposes.

EXTENSION OF MARITIME JURISDICTION.

A[illegible] to notice, Mr. ASHLEY asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to extend the jurisdiction of the District Courts to certain cases upon the Lakes and navigable waters connecting the same," approved the 2d March, 1845, which was read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MILITARY HOSPITAL AT NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. DAVIS, (of Mississippi.)—I desire to state briefly the reasons which have governed the Committee in framing this bill, for which it is proposed to ask the most speedy action of the Senate. The Committee found themselves by the resolution referred to them, and the terms of the law making appropriation for disabled and indigent soldiers, restricted in their considerations to New Orleans. A large part of the appropriation of last year remains unexpended, and it is proposed to give to the Secretary of War power to apply a part of the existing balance to objects which are considered within the original design and necessary to its most advantageous execution. After deducting the proposed sum, there will remain, at least, two hundred thousand dollars of the unexpended balance of the amount appropriated, and no hazard is created of a deficiency in the supply necessary to relieve the wants of suffering soldiers, within the contemplation of that appropriation, during the current year.

The Committee have, in the course of their investigation, been satisfied of the safety of the point selected, and have been informed that during the epidemic which raged with more than ordinary violence during the last summer in New Orleans, no case of yellow fever originated at the United States' barracks. It has been found necessary to place from three to five hundred sick and wounded soldiers in private hospitals, at the rate of one dollar per day for each person. By the erection of a hospital as provided in the bill, the Committee believe that there would be a saving to the government should the war continue twelve months longer. It can hardly be supposed that we shall have a peace immediately, however much and unanimously we desire its return, but should we have our wishes most speedily granted, long after the blessing of peace is ours there will remain a necessity for hospital accommodations to provide for wounded and disabled soldiers, and the necessary loss under any state of events must be very small indeed.

In addition to this, the committe have considered the necessity for providing buildings for the accommodation of troops going to, or returning from Mexico. Every consideration which urges provision for the disabled applies to the protection of the efficient soldier [illegible] protection [illegible] the hospital would, after the advent, we all admit an obligation to cure. Exposure in the encampments below New Orleans, whilst waiting for transports, has been the fruitful cause of disease—men who had only known the comforts of hoque, are on the threshold of their military service met by privation and exposure in a climate deleterious, under the most favorable circumstances, to a northern constitution. Many a gallant and patriotic spirit has been crushed by other than the dangers to encounter which in the cause of his country he left the comforts of his peaceful home. Most of these could, I believe, have been saved by such provisions as are contemplated in this bill. By a recent letter from the surgeon of the hospital at New Orleans, I am informed that of three companies from my own State, there are fifty men now in hospital and there have been five deaths. Every motive enters into the obligation to provide for troops returning from the seat of war, equally requires provision for the protection of those who are going out, whilst policy adds the consideration due to the fact that death and disease, without the glory of battle, standing thus at the entrance into the country's service, more than anything else could, will discourage further volunteering and enlistment.

With these remarks I submit the bill.

The bill having been read a first time—

Mr. CRITTENDEN said: This is, I understand, the first reading of the bill. The Committee on Military Affairs unanimously agreed in recommending that this bill should be passed with as little delay as possible. If there be no objection, then, I ask that the bill may have its second reading; and, as it has been carefully engrossed in a clear hand, I hope that the Senate will also allow it to be read a third time and passed to-day.

The bill was then read a second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

[illegible]

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the memorial of Henry Washington, [illegible] report accompanied by a bill, to provide for the settlement of the claim of Henry Washington, late a deputy surveyor of the public lands in Florida.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of George Center, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

DEFALCATION IN THE MINT.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. CAMERON, on the 17th instant, for the appointment of a select committee to investigate the recent defalcation in the mint of the United States, at Philadelphia.

On motion by Mr. CAMERON, the resolution was postponed to, and made the special order for, Tuesday, the 15th February.

SUSPENSION OF GENERAL SCOTT.

Mr. CASS.—I believe the hour has now arrived for taking up the special order of the day.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I did not distinctly hear the honorable Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The Senator has moved to take up the special order.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Before that is done, I wish to remark, that there is a subject of considerable importance, now occupying much of the attention of the public, and which excites much conversation, in reference to which I desire to ask a question or two of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. The questions to which I desire to obtain an answer are, first: whether General Scott has been recalled or suspended from the command of the army in Mexico; and, secondly, whether General Worth has been relieved from his arrest, or whether he also has been suspended?

Mr. CASS.—If the honorable Senator from Kentucky should not receive my answer as any proof of my fitness to discharge the duties of Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I hope he will at any rate receive it as affording some evidence of my imperturbable humor. I would remark to the honorable Senator, however, that I know nothing upon this subject that is not fully within the control of every member of the Committee; and if he had gone, where I went, the same information would have been given to him, which has been given to me; and I am at liberty to say, that the administration will freely communicate on military subjects, with any member of the Military Committee, who may ask for information. With respect to the distinct questions put by the honorable Senator, I feel myself at perfect liberty to communicate all the facts in my possession, as I was expressly authorised to do. They are simply these: General Scott is suspended from the command of the army in Mexico, and the command now devolves upon the next officer in rank, who is General Butler. General Scott, as I understand, will attend the Court of Inquiry directed to be held at Perote, for the purpose of investigating all the difficulties which have arisen—as the Senate and the country well know many difficulties have arisen—between the higher officers, by whom mutual charges have been made. With regard to the other question put by the honorable Senator, I believe that General Worth has been suspended from his arrest.

A SENATOR.—Relieved?

Mr. CASS.—Take either term you please. Whether finally relieved, depends, I presume, on the result of the court of inquiry. I believe I have now given all the information that the honorable gentleman wants.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I am obliged to the honorable gentleman for his information, and I am willing to receive it as evidence of his courtesy, at least, if not of his imperturbable character. I only supposed that his station as Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, on which I have the honor of serving under him, was such as to afford him the means of answering the questions which I submitted, with respect to matters in regard to which I am not altogether indifferent. I confess I have heard with some little astonishment, the announcement just made that General Scott has been removed from the command, in the presence of his army, on charges made by a subordinate officer. However, I do not intend, now, to make that the subject of any remarks.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. CLARKE.—[illegible] the [illegible] payroll, and to the contingency whom I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, that I should assign, as plainly and as briefly as may be, the reasons which will govern my vote on the bill now before us for discussion. I consider it second in importance to no measure that can demand our attention at the present session, not only from the principles and consequences involved, but also as being the first of a series of measures designed to enlarge the means of extended offensive warfare against Mexico. I had hoped that before Congress was urged to the passage of any important act, a particular expression of its views might have been made, defining to what extent, and to what ends, the war with Mexico should be further prosecuted. We are informed by the President in his last message to Congress that the destruction of the nationality of Mexico is not contemplated by him—that he designs not to blot her from an existence among the nations of the earth. We had also from the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who speaks by authority, the same assurance. The object contemplated was the dismemberment, not the subjugation of Mexico. Other things, however, cast their shadows before us. The veil has been partially lifted, and the future is opened cautiously, but unmistakeably to view. And first in the category of these indications, sir, there were certain resolutions offered by the honorable Senator from New York, (Mr. DICKINSON,) which propose that it be resolved that we form a territorial government for certain territories in Mexico; although our right to the territories in our possession, is but the right of conquest. In the next place, sir, there were resolutions submitted by the distinguished Senator from Indiana, (Mr. HANNEGAN,) declaring the constitutionality of territorial acquisitions. Next, sir, was a letter from Major General Scott, dated, I believe, the 10th of September last, in which he tells the Secretary of War, that the Government intend to occupy with its troops all the principal towns in Mexico, and keep the central government in motion and alarm, it would be necessary to augment his forces to fifty thousand men. The fourth indication which has struck my mind, sir, was the avowal of the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that the entire conquest of Mexico was intended. The fifth, sir, is the general order of the Major General commanding in Mexico, dated 15th December, 1847, which general order, if I understand it, covers the whole ground of the conquest and occupancy of the territories of that republic. To the first article of that order, I desire to call the attention of the Senate:

"The army of the United States now in the capital of Mexico, and such other forces as may be hereafter added to it, shall exercise the power of the government of the United States."

Thus has dismemberment been transformed into subjugation.

When the Emperor Napoleon, in the pride and plenitude of his power, impelled by his lust for conquest and glory, had trodden down with his iron heel the ancient dynasties of Europe—Holland was subjugated; and in his memorable decree of annexation, remarkable for its brevity, he says: "Holland is annexed to France." One step more and we shall have annexation. In a few brief years, where was this mighty conqueror? Stripped of his power—a prisoner in the hands of his oldest and strongest foe—doomed to an exile for life upon a rock in the sea—and France, his own beautiful France, at the mercy of her allied foes—was circumscribed within her ancient limits of sovereignty, resting on her greatness and reposing on her glory—yielding up the spoils she had hidden in her bosom. Sir, I trust that such may not be the fate that is reserved for us. I am entering into this discussion with no captious view of opposing any measures, come whence they may. I do not propose to discuss the controverted causes of the war.—The first and primary cause, was the admission of Texas for extension of slave power; but that is no longer a question for practical use, for the lone star of that republic has become merged in our glorious constellation.

The more immediate causes are to be found in the ill-advised march of General Taylor to the Rio Grande—whether provoking hostilities or repelling them—whether invading territory in possession of Mexico or driving Mexican forces from it and her soil—I leave with the honorable Senators from North Carolina, Maryland and Delaware, who have spoken—abler hands than mine. It is sufficient to say, that the war has been sanctioned by the legally constituted authorities of the nation, and must be prosecuted to a just and honorable peace: such a peace as humanity dictates and the interests of the country require—a just peace—surrendering no right, and inflicting no wrong. I therefore, approach this discussion, unfettered and free. My duty here, requires me to judge of measures for the interests of my country alone; and, whatever vote I may give shall be from the best convictions of duty, and an earnest desire to promote the general welfare.

The two bills reported to the Senate by the Committee on Military Affairs, propose to augment the regular army 10,000 men—and the volunteer force 20 regiments, equal to 20,000 men. It is asked, and I ask it in sincerity and soberness, why, and for what end is this additional force to be embodied and sent forth into a conquered country, at a moment when the advices from Mexico lead us to believe that peace may be had upon terms of our own dictation—when Commissioners from the yet remnant of a government at Queretaro, existing only by the forbearance of the commanding general, have sought your ambassador and found unfortunately, his power withdrawn—when to avert utter subjugation, it is confidently said, that Mexico invites you to other negotiations leading to a treaty, if not of amity, of peace, and desires to rescue her national existence from ruin? Why is it necessary to increase our military force? Why send more men to enforce greater humiliation?

From the able report of the Secretary of War—and, sir, I take great pleasure in subscribing to its ability—it appears that we have now in the army 43,536 men. Of which there are—

Regulars - - - - - -	21,500
Volunteers - - - - -	22,036
With General Taylor on Rio Grande - - -	32,156
With Gen. Wool on the Rio Grande - - -	6,252
In South by sick on Ordnance and Quartermaster -	3,671
In California - - - -	1,019
In Mexico - - - -	43,536
Add Marines and other volunteers - -	2,000
	45,536

To this should be added the whole naval force in the Gulf of Mexico, and the whole force in the Pacific. These forces have been as efficient in their own sphere of action, as any portion of our force engaged in the brilliant and gallant exploits redounding to the honor of their country.

May we not fairly add, as the actual efficient naval force, 4,464 men? and if so, we have at present a force in and around Mexico amounting in the aggregate to 50,000 men. In addition to this, the existing laws authorize the recruiting and embodying of 8,000 men for the regular army; and the President has authority to accept 12,000 volunteers. All this making 20,000—added to the preceding estimate of 50,000, gives the present force as authorized by law, at 70,000 men. Pass this bill, and the bill for 20 regiments of volunteers, and you cannot have less than 95,000 men engaged in and near, subsistency and security from Mexico already prostrate before you.

These things being so, the first question to my mind is, why and for what are these additional forces wanted? And, secondly, where are we to get the ways and means to maintain them? It was said by the honorable Senator from Kentucky some days since that our forces had cost the country for the last year $1,000 per man. On the other hand, it is stated by the honorable Senator from Michigan, at 279,000 for a regiment, only, however, for pay, rations and clothing, without allowance for excess of expenditure in a foreign country. I have examined the subject, and will submit the calculations that I have made. How many men have been in the field, on an average, for the past year? Not over 30,000.

Say Scott, on all his lines - - - -	18,000
Taylor - - - - - -	8,000
Santa Fe, &c. - - - - -	4,000
	30,000
Expenses last year, (besides outstanding claims,)	$58,000,000
Deduct $28,000,000 for ordinary expenses, including army and navy or peace establishments	$28,000,000
And you have—	$30,000,000

Which averages $1,000 per man, besides bounty-pensions, and so on. Now, sir, add to the army the regiments now proposed by this bill, and bill for volunteers, and you have 95,000 men in the field; and these proposed measures cannot but enhance your expenditures twenty million dollars.

Scott had at Vera Cruz, 29th March, - -	13,000
He marched 8th April to Cerro Gordo, with -	11,000
Discharged his volunteers - - -	3,500
	7,500
Went to Jalapa with - - - - -	7,300
Thence to Perote, leaving garrisons at Jalapa and Perote of - - - - -	2,000
And entered Puebla with - - -	5,300

Here he waited until August 7, for reinforcements; and, according to the Secretary's report, received there about 5,000 men under the command of Gen. Pierce. Leaving a garrison in Puebla of 500, besides the force withdrawn from Jalapa; he commenced his victorious march to Mexico with 10,000—took it, established and maintained himself. Of these 10,000, at least 2,000 were killed, wounded, or disabled, leaving 8,000, of which only 6,000 entered the city and dispersed the whole Mexican army.

In Tampico and Vera Cruz there are probably now	2,000
At Jalapa, Perote and Puebla, - - - -	5,000
	7,000

Which being deducted from Scott's whole force of 32,156, gives him in Mexico and the country immediately about it, no less than 25,156. At the last accounts General Scott was arranging an expedition from this force—wholly unnecessary for holding Mexico and its suburbs—to Potosi and the mining districts of Zacatecas; and, as yet, wisely leaves Queretaro untouched, for there only can be found the remnant of Mexican authority. Probably before this bill can become a law—indeed long before this force can reach the Mexican territory—these mining districts, the wealth of which the diffidence of the Senator from Michigan could not allow him to name—this Eldorado, which for centuries has been the envy and the ruin of grasping and unprincipled ambition, will have yielded to our forces, having nothing to resist them, and thus Mexico—its mines and its wealth—its pride and prowess—it entrenched its holy emblems of faith, its power, and even its natural existence are at the feet and the mercy of a conquering and triumphant foe. More than we should desire is our present who want more men?

Now, let us glance at the financial aspect of the case. We have had in general estimates the amount supposed to be necessary for the in-coming year. These estimates are predicated upon the present force now in the field and the ineffectual of the troops proposed to be raised by me and the present bill. The Secretary of the Treasury asks for a duty on tea and coffee, to support the troops and the honor of the country. This is sound doctrine. Let the administration propose a direct tax, and prevent the incurring of a debt of more than a hundred millions.

Sir, I have examined some estimates from the Treasury Department on the state of our finances, and the means at our command for carrying on the war.

By the report of the Secretary it appears that you received up to June 30, 1847:

From Customs,	$23,747,861
From Land,	2,198,359
Miscellaneous,	160,570
Actual receipts	$26,346,789
Less overreceipt of Tariff of 1842, and last 6 months of Tariff of 1846.
In July 1, 1846, there was in the Treasury	$9,126,439
Which remained except Loan and Treasury notes	35,473,228
Expenditures during same time	59,451,177
Expenses over receipts—not including Loan and Treasury notes,	$23,977,949
Add $9,126,439, in Treasury, makes	$33,104,388

I accept 1,000,000, as Treasury is considered and lost and a deficiency of $22,977,949 is supplied by loan and is a debt on interest for the country to pay.

The estimated receipts into the Treasury for the year ending June 1848 are:

From Customs (3 last quarters estimated)		$31,000,000
From Lands,		3,500,000
Miscellaneous,		400,000
		$34,900,000
I propose to reduce tea very largely:
Customs,	$4,000,000
Land	1,000,000
Miscellaneous	300,000
		$5,300,000
		$29,600,000

I, therefore, assume, the war for the country producing such excessive importations.

Expenditures for year ending June 30, 1848:
By estimate made December, 1846, as per report,	$45,784,784
Add to this the additional appropriation already asked for by Secretary, vide letter November 24, 1847	13,932,735
	$59,714,519
Already asked additional for Quartermaster's Department,	4,000,000
	$63,714,519
Less an excess of expenditure over receipts for year ending June 30, 1848	$34,114,519
Add to the the deficiency of the preceding year,	23,977,949
War Debt, June 30, 1848,	$58,092,468

Besides the $9,126,439 in Treasury, July 1, 1846: and the residue is or must be supplied by Loans.

These estimates all unanimously prove that large amounts of money are immediately needed, and that large loans will be required to furnish the means, indispensably necessary to the public credit. Sir, I am opposed to the creation of a national debt. If we will incur responsibilities in a war of conquest, we should boldly meet the emergency, by imposing such taxes as will ensure full faith in the plighted honour of the nation.

In the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I find amidst its heresies and speculations, one paragraph, sound and incontrovertible, proposing taxation as the true basis of national faith. I will read it. I can admire "a rich jewel" even "in an Ethiop's ear." I commend it to the consideration of [illegible] for the time and just views of our duties:

[illegible]

Without [illegible] extract, from the report of General Hamilton, I will trouble the Senate:

[illegible]

Sir, I commend this doctrine to the attention of the Administration.

During the past fiscal year, the products of the country have borne high and unexampled prices. A general prosperity pervaded our whole business and monetary concerns. The cotton crop—I agree, sir, the ruling crop of the country—exceeding but little 1,800,000 bales, ruled at prices high and exorbitantly remunerating. The influence of the new tariff and the sub-treasury had not been felt—there were short crops of breadstuffs in continental Europe—a famine in Ireland—and in England the product falling far below the general average—created an extraordinary demand for the surplus of the rich harvests of our country, and elevated prices to an unexpected height. Cotton advanced to points ranging from 10 to 14 cents; flour $9; Corn $1.20.

At such prices was a portion of the exports of the country valued, and at that unusual and extraordinary valuation the whole exports by custom house returns amount to $158,648,000, and exceeded by $26,000,000 the export of any preceding year. This amount of export, under a home valuation—and that valuation based upon an excited and inflated market, is not the true test of the value of our exports, nor of our ability to import and consume the product of other countries—it is alone the nett proceeds of these exports, such as are realized and returned to the country, that makes the true, ascertained and certain value.

Now, sir, I submit that from this statement of exports, as rendered by the Secretary of the Treasury, there should be deducted—losses by sea, damage to cargoes on the voyage, reduced receipts of sales less than the cost or valuation at home, charities—the holiest and the best of all exports to suffering humanity—and losses by bankruptcies—and the actual amount realized to the country did not exceed - - - - $140,000,000

Imports for fiscal year, ending June 1847	$146,545,638
Specie,	24,000,000
	$122,545,638
In foreign goods,

Upon this estimate, the excess of Imports over the nett proceeds of Exports has created a balance against us of $6,545,638.

In addition, in consequence of the extreme monetary pressure in England, stocks have been returned, and sold to an amount estimated at - - - - $10,000,000

Which added to imports over exports - -	6,545,638
Leaves an actual balance of exchange - -	$16,545,638

The import of specie was a safe one for the country, although, yielding no revenue; and about 80 per cent. of it has gone, and is rapidly going, to restore the balance of trade, and equalize exchanges. A year since, or thereabouts, exchange on England was four per cent—or something like six per cent. below par. Now it is at a premium of 11 per cent.—all of one and a half per cent, above par; and the exports in specie are kept back only, because foreign gold cannot be had; and the shipper sustains a loss of one per cent. on the shipment of American gold. The greatest distress prevails in all the great marts of business, and commercial cities of the country. Money is worth one and a half per cent per month in the eastern markets. The banks are prudently contracting their loans, and curtailing their issues to reach a point of safety. The circulating medium of the country is diminishing—sales are limited—manufactures and industrial pursuits checked, if not paralyzed—and specie is rapidly going out to Mexico and to Europe. That specie, which is alone the measure of all values; and the basis of all exchanges, whether foreign or domestic, must, and will be required to pay present and future balances of trade. And amidst this, sir, where is the national treasury, and what are its means? Exhausted by the expenses of the war—drained almost to exhaustion—it is asking Congress for relief. I will read a short extract from a mercantile journal:

"A week [illegible] has yet been produced in the [illegible] Specie continues to be shipped in a moderate way, and for a few days past not much has come in from any quarter. The [illegible] is degraded to the [illegible] and the banks [illegible] but about seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars on hand, and is constantly paying large drafts, while the receipts are small, as almost all the duties are paid in treasury notes. While [illegible] will soon be [illegible] a condition that it will be convenient to scrape the bottom. The banks have some six millions of coin, chiefly American gold, which is worth less than sovereigns to ship [illegible] and cost [illegible] one per cent beyond the labor of coining. The banks and merchants are looking with increased interest to the expenditures of the government. The state of the country is such, that if the Mexican war is to keep up its large drains, prudent men will preserve the contracted position which they have been gaining for two or three months past. These facts in the city will be likely to reach the country in low prices for produce, so compelling [illegible] the [illegible] of making a debt upon [illegible]."

In this state of the monetary concerns of the country generally, and more especially of the treasury itself, I ask if it is not madness to impose upon it such heavy additional charges as thirty regiments of troops, or even as the ten regiments proposed by the bill under discussion must inevitably do; and these troops not needed for any purpose, except for the entire conquest of Mexico, and hardly for that.

I see nothing Mr President in the financial prospect of the country, for the coming year to improve on condition nor in the Secretary's estimates, which must necessarily be hypothetical which gives me any assurance of improvement, or essential relief. The Secretary's conjectural estimates for the year ending June 1849, are

Customs	$32,000,000
Lands	1,000,000
	33,000,000
Bounty lands in market will reduce	1,000,000
	$34,000,000

The average duties upon imports, including free goods, are about 19 per cent upon gross importations, and are it necessary in order to realize $32,000,000 from the customs at the present rates of duty—to import to no less a sum than $170,000,000, in that year. How vain is the expectation of such an import—and how utterly ruinous to the country, if the views of the Secretary should be realized. I will venture the prophecy, that your exports for that year cannot exceed $120,000,000.

And I ask how is the balance to be paid? The business relations of the country can bear no further exhaustion. And no such import will be made, nor will any such amount be received from customs. Let prudent statesman consider whether this is a time to plunge into unnecessary extravagance—or rather should not our honest efforts be for peace? Let this drain of excessive expenditure cease; and a just and honorable conclusion of the war, restore the country to its right and proper position. Stocks are below par—Treasury Notes are at 98¾—and that only because they are receivable for duties and made equal to specie.

Now, sir, the Secretary asks for a loan for $18,500,000, since however reduced to $12,000,000, and already has he increased his wants to the Committee of Ways and Means $3,500,000, making $16,000,000. Add four millions revenue less than his estimate, and it makes twenty millions. Sir, he will want $21,000,000. Pass this bill, and the volunteer bill, and he cannot require less than $40,000,000.

With what prospect of success can he go into the money market for such a loan, or any considerable portion of it—in the present financial and commercial condition of the country. Such a loan it required could not be obtained at over 80 for the 6's—and I fear could not be got at that, for much of the money is wanted out of the country—in Mexico. The existing means will allow no such abstraction from the commercial and business wants of the country.

If a loan of $20,000,000 can be realized, by your law, it must be paid into the Treasury in specie; and that specie, or a large part of it, will either go to Mexico, or to England in payment for foreign funds furnished by bankers there in support of our armies. All this will increase our commercial embarrassments, now at a fearful point, and render sales of produce, and mercantile engagements, of an extremely limited character.

Sir, the merchants of the country are but the distributing agents of the great producers of the world, and this commercial embarrassment now experienced by them, will next be felt seriously and with greater effect by our own producing and agricultural communities. The want of means to advance and transmit the produce from the interior to the market, must cause a severe decline in prices, and the South and the West producing the great staples of the country, will find, in the reduction of prices, their share of the great financial crisis, caused by supporting a foreign war, and abstracting for that war the means necessary for the profitable exchanges of their products. I have heard prices named to which cotton and breadstuffs must go, fearfully alarming—and the aggregate reduction estimated at $200,000,000. Nothing can avert this but an extraordinary demand for breadstuffs beyond any calculations that the wants of Europe would seem to indicate.

Next, sir, in the course of inflictions, the labor of the country will experience its saddening influence. Its profitable employment will be checked or suspended, and then the blow will be felt most severely, even in the daily necessities of that class rendering it unable to avert the force.

The contraction of the ordinary circulating medium of the country is another consequence of this abstraction of specie. For every dollar in specie, sound specie-paying banks are safely allowed to put into circulation four dollars in bills, and these bills employed in the daily uses and payments of the community, will be withdrawn in that ratio from circulation. A loan of $20,000,000, either in funded stock or treasury notes, cannot but contract the sound circulating medium, $60,000,000, the specie upon which that calculation is based, having thus been withdrawn for the support of our armies in Mexico. With such a contraction of the currency, it is painful to think to what point of depression prices would go, and the consequent general and individual distress we shall be called upon to endure. In a war of defence the Treasury of the country, like its blood, would be poured out like water. In a war of conquest, even for indemnity and security, no such feeling would prevail. If, then, the men are not needed, as I have shewn, for any object short of the entire subjugation and conquest of Mexico—and the means are not to be obtained unless at great sacrifice and utter commercial distress—I ask why pass this bill, or press it to a hasty and immediate decision? These additional troops, if sent into Mexico, can only be employed in extending conquest over the entire republic. Drive the government to disband itself, and with whom can you make a peace? To whom can you restore the whole or any part of Mexico? To whom is her nationality to be entrusted?—and by whom is it to be maintained? Take it, and you must keep it.—"How will you escape it?"

In the distracted condition of Mexico—with a population mixed and incongruous—groaning under the despotism of military power—and changing her rulers only to exchange one degradation for another—with no fixed principles of government—a degraded population, far inferior to the Aztec race in servility and personage, accustomed only to obey—their condition cannot perhaps but be improved. But to incorporate such a disjointed and degraded mass into even a limited participation of our social and political rights, would be fatally destructive to the institutions of our country. There is a moral pestilence attached to such a people which is contagious—a leprosy that will destroy—

"Like a subtle fox, [illegible] whosoever touches"

This stupendous scheme of subjugation, sequestration, and annexation, cannot but shock the public sense of the country, and cause reflecting men to estimate the dangers before them. The leprous distilment will infuse itself into the system only to poison and destroy.—

"It cannot, and will not come to good."

In God's name, let the danger be avoided, before it is too late. Our own dissentions are sufficient to distract the harmony of the country, and try our institutions to their utmost tension.

Stop this unholy lust for conquest. No longer endanger the blessings of Freedom, so signally our own. Let discord be driven from amongst us, and the bright example of our institutions, restored to their purity, continue to shine forth for the imitation and emulation of all mankind.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DICKINSON presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying the establishment of a port of entry at Rouses' Point, in that State, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HUNTER presented the memorial of the President of William and Mary College, in the State of Virginia, praying compensation for the use of, and damage to, the College building by the French troops during the Revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That the petition of Ambrose R. Davenport, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the petition of David N. Leach, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed the bill from the Senate entitled "An act extending the right of pre-emption to certain persons in the Territory of Wisconsin, and for other purposes," without amendment.

Also, a joint resolution from the Senate, entitled "A resolution of inquiry in relation to the public moneys," with sundry amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The President of the United States has approved and signed an act, this day, entitled "An act for the relief of the widow and children of Joseph Sarah and Eliza."

PRINTING OF THE TREASURY REPORT.

Mr. PHELPS submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing be instructed to cause to be printed, in addition to the number ordered by the Committee on the Treasury, with the annexed letter, and by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the use of the members of the Senate.

JETHRO WOOD'S PATENT.

Mr. TURNEY, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of the executrix and executors of Jethro Wood, reported a bill to further extend the patent of Jethro Wood.

The bill having been read a first time,

Mr. TURNEY expressed a hope that it would be taken up, and passed at once. It had passed the Senate last session, but was lost in consequence of its failing to be reached in the House.

The bill was then read a second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN wished to hear some good reason offered for the passage of the bill. He should move to strike out the enacting clause whenever the bill came up.

The PRESIDING OFFCER.—The bill is now before the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN.—I move then to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. TURNEY.—I do not know on what ground the Senator from Ohio objects to this bill, or for what reason he desires its rejection. I am inclined to think that he may not have had an opportunity of examining the grounds on which the committee have recommended the passage of this bill. The inventor of this improvement in the plough received no benefit from the patent during the first term, and, indeed, exhausted his fortune in the continued efforts which he was enforced to employ in order to obtain his rights. He is now dead, having left a family of four daughters, for whose benefit an extension of the patent for the short period of seven years, is now proposed by the bill before the Senate. I will only add that the bill passed at the last session of Congress; that it has been unanimously reported by the Committee, and that I am quite at a loss to know on what ground objection is now made to its passage.

Mr. DICKINSON.—This bill originates in the State of New York, and numerous petitions and memorials in regard to it have been presented at previous sessions. Before coming here, I happened to be employed [illegible] and all sustain to it professional relations. When the question was up before, I declined voting on it for the reason now stated, and I shall decline to vote now unless the Senate shall rule that otherwise. I have, therefore, nothing to say as to the merits of the case, and make this statement in order to explain my silence.

Mr. DAYTON.—I have only a single remark to make in reference to this bill. I hesitate not to say, that if any of these applications for extension of patent rights deserves attention, this certainly does. It is a meritorious application. I have become acquainted with the case, and have no hesitation in asserting that every rule by which the extension of patent rights has been regulated, applies to it.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I am uninformed of the facts of this case, except in so far as they have been communicated by the committee who have examined the claim of the petitioners and have unanimously, as I understand, recommended this bill. A motion is made to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, and I should be very glad, if there be any reasons why we should act in opposition to the unanimous recommendation of the committee, that those reasons should be stated. Certainly, I must conform my vote to the recommendation of the committee in the absence of any explanation leading me to a different conclusion.

Mr. CAMERON.—It was my duty some years since to examine this case, as a member of the Committee to whom it was referred. I gave it a good deal of attention, and on that occasion also, the Committee unanimously recommended a bill in favor of the petitioners. It has been said, that this bill will impose a tax on ploughs; but, it may be said with equal force, that every patent inposes a tax. The improvement in this case has been great and acknowledged. It enhances the value of the plough, and has been of essential service to the agriculturist. The inventor, as has been stated, did not derive any benefit from it, and I entirely agree in the propriety and justice of making a provision which will secure for a short time to his descendents, a share in the benefit of the improvement.

Mr. PHELPS.—I have had the honor of serving on one or two of the committes, which have had this subject under their consideration, and I recollect very well, that when it first came before the committee some objections were made to the recommendation of such a bill. But, as I am happy to find from the remarks made by Senators, these objections are no longer pressed. This is a very meritorious case, and clearly comes within the class of applications, which merit the interposition of Congress, in the manner proposed by this bill.

Mr. NILES.—I wish to inquire of the Chairman of the Committee, whether this patent has been once renewed?

Mr. TURNEY replied in the affirmative.

Mr. NILES.—I do not know much about this case; but I have generally felt it to be my duty, to oppose this sort of legislation, as being a kind of legislation unjust to the public, and which is virtually in violation of a fair contract, made between the patentee and the community—a contract, sir, by which the former ought to be bound, and of which the community on the other hand, should have all the benefits, to which by the laws they are justly entitled. That contract secures to the inventor the exclusive use and enjoyment, or exclusive benefit of his invention, for a period of fourteen years; and if that be not sufficiently, ample to indemnify him, then there is a defect in the law. But the law does not stop there. It authorizes a renewal of this exclusive right, for another period of fourteen years, or seven years—I am not quite certain which. I am told that it is for seven years, making twenty-one years during which the patentee is secured in the exclusive enjoyment of the benefit accruing from his invention. Now, if that be not enough, the evil should be remedied as all general evils shoule, by general, and not by special legislation. At the sametime, I do not say, but that there may be extreme cases—and they must be very extreme cases—which may justify the setting aside of the general law. Such an extreme case must be one in which, without any fault on the part of the patentee, he has failed to receive the benefit which the law was intended to secure to him. In no other case would it, I think, be just towards the public to give our assent to any such legislation. Whether this is such a case I am not prepared to say, as I have not examined the subject so closely as to be able to express any opinion. If the Committee are entirely satisfied on their part that it is one of those cases which justify such legislation, I might be disposed to agree to their recommendation. That point ought to be made clear. Unless it be made apparent that the law has substantially failed to secure to the patentee the privileges which it is designed to extend to patentees, it is quite certain that the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. TURNEY.—I think the facts of this case have been fully made out, and justify the Committee in their recommendation; and in this view of the subject, I am happy to find myself sustained by the gentlemen who have spoken. A report in favor of these petitioners has been made at three sessions of Congress. Throughout the whole term of the patent and its extension the patentee failed to reap the benefits to which he was legally entitled, after having exhausted his private fortune in the work of perfecting his invention and in the attempt to secure his rights. I am as much opposed to the extension of patents generally, as the Senator from Connecticut can be, or any other gentlemen on this floor; but after a careful examination of the facts in this case the evidence appears to my mind to be entirely conclusive in its character, in the establishment, first, that this invention is one of immense value to the community; and, secondly, that the inventor received no benefit from it, but that on the contrary, the whole of his private fortune was exhausted in the effort to relieve himself from the embarrassments which resulted in the effort to establish his right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, remarked that he had assented to the taking up of this bill, on receiving the assurance that it would not lead to discussion. Already a considerable portion of the morning hour had been exhausted, and he therefore felt himself constrained to ask that it be passed over informally, if it should not be postponed.

Mr. NILES inquired whether the bill made any provision for assignees.

Mr. TURNEY replied, that there were no assignees. The patentee had formed a connexion with certain parties who refused to render any account whatever of the sales which they had made, and that was one reason why he had failed to reap the benefit to which he was entitled.

Mr. STURGEON.—I would ask the Chairman of the Committee whether it is intended, that the benefit which it is proposed to extend by this bill, shall accrue exclusively to the heirs of Jethro Wood? There has been some doubt in my mind about this bill; and the difficulty has been increased by a fact which came to my knowledge some time since in Pittsburg in conversation with persons engaged in the manufacture of the iron work of these ploughs. I was informed by one of these persons that agents of the patentee had, whether rightfully or wrongfully, extorted from them some six or eight thousand dollars for the privilege of casting the iron. Some of the manufacturers refused to comply with the demands of these agents. I am not able to say whether they were bona fide agents of the patentee or not, but I should like some explanation with regard to the subject before I vote upon this bill. If the benefit is to accrue exclusively to the heirs of Jethro Wood, I am disposed to acquiesce in the recommendation of the Committee.

Mr. WESTCOTT remarked that he had opposed the bill formerly reported, but had no objection to the present bill, inasmuch as it was not liable to the objections which he had entertained against the former one. He agreed with the Senator from Connecticut as to the impolicy of renewing patents; but, as that gentleman had remarked, there were cases in whose favor an exception might properly be made. The present he believed to be one of those cases.

Mr. ALLEN.—I wish to make a few remarks on this bill. There is one decisive answer to all the arguments which I have heard advanced in its favor; and it is this: If, with the law on their side, these people have been unable to make anything out of this invention, how will they be enabled, by having the law continued on their side, to realize any profit from it? We are told, that although for twenty-one years this patentee has been guarded by the law, he has yet failed to realize profit from his invention. How, then, I would ask, do you propose to change this state of things by the passage of this act? We are told that all the wrongs of these meritorious people have been the result of the bad choice of agents; but surely it cannot be pretended that this is a state of things for which a remedy can be provided by law. If we undertake to redress such grievances, I think we are likely to sit here much longer than the usual period of the long session. These are misfortunes for which acts of Congress can provide no remedy. Has not that been proved clearly enough in this very case itself? Here we have had an act of Congress existing for twenty-one years, and yet wholly inadequate to prevent the evils which have been in fact the result of the indiscretion of the persons themselves. But there is another view of the subject. The Constitution authorizes Congress to secure for a limited term the absolute and exclusive use of certain inventions to the inventors. This is all right. But why was not the exclusive right made perpetual? For the plain and obvious reason that it would be contrary to the general interests of the community, if an unlimited monopoly were thus given in inventions. There must be a period put to the enjoyment of this exclusive right. The right of every man in the community to copy an idea which one man conceived, is suspended. You have no right to give a piece of iron, a given form, for twenty-one years, because A alone must give it that form, and you have no right to copy A's idea in iron. It is a restraint upon the whole community, from which they must be released as soon as may be consistent with the rights of the individuals who have had the good fortune first to conceive the idea. It is the fate, sir, of inventors, to die unrewarded by their inventions. It is the fate, in every age, of the genius which bestirs itself in the investigation of those secret principles of nature or of art, to die unrequited. Acts of Congress cannot change it. We may not impose a penalty upon the country in order to effect a change in this apparently unavoidable destiny of inventors. This bill proposes nothing more nor less than to impose a tax upon every plough made under this patent in the United States. That is the amount of it. And, sir, we are asked to impose this tax of fifty cents upon each of these ploughs by the very same arguments by which we are informed that all these fifty cents hitherto imposed, have been snatched from the rightful owner by dishonest agents. We are asked to tax the users of these ploughs, not for the benefit of the inventor, because we are told that the law has hitherto failed to secure to him the proceeds of his invention, but for the benefit of those who for twenty-one years have been committing these frauds upon the inventor. I do not, then, see any just ground on which we can proceed to impose this tax upon the farming interests of the country.

Mr. TURNEY.—I can assure the gentleman from Ohio that there is no ground for his apprehension, that the benefit of this bill will not accrue to the heirs of the inventor. The rights of the patentee have been established by the decision of the Supreme Court, and the extension of the patent right for the short period proposed by the bill will be of more value than it was during the whole of the two terms which it has existed. I may take this opportunity of remarking, that our patent laws seem to require some revision, in order more effectually to secure the benefits of their inventions to inventors. The gentleman from Ohio is not strictly correct in designating this as a tax on ploughs. Every purchaser will have his choice, and if the ploughs made under this patent are enhanced in value in consequence of the improvement, it is, I think, reasonable that the inventor should have the benefit of it.

Mr. DAYTON remarked, that this was rather a small matter on which to originate a debate. The subject had been examined by three committees, differently constituted, and all had reported unanimously in favor of a bill for the relief of the petitioners.

The question was then put on the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The yeas and nays being demanded by Mr. ALLEN, were ordered, and taken, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atherton, Bagby, Baldwin, Benton, Bayard, Bright, Clay, Douglas, Dromgoole, Fulton, Hannegan, Niles, Simmons, and Sturgeon—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashmun, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Bibb, Calhoun, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dix, Evans, Greene, Huntington, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Moor, Pearce, Phelps, Rhett, Simmons, Underwood, and Woodbridge—26.

So the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill was lost.

Mr. BALDWIN then offered the following amendment:

Strike out the word "exclusive of all assignees and legatees."

Mr. WESTCOTT briefly opposed the amendment.

Mr. BALDWIN remarked, that he had offered the amendment in order to protect the rights of assignees, and was proceeding to explain more fully the objects of the amendment; when

Mr. ALLEN suggested that, as the time had arrived for taking up the special order, and as the discussion, now involving a legal point, was likely to be protracted, the bill should be passed over informally.

The bill was then passed over informally.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. BENTON.—The taking up this bill upon its merits during the time allowed for morning business prevented me from giving notice, sir, at the proper time, of my intention to introduce a bill to-morrow; and I am, therefore, under the necessity of encroaching, to the extent of a quarter of a minute, upon the time which belongs to the gentleman from New York. I wish to give notice, that on to-morrow, I shall ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the 69th and 91st of the "Rules and Articles of War," in relation to the practice before courts martial and courts of inquiry in the army of the United States.

LAND PATENTS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill for the issuing of patents in a certain class of cases, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

EXTENSION OF MARITIME JURISPICTION.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to amend the act entitled "An act extending the jurisdiction of the district courts to certain cases upon the lakes and navigable waters connecting the same," approved the 26th of February, 1845, reported it with an amendment.

WILLIAM H. BASSETT.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of William H. Bassett, late marshal of the United States for the western district of Louisiana, submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise for a limited time an additional military force.

Mr. DIX. Mr. President: It was my wish to address the Senate on the resolution offered by the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CLINGMAN) under rule the 14th. I would have preferred to do so at once. I am always unwilling to delay action on any measure relating to the war, and because the resolutions afford a wider field for inquiry and discussion. But as the debate has become general, and extended to almost every topic that can well be connected, under any, the form of the resolutions, by which I have been influenced has become of no consequence. I have not the same reason necessarily to detain longer than I would in any way.

Two leading questions divide and agitate the public mind in respect to the future conduct of the war with Mexico. [illegible] one opposite to South we withdraw our forces from the Rio Grande and the occupation of Mexico, and the adjustment of a boundary between the two republics to future negotiation relying on our unquestionable right to indemnify ourselves for the expenses of the war, and to provide against a recurrence of the same evil? Or, on the other hand, shall we continue to occupy the country we have conquered, and prosecute the war with more vigor, in the hope of bringing the Mexican people to a sense of their true interests, and inducing them to make peace on such terms as we may think proper to require? There are other propositions, subordinate to this, which may be considered as parts of the same general scheme of operations; such as withdrawing from the Mexican capital and the interior districts and assuming an exterior line of occupation. I shall advert to all these propositions in the course of my remarks, and I shall endeavor to distinguish between them. I am not prepared, I should doubt, at this moment, in the heat of the application, to say whether we withdraw Mexico altogether or take a defensive line, which shall include all the territory we intend to hold permanently as indemnity, the consequences to result from it, so far as they affect the question of peace, would, it appears to me, be the same.

The second question is, Shall we retain in possession of the territory we have acquired until Mexico shall consent to make a treaty of peace, which shall provide ample compensation for the wrongs of which we complain, and settle to our satisfaction the boundary in dispute?

Regarding these questions as involving the permanent welfare of the country, I have considered them with the greatest solicitude; and though never more profoundly impressed with a sense of the responsibility which belongs to the solution of problems of such magnitude and difficulty, my reflections have, nevertheless, led me to a clear and settled conviction as to the course, which justice and policy seem to indicate and demand. The first question, in itself of the highest importance, has been answered affirmatively, as it does and it derives additional interest from the fact that it has also been answered in the affirmative by a statesman now retired from the busy scenes of political life, who, from his talents, experience and public services, justly commands the respect of his countrymen, and whose opinions, on any subject, are entitled to be weighed with candor and deliberation. I have endeavored to attribute to his opinions, and to those of others who coincide with him wholly or in part, all the importance which belongs to them, and to consider them with the deference due to the distinguished sources from which they emanate. I believe I have done so; and yet I have, after the fullest reflection come to conclusions totally different from theirs. I believe it would be in the highest degree unjust to ourselves, possessing, as we do, well founded claims on Mexico, to withdraw our forces from her territory altogether; and exceedingly unwise, as a matter of policy, looking to the future political relations of the two countries, to withdraw from it partially and assume a line of defence, without a treaty of peace. On the contrary, I am in favor of retaining possession, for the present, of all we have acquired, not as a permanent conquest, but as the most effective means of bringing about—what all most earnestly desire—a restoration of peace; and I will, with the indulgence of the Senate, proceed to state, with as much brevity as the magnitude of the subject admits, my objections to the course suggested by the first question, and my reasons in favor of the course suggested by the others.

I desire, at the outset, to state this proposition, to the truth of which, I think, all will yield their assent: that no policy which does not carry with it a reasonable assurance of healing the dissentions dividing the two countries, and of restoring, permanently, amicable relations between them, ought to receive our support. We may differ in opinion, and perhaps, hopelessly, as to the measures best calculated to produce this result; but if it were possible for us to come to an agreement in respect to them, the perpetuity of their adoption could scarcely admit of controversy. This proposition being conceded, as I think it will be, it follows that if the measure proposed—to withdraw our forces from Mexico—be not calculated to bring about a speedy and permanent peace; but, on the contrary, if it be rather calculated to open a field of domestic dissension, and possibly of external interference, in that distracted country, to be followed, in all probability, by a renewal of active hostilities with us, and under circumstances to make us feel severely the loss of the advantages which we have gained, and which it is proposed voluntarily to surrender, then, it appears to me, it can present no claim to our favorable consideration. I shall endeavor to show, before I sit down, that the policy referred to is exposed to all these dangers and evils.

I do not propose to enter into an examination of the origin of the war. From the moment the collision took place between our forces and those of Mexico on the Rio Grande, I considered all hope of an accommodation, without a full trial of strength in the field, to be out of the question. I believed the peculiar [illegible] of the Mexican people to any such hope abusive. Whether that collision was produced in any degree by our own mistakes, or whether the war itself was brought about by the manner in which Texas was annexed, are questions I do not propose to discuss now; and if it were not too late, I would submit whether the discussion could serve any other purpose but to exhibit divided councils to our adversary, and to inspire him with the hope of obtaining more favorable terms of peace by protracting his resistance. No one can be less disposed than myself to abridge, in any degree, the legitimate boundaries of discussion. But I am not disposed to enter into such an investigation now. The urgent concern is to know, not how the war originated, nor who is responsible for it, but in what manner it can be brought to a speedy and honorable termination; whether as some suppose, we ought to retire from the field, or whether, as appears to me, the only hope of an accommodation lies in a firm and determined maintenance of our position.

The probable consequence of an abandonment of the advantages we have gained may be [illegible] what [illegible] consideration, I had occasion to state that the whole of northern Mexico as far south as the Rio Grande and the [illegible] comprehending [illegible] republic, and about one-tenth of its inhabitants. Our acquisitions have since been augmented by the [illegible] and the Castle of San Juan de Ulua, the capture of Jalapa, Perote, and Puebla, the surrender of the city of Mexico, and the occupation of three States of Vera Cruz, Puebla and Mexico, with nearly two millions and a half of souls. It is true, our forces have not overrun every portion of the territory of those States; but their chief towns have been reduced, the military forces which defended them captured or dispersed, their civil authorities superseded, their capital occupied, and the whole machinery of government within the conquered States virtually transferred to our hands. All this has been achieved with an army at no one period exceeding fifteen thousand men, and against a force from three to four times [illegible] than [illegible] of Vera Cruz.

I need not [illegible] army, performed a few weeks ago, to refer to the brilliant successes by which these acquisitions were made; and I will not trespass on the attention of the Senate by repeating what I said at that time. But I cannot forbear to say, that there is a moral in this contest, the effect of which is not likely to be lost on ourselves or others. At the call of their country our people have literally rushed to arms. The emulation has been to be received into the service, not to be excused from it. Individuals from the plough, the counting house, the law-office, and the workshop, have taken the field, braving inclement seasons and inhospitable climates without a murmur; and, though wholly unused to arms, withstanding the most destructive fire, and storming batteries at the point of the bayonet with the coolness, intrepidity, and spirit of veterans. I believe I may safely say, there has been no parallel to these achievements by undisciplined forces since the French revolution. I am not sure that history can furnish a parallel. As to the regular army, we always expect it to be [illegible] and heroic [illegible] appointed. The whole conduct of the war in the field, has exhibited the highest evidence of our military capacity. It confirms an opinion I have always held—that [illegible] importance he enjoys in the order of the political system, of which he is a part. It establishes another position of vital importance to us: that, under the protection of our militia system, the country may, at the termination of every contest, lay aside the more massive and burdensome parts of its armor and become prepared, with energies [illegible] for [illegible] scenes of danger.

Mr. President, the political condition of Mexico has been gradually approaching a dissolution of all responsible government, and of the civil order, which constitutes her an independent state. This lamentable situation is not the fruit alone of our military successes. The factions, by which that country has been distracted, each in turn gaining and maintaining a temporary ascendency, and often by brute force, lie at the foundation of the social and political disorder, which has reigned there for the last twenty years. To most of the abuses of the old colonial system of Spain, she has superadded the evils of an unstable and [illegible] system of [illegible]. The military bodies, which have been the instruments of those, who have thus in succession, gained a brief and precarious control over her affairs, though dispersed, still exist, ready to be re-united and to renew the anarchy which we have superseded, for the time being, by a military government; and this brings me to the first great objection to the proposition of withdrawing our armies from the field.

I have already said that no policy can deserve our support, which does not hold out the promise of a durable peace. Nothing seems to me more unlikely to secure so desirable a result, than an abandonment of Mexico by us at the present moment without a treaty, leaving behind a strong feeling of animosity towards us, with party divisions the strongly marked, and political animosities as rancorous perhaps, as they have been at any former period. Even when her capital had fallen, humbled, and powerless as she was, party leaders instead of consulting for the common good, were seen struggling with each other for the [illegible] of authority. Our retirement as enemies would, in all probability, be the signal for intestine conflicts as [illegible] and [illegible] as those in which [illegible] engaged when [illegible] always the most distas-trons for the great body of the Mexican people, for on what side soever fortune turns, they are certain to be the victims. You know, sir, there are two great parties in Mexico, (I pass by the minor divisions,) the "federalistas" and "centralistas." The former, as their name imports, are in favor of the federative system; they are the true republican party. With us in formtimes, the terms federal and republican design stand different parties. In Mexico they are both employed to designate the friends of the federative system. The centralists are in favor of a consolidated government, republican or monarchical in form, and are composed of the army, the clergy, and I suppose a small portion of the population. I believe our only hope of obtaining a durable peace, lies in the firm establishment of the federal party in power, the party represented by Herrera, Anaya, Pena y Pena, Campbido, and others, I understand Herrera has been elected President of the Republic, and [illegible] would be desirous. Unfortunately I fear this party would not succeed in maintaining itself, if Mexico were left to herself at the present moment with an embittered feeling of hostility towards us. The military chiefs, who controlled the army and who might rally it again for political uses, if we were to retire without a treaty, are for the most part, enemies of the federative system and conservators of the popular abuses, to which they owe their wealth and importance. Nothing could be more unfortunate for Mexico than the re-establishment of these men in power. It would bring with it a hopeless perpetuation of the anarchy and oppression, which have given a character to their supremacy in past years. [illegible] without a prospect of amelioration in the condition of the Mexican people—a supremacy, of which the chief variation has been an exchange of one military despot for another.

Calamitous as the restoration of this party to their former ascendency would be for Mexico, it would [illegible] to us. Relying on military forces for their support, their policy would be to continue the war as a pretext for maintaining the army in full strength, or, at least, not to terminate it till peace would ensure their own supremacy. It is believed that these considerations have been leading motives in the resistance they have opposed to us. It is true, the republican party has been equally hostile, so far as external indications show; but the fact is accounted for by their desire to see the war continued until the army and its leaders, the great enemies of the federative system, are overthrown. Undoubtedly, the obstinate refusal of Mexico to make peace may be very properly referred to the natural exasperation of every people, whose soil is invaded; but there can be little doubt that it has been influenced, in no inconsiderable degree, by considerations growing out of party divisions, and the jealousy and animosities to which those divisions have given rise. My confidence in our ability to make an amicable arrangement with the federal party, if it were in undisputed possession of the government, arises from the belief that their motives are honest—that they have at heart the public welfare—and that they must see there is no hope for Mexico but in a solid peace with us. My utter distrust of the centralists arises from the belief that their objects are selfish, and that to accomplish them, they would not hesitate to sacrifice the liberties of the people and the prosperity of the country. But whether I err in these views or not, I feel quite confident I do not err in believing that if our armies were to be withdrawn from Mexico, without a peace, the flames of civil discord would be rekindled in that unhappy country, and burn with redoubled violence. I should greatly fear that the military chiefs would succeed in re-establishing their ascendency, and that no probable limit could be assigned to the duration of the war. If I am right, our true policy is to stand firm, and if possible, united, until wiser counsels shall prevail in Mexico, and a disposition shall be shown to come to an amicable arrangement with us on reasonable terms.

The objection I have stated to the proposition of withdrawing our forces from Mexico, concerns only the relations which now exist, or may exist hereafter, between the two countries. If there were no other objection, the question might be decided upon considerations touching only their domestic interests and their mutual rights.

But I come to the second objection—one perhaps of graver import than the first, because it supposes the possibility, if not the probability, of an interference in her affairs by other countries, if we were to retire without a treaty and without commercial arrangements, which it would be in our power to enforce. The President alluded to the subject in his annual message at the opening of Congress, and expressed an apprehension of danger from that source. I participate in it. I shall assign the grounds on which it rests; and I only regret that in stating them with the minuteness necessary to make them fully understood, I shall be compelled to draw much more largely than I desire on the patience of the Senate.

Senators are doubtless aware that the right of intervention in the affairs of this continent, was formally asserted in the French Chamber of Deputies, in the year 1845, by M. Guizot, Minister of Foreign Affairs, as the organ of the government of France. He regarded the great powers on this continent as divided into three groups, namely: Great Britain, the United States, and the States of Spanish origin: and he declared that it belonged to France "to protect, by the authority of her name, the independence of States, and the equilibrium of the great political forces in America." To this declaration I have thought it not out of place, in connexion with the subject under discussion, to call the attention of the Senate—not for the purpose of undertaking the formal refutation, of which I think the whole doctrine of intervention, as it has been practically enforced in Europe, is clearly susceptible—but for the purpose of denying it as founded upon any well established principles of international law, and, if it had such a foundation, of denying its applicability to the political condition of this continent. To enter fully into the examination of this important subject would require more time than it would be proper for me to devote to it. I propose only to pass rapidly over a few of the principal considerations it suggests.

The declaration of M. Guizot was the first public and official intimation by a European government, of an intention to interfere with the political condition of the independent communities on the continent of America, and to influence by moral, if not by physical, agencies, their relations to each other. And if it had been presented in any other form than that of an abstract declaration, not necessarily to be followed by any overt act, it would have behooved us to inquire, in the most formal manner, whether this asserted right of interposition derived any justification from the usages of nations, or from the recognized principles of international law—or whether it was an assumption wholly unsupported by authority, and if attempted, an encroachment on the independence of sovereign States, which it would have been their duty to themselves and the civilized world to resent as an injury and a wrong.

Am I in error in supposing this subject derives new importance from our existing relations with Mexico, one of the States of Spanish origin, which M. Guizot grouped together as constituting one of the great political forces of this continent, among which "the equilibrium" was to be maintained. Sir, more than once, in the progress of the war, the governments of Europe have been invoked by leading organs of public opinion abroad to interpose between us and Mexico. Is it not then appropriate briefly to state what this right of intervention is, as it has been asserted in Europe, what it has been in practice, and what it would be likely to become if applied to the States of this continent? I trust it will be so considered.

The doctrine of intervention to maintain the balance of power, is essentially of modern origin. From the earliest ages, it is true, occasional combinations have been formed by particular States, for mutual protection against the aggressions of a powerful neighbor. History is full of these examples. Such a co-operation is dictated by the plainest principles of self-preservation, for the purpose of guarding against the danger of being destroyed in detail; and it is founded upon such obvious maxims of common sense that it would have been remarkable if it had not been resorted to, from the moment human society assumed a regular form of organization.—These defensive alliances were deficient in the permanence and methodical arrangements, which distinguish the modern system of intervention. Hume saw, or fancied he saw, in them the principle of the right of intervention to preserve the balance of power which is asserted at the present day. But it could only have been the principle which was developed; they certainly never attained the maturity or the efficient force of a regular system.

The modern doctrine of intervention, in the affairs of other States, which has sprung up within the last two centuries, is far more comprehensive in its scope. It has grown into a practical system of supervision on the part of the principal European powers over their own relative forces, and those of the other States of Europe; and though it may, in some instances, have been productive of beneficial effects in maintaining the public tranquility, it has as frequently been an instrument of the grossest injustice and tyranny. From the first extensive coalition of this nature, which was formed during the long series of wars terminated by the peace of Westphalia, in 1648, down to the interference of Great Britain, Prussia, Austria, and France, in the contest between the Sultan and Mehemet Ali, in 1840, a period of nearly two centuries—an interference designed, in some degree, to prevent what was regarded as a dangerous protectorate over the affairs of the Porte by Russia—the exercise of the right has been placed, theoretically, on the same high ground of regard for the tranquility of Europe and the independence of States. Practically, it has often been perverted to the worst purposes of aggrandizement and cupidity. If we look to the writers on international law, I think we shall find no sufficient ground for the right of intervention. Grotius, who wrote in the early part of the seventeenth century, denied its existence. Fenelon, who wrote about half a century later, denied it, except as a means of self-preservation, and then only when the danger was real and imminent. Vattel, who wrote nearly a century after Fenelon, and a century before our own times, regarded the States of Europe as forming a political system, and he restricted the right of forming confederacies and alliances for the purpose of intervention in the affairs of each other, to cases, in which such combinations were necessary to curb the ambition of any power which, from its superiority in physical strength, and its designs of oppression or conquest, threatened to become dangerous to its neighbors. De Martens, who wrote half a century ago, acknowledges with Vattel the existence of the right under certain conditions, though he hardly admits it to be well settled as a rule of international law; and he limits its exercise to neighboring States, or States occupying the same quarter of the globe. But, according to the two last writers, who have, perhaps, gone as far as any other public jurists of equal eminence towards a formal recognition of the right, it only justifies a union of inferior States, within the same immediate sphere of action, to prevent an accumulation of power in the hands of a single sovereign, which would be too great for the common liberty.

I am confident, Mr. President, that no one can rise from a review of the history of modern Europe, and from an examination of the writings of her public jurists, without being satisfied that the right of intervention as recognized by enlightened nations is what I have stated it to be—a mere right on the part of weaker States to combine for the purpose of preventing the subversion of their independence, and the alienation of their territories by a designing and powerful neighbour—a right to be exercised only in cases of urgent and immediate danger. It is simply a right of self-preservation, undefined, undeniable, having no settled or permanent foundation in public law, to be asserted only in extreme necessity, and when arbitrarily applied to practice, a most fruitful source of abuse, injustice and oppression. One clear and certain limitation it happily possesses—a limitation, which amid all its encroachments upon the independence of sovereign States, has never been surpassed. By universal consent, by the unvarying testimony of abuse itself, it is not to be exercised beyond the immediate sphere of the nations concerned; it pertains, rigidly and exclusively, to States within the same circle of political action. It is only by neighbors, for the protection of neighbors against neighbors that it can, even upon the broadest principles, be rightfully employed. When it traverses oceans, and looks to the regulation of the political concerns of other continents, it becomes a gigantic assumption, which for the independence of nations, for the interests of humanity, for the tranquility of the Old World and the New, should be significantly repelled.

Mr. President, a review of the history of Europe during the last two centuries will bring with it another conviction in respect to the right of intervention—that no reliance can be placed on its restriction in practice to the objects, to which it is limited by every public jurist, who admits its existence at all; and that nothing could be so discouraging to the friends of free government as an extension of the system to this Continent, if the power existed to introduce it here. Though the combinations it is claimed to authorize may, in some instances, have protected the coalescing parties from the danger of being overrun by conquering armies, the cases are perhaps as numerous, in which their interposition has been lent to break down the independence of states and to throw whole communities under the arms of their opponents, to which their feelings and principles were alike averse. The right, as has been seen—(and it cannot be too often repeated)—with the utmost latitude claimed for it by any public jurist, goes no farther than to authorize a league on the part of two or more weaker states to protect themselves against the designs of an ambitious and powerful neighbour. In its practical application it has more frequently resulted in a combination of powerful states to destroy their weaker neighbours for the augmentation of their own dominions or those of their allies. From a mere right to combine for self-preservation, they have made it in practice a right to divide, dismember and partition states at their pleasure—not for the purpose of diminishing the strength of a powerful adversary, but under the pretence of creating a system of balances, which is artificial in its structure, and, in some degree, incongruous in its elements, and which may be pulled down or many overthrown and destroy. Do we need examples of the abuse of the power, I will not call it a right? They will be found in the dismemberment of Saxony, the annexation of the republic Genoa to the kingdom of Sardinia, and the absorption of Venice by Austria. There is another and a more aggravated case of abuse to which recent events have given new prominence. In 1772, Russia, Prussia and Austria, under the pretence that the future annexation of Poland was dangerous to their own tranquility, seized upon about one-third of her territories and divided it among themselves. In 1793, notwithstanding her diminished proportions, she had become more dangerous, and they seized half of what they had left to her by the first partition. Sir, she continued to grow dangerous as she grew weak; and in two years after the second partition, they stripped her of all that remained. In 1815 the five great powers, at the Congress of Vienna, from motives of policy, and not from a returning sense of justice, organized the city of Cracow, and a portion of the surrounding territory with a population of about 100,000 souls into a republic, under the protection of Austria, Russia, and Prussia with a guaranty of its independence in perpetuity. Russia pledged herself at the same time to annex on her election to the throne of the kingdom of Poland in name and form, with a constitutional government. She kept her pledge seventeen years, and then, virtually incorporated it, as an integral part, into the Russian Empire. The little republic of Cracow was all that remained as a monument of the dismembered Kingdom. A year ago it was obliterated as an independent State by the three great powers of eastern and northern Europe, in violation of their solemn guaranty, and assigned to Austria. The name of Poland, the fountain of so many noble and animating recollections, is no longer to be found on the map of Europe. The three quarters of a century, which intervened from the inception to the consummation of this transaction, are not sufficient to conceal, or even to obscure its true character. The very magnitude of the space over which it is spread, only serves to bring it out in bolder and darker relief from the pages of history.

If the United States, in the progress of these usurpations, has not remonstrated against them, and contributed by her interposition to maintain the integrity of the States thus disorganized and dismembered in violation of every rule of right, and every suggestion of justice and humanity, it is because we have been faithful, against all movements of sympathy, against the very instincts of nature to the principle of abstaining from all interference with the movements of European powers, which relate exclusively to the condition of the quarter of the globe to which they belong. But, when it is proposed or threatened to extend to this continent, and to ourselves a similar system of balances, with all its danger of abuse and usurpation, I hold it to be our duty to inquire on what grounds it rests, that we may be prepared to resist all practical application of it to the independent States in this hemisphere.

Mr. President, the declaration of M. Guizot could hardly have been made without the previous approbation of the government of which he was the organ. The same sovereign occupies the throne of France—the same minister stands before it as the exponent of his opinions. Is the declaration to be regarded as a mere idle annunciation in words of a design never intended to be carried into practice? Let me answer the question by the briefest possible reference to circumstances. France was the coadjutor of England in the attempt to induce Texas to decline annexation to the Union. Failing in this, she attempted to accomplish the same object indirectly by persuading Mexico to recognize the independence of Texas on condition that the latter should remain an independent State. These terms were offered to Texas and rejected. In the year 1844, I believe less than twelve months before M. Guizot's declaration was made, (and the coincidence in point of time is remarkable,) a book on Oregon and California, was published in Paris, by order of the King of France, under the auspices of Marshal Soult, President of the Council, and M. Guizot, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and written by M. de Mofras, who was attached to the French legation in Mexico. The first part of the work is devoted to Mexico, and certainly contains some remarkable passages. He speaks of the establishment of a European monarchy as a project which had been suggested as the only one calculated to put an end to the divisions and annihilate the factions which desolated that beautiful country. He says the Catholic religion and family relations, with the ancient possessors of the country, would be the first conditions required of the princes, who should be called to reconstruct there a monarchical government. He then adds:

"The relatives of Spain, the French princes, one the grandchildren of Austria fulfil these conditions, and we may affirm that from whichever source a competitor should spring for the throne he unquestionably would be received by Mexican people.

"What then are the interests of France in these questions?

"Every intervention on the part of France in favor of any description whatever would be, and could have been, the first step of our policy; but we know that we are fortunately attached to the actual form of its government, brings with it disadvantages for our commerce, and inconveniences for our people."

He adds, that if Mexico is to preserve her republican form of government, her incorporation into the Union of the North would seem more favorable to France than her existing condition, on account of the development of commerce and all the guaranties of liberty, security, and justice, which his compatriots would enjoy; and that England would lose, under such an order of things, what France would gain. Thus, though the dismemberment and absorption of Mexico by the United States, are regarded by M. de Mofras, as preferable to the commercial monopoly and the "species of political sovereignty," as he denominates it, which England has exercised in that country, the first object of France, according to him, is a re-construction of monarchy in Mexico, with a foreign Prince on the throne, and this Prince from some branch of the Bourbon family. The opinions contained in this book are not put forth as the mere speculations of a private person. They are the opinions of an agent of the government: the publication is made by order of the King, and under the auspices of his two chief ministers, and so stated in the title page. I do not mean to hold the government of France responsible for all the opinions contained in that work; but, can we believe that those I have quoted, concerning as they do so grave a subject as the international relations of France with Mexico, and of Mexico with the United States, would have been put forth without modification under such high official sanctions, if they had been viewed with positive disfavor? It appears to me, that we are constrained to view them like the declaration of M. Guizot, though certainly not to the same extent, as possessing an official character, which we are not at liberty wholly to disregard, and more particularly, when we consider the one in connexion with the other.

And now, sir, I ask, do not these opinions and declarations, especially when we look to the open and direct interference of Great Britain and France, by force of arms, in the domestic affairs of some of the South American republics within the last two years, furnish a just ground of apprehension that we should retire from Mexico without a treaty and as enemies, that it might become a theatre for the exercise of influences of a most unfriendly character to us? With the aid of the monarchical party in Mexico, might there not be danger that the avowed design of establishing a throne, might be realized? The chances of open interposition are unquestionably diminished by the results of the war; but I am constrained to believe the chances of secret interference are increased by the avidity they impute to us for territorial extension. Ought not this danger to influence to some extent, our own conduct, at least, so far as to dissuade us from abandoning, until a better prospect of a durable peace shall exist, the advantage we have gained as belligerents? We know a great majority of the Mexican people are radically averse to any other than a republican form of government; but we know, also, the proneness of a people among whom anarchy reigns triumphant, to seek any refuge, which promises the restoration of tranquility and social order.

Mr. President, any attempt by a European power to interpose in the affairs of Mexico, either to establish a monarchy, or to maintain, in the language of M. Guizot, "the equilibrium of the great political forces in America," would be the signal for a war far more important in its consequences, and interminable in its issues than this. We could not submit to such interposition if we would. The public opinion of the country would compel us to resist it. We are committed by the most formal declarations, first made by President Monroe in 1823, and repeated by the present Chief Megistrate of the Union. We have protested, in the most solemn manner, against any further colonization by European powers on this continent. We have protested against any interference in the political concerns of the independent States in this hemisphere. A protest, it is true, does not imply that the ground it assumes is to be maintained at all hazards, and if necessary, by force of arms. Great Britain protested against the interference of France in the affairs of Spain in 1823; she has more recently protested against the absorption of Cracow by Austria as a violation of the political order of Europe, settled at Vienna by the allied sovereigns, and against the Montpensier marriage as a violation of the treaty of Utrecht; but I do not remember that in either case she did anything more than to proclaim to the world her dissent from the acts against which she entered her protest. It has always seemed to me to be unwise in a government to put forth manifestos without being prepared to maintain them by acts, or to make declarations of abstract principle until the occasion has arrived for enforcing them. The declarations of a President having no power to make war without a vote of Congress, or even to employ the military force of the country except to defend our own territory, is very different from the protest of a sovereign holding the issues of peace and war in his own hands. But the former may not be less effectual when they are sustained, as I believe those of Presidents Monroe and Polk are, in respect to European interference on the American continent, by an undivided public opinion, even though they may not have received a formal response from Congress. I hold, therefore, if any such interposition as that, to which I have referred, should take place, resistance on our part would inevitably follow, and we should become involved in controversies of which no man could foresee the end.

Before I quit this part of the subject, I desire to advert to some circumstances recently made public, and, if true, indicating significantly the extent to which Great Britain is disposed to carry her encroachments on this continent, as in every quarter of the globe. On the coast of Honduras in Central America, commonly called the Musquito Coast, there is a tribe of Indians bearing the same name, numbering but a few hundred individuals, and inhabiting some miserable villages in the neighborhood of Cape Gracias a Dios, near the fifteenth parallel of north latitude. Several hundred miles south is the river San Juan, running from lake Nicaragua to the Carribean Sea, a space of about two degrees of longitude, with the town of Nicaragua at its mouth and a castle or fort about midway between the town and the lake. The lake is only fifteen leagues from the Pacific, and constitutes, with the river San Juan, one of the proposed lines for a ship canal across the Isthmus. Great Britain has recently laid claim to the river San Juan and the town of Nicaragua, if she has not actually taken possession of the latter. I have seen a communication from the British Consul-General at Guatemala, asserting the independence of the Mosquitos as a nation. I have also seen a communication from the British Consul at Bluefield on the Mosquito shore, asserting that "the Mosquito flag and nation are under the special protection of the crown of Great Britain," and that "the limits which the British government is determined to maintain as the right of the King of the Mosquitos" "comprehend the San Juan river." By Arrowsmith's London Atlas, published in 1840, the Mosquito territory covered about 40,000 square miles, nearly as large an area as that of the state of New York: but it did not extend below the twelfth parallel of latitude, while the river San Juan is on the eleventh. I have seen the protest of the state of Nicaragua against the occupation of the town of Nicaragua on the river San Juan, which, as the protest declares, has been from time immemorial in her quiet and peaceable possession. The state of San Salvador, one of the Central American republics, also unites in the protest, and declares her determination, if the outrage shall be carried into effect, to exert her whole power until the usurper "shall be driven from the limits of Central America."

I understand, for I speak only from information, that Great Britian has for some time claimed to have had the Musquitos, a mere naked tribe of Indians of a few hundred persons, under her protection. Through her influence they appointed a king, who was taken to Belize, a British station on the bay of Yucatan, and there crowned. It is said, also, that on the decease of that king, he was found to have bequeathed his dominions to her Britanic majesty. It appears to be certain that she has, under this pretence of protection, extended her dominion over an immense surface in Central America; that she has at least one vessel of war, the Sun, commanded by an officer bearing an English name, "Commadore Trottey, of the Mosquito navy," as he is styled in a letter written by the British consul at Bluefield, and that she is still further extending herself, against the remonstrance of the Central American States. But these States, besides being physically weak, are distracted by internal feuds; and if the proceedings complained of be not the unauthorized acts of British agents, which Great Britain will disavow, it is hardly to be expected that a usurpation, so unjustifiably consummated, will be abandoned on an appeal to the justice of the wrong-doer. Whether our government should remain quiescent under this encroachment upon near and defenceless neighbors, is a question worthy of consideration. Under any circumstances, it seems to me to afford little assurance of non-interference with the affairs of Mexico, if our forces were to be withdrawn without a treaty.

There is another consideration which ought not to be overlooked. In July last, Lord George Bentinck made a motion for an address to her Britannic majesty praying her to take such measures as she might deem proper to secure the payment of the Spanish government bonds held by British subjects. Those bonds amount to about 380,000,000 of dollars, and on about 340,000,000 no interest whatever has been paid, and including this debt nearly 630,000,000 of dollars, are due to British subjects by foreign government—a sum equal to about one-fifth of her national debt. He contended that "by the law of nations, from time immemorial, it has been held that the recovery of just debts is a lawful cause of war, if the country from which payment is due, refuses to listen to the claims of the country to whom money is owing." He quoted authorities to show that the payment of the debt, or the interest on it, might be enforced without having recourse to army, though asserting the right to resort to force to compel it. He referred to the rich colonies of Spain, and especially Cuba, to show that there was wealth enough in its annual produce and revenue "to pay the whole debt due by Spain to British bond holders." He referred to the naval force which Spain possessed to show that there would not be "any way of effective resistance," and that "the most timid minister" need not fear it. Having, in the course of his remarks, called the attention of the Minister of Foreign Affairs to the subject, Lord Palmerston, in responding to his call, entered into an extended statement in respect to the foreign debt due to British subjects. He drew a distinction between transactions by one government with another, by British subjects with a foreign government, by British subjects with the subjects of another government, and between debts and acts of injustice and oppression. This distinction, however, he treated as matter of expediency and established practice. He assented to the doctrine laid down by the noble Lord, who made the motion for an address, and he said if it were the wise policy of England to lay down a rule that she would enforce obligations of this character, with the same rigor as those of a different character, she would have a full and fair right, according to the laws of nations, to do so. And he concluded by saying that England had not refrained from taking the steps urged by his noble friend, because she was "afraid of these States, or all of them put together;" that it was not to be supposed the British Parliament, or the British nation, would long remain patient under the wrong, and that they had ample power and means to obtain justice.

I pass over the doctrines put forth in the speech of Lord George Bentinck, and sanctioned by Lord Palmerston, though I believe it not perfectly clear that they can be maintained to the full extent, by an appeal to any well established principles of international law. You know, sir, that we have sometimes found British statesmen, even those holding places nearest to the throne, at fault, both in respect to matters of principle and matters of fact, though it is certainly but justice to concede to them the possession of more enlarged views of policy, combined with greater practical talent and tact, than is often to be found in the councils of European sovereigns. I pass over also an offensive allusion to the failure of two or three of the states of this Union to pay their debts, "as a stain upon the national character," (I use his own language) when it is well known that the suspension of payment was temporary, and from overruling necessity; that in most instances resumption has taken place, and, that, in all the most earnest efforts have been made to resume the discharge of their obligations. This imputation was cast upon us at the moment, when our people, with one heart, were sending abroad their agricultural surplus to feed the famished population of Ireland, not merely in the way of commercial exchange, but in the form of donations, in ship-loads, public and private. And so far as the commercial portion is concerned, I believe our merchants have for months been draining our banks of specie, to send abroad to meet their own pecuniary obligations, while they have been unable to draw on their debtors in England for the proceeds of the bread stuffs, by which her subjects have been fed. But I pass by all this, and come to the important fact that Mexico was among the indebted foreign States enumerated in a report, on which the motion of Lord George Bentinck was founded. What is the extent of her indebtedness I do not know, but I understand about seventy millions of dollars—and I believe it was but recently that the public domain in California was mortgaged to the creditors for a portion of this amount, though the lien is now said to be discharged.

I appeal to honorable Senators to say, with these facts before them—with this public and official assertion of a principle, which, according to Lord Palmerston, the British government has only abstained from practically enforcing through mere considerations of policy—whether if our forces were withdrawn from Mexico, and that country should become a prey to the anarchy and confusion which has reigned there so long, and which if renewed would, in all probability, become universal and hopeless—whether, I say, there would not be a temptation too strong to be resisted, to reduce the principle thus proclaimed to practice—whether some portion of the Mexican territory might not be occupied as a guaranty for the payment of the debt due to British subjects, and thus another principle be violated, which we are committed to maintain? I do not mean to say that this consideration, if it stood alone, should absolutely control our conduct. But as auxiliary to the graver considerations to which I have referred, it appears to me that it may properly be allowed some weight—enough, sir, perhaps, to turn the scale, if it were already balanced—though, I think, there is sufficient, without it, to incline us decisively to the side of continued occupation.

Besides, British subjects have other extensive pecuniary interests in Mexico: they have large commercial establishments and heavy investments of capital in the mining districts. If the political affairs of that country should fall into inextricable confusion, it is not to be supposed that these great interests will be abandoned by Great Britain; and yet it is extremely difficult to see by what interposition on her part they could be secured without the danger of collision between her and us.

Mr. President, in what I have said in respect to the danger of foreign interposition, I have not relied upon the ephemeral opinions of the day, or on opinions expressed in public journals abroad, however intimately those journals may be supposed to be connected with governments, as the organs of the views which it is deemed advisable to throw out, from time to time, for the public consideration or guidance. I have resorted to no irresponsible sources. I have presented opinions and declarations proclaimed with more or less of official sanction, and for the most part, with the highest. I mean the declarations of ministers, speaking for their governments to the popular body, and as the responsible representatives of sovereigns, holding in their own hands the authority to enforce, or attempt to enforce, what they proclaim. How far these declarations, taken in connection with the acts referred to, should influence our conduct, is a question on which we may not all agree.—But it appears to me that it would be a great error in statesmanship to treat them as wholly unworthy of our consideration. Jealousy of our increasing power, commercial rivalry, political interests, all combine to give them importance. The existence of a wide interest to provide as far as possible that these adverse influences shall find no theatre for their exercise. To abandon Mexico would, it seems to me, throw wide open all the avenues for their admittance—one power for commercial monopoly, and the other for political control—and perhaps impose on us the difficult and dangerous task of removing evils, which a proper vigilance might have prevented.

It may be, Mr. President, that we shall have an early peace. I sincerely hope so. In this case, we must withdraw from Mexico; and it may, perhaps, be said that the dangers I have referred to as likely to result from our absence at the present moment, may possibly be realized. These dangers, whatever they may be, we must incur whenever we shall tender us a peace, which we ought to accept. But there is a wide difference between retiring as belligerents and enemies without a treaty, and as friends under an amicable arrangement, with solemn obligations on both sides to keep the peace. In the former case, probably one of the first acts of Mexico would be to reassemble her army, and her government might fall under the control of her military leaders. In the latter, amicable relations being restored, and military forces being unnecessary, at least to act against us, the peace party would have better hopes of maintaining themselves, of preventing the army, which is now regarded as responsible for the national disasters, from gaining the ascendency, and also of excluding influences from abroad, which would be hostile to her interests, and fatal to the common tranquillity of both countries.

In the references I have made to France and Great Britain, I have been actuated by no feeling of unkindness or hostility to either. Rapid and wide-spread as has been the progress of the latter, we have never sought to interfere with it. She holds one-third of the North American continent. She has established her dominion in the Bermudas, the West Indies, and in Guiana, on South American continent. She holds Belize, on the bay of Yucatan, in North America, with a district of about 14,000 square miles, if we may trust her own geographical delineations.

We see her in the occupation of territories in every quarter of the globe, vastly, inordinately extended, and still ever extending herself. It is not easy to keep pace with her encroachments. A few years ago the Indus was the western boundary of her Indian empire. She has passed it. She has overrun Afghanistan and Beeloochistan, though I believe she has temporarily withdrawn from the former. She stands at the gates of Persia. She has discussed the policy of passing Persia, and making the Tigris her western boundary in Asia. One stride more would place her upon the shores of the Mediterranean; and her armies would no longer find their way to India by the circumnavigation of Africa. Indeed, she has now, for all government purposes of communication, except the transportation of troops and munitions of war, a direct intercourse with the east. Her steamers of the largest class run from England to Alexandria; from Alexandria there is a water communication with Cairo—some sixty miles; from Cairo it is but eight hours overland to Suez, at the head of the Red Sea; from Suez her steamers of the largest class run to Aden, a military station of hers at the mouth of the Red Sea; from Aden to Ceylon, and from Ceylon to China. She is not merely conquering her way back from Hindoostan. She has passed it. She has overrun Aff have a right to insist on a fair boundary; we may exact indemnity for injuries; we may demand indemnification for the expenses of the war, if we please. But here all right ceases; and if, when this is conceded, we have more on our hands, we are bound, on every principle of law and good conscience to make restitution. It is admitted, on all hands, that she is incapable of indemnifying us in money. But she may do so by ceding to us territory, which is useless to her, which she has not the ability to defend, and which may be useful to us. I have always been in favor of acquiring territory on just terms. The acquisition of California has always appeared to me very desirable on account of its ports on the Pacific. I have uniformly voted for acquiring it, when the proposition has came before us. I believe on the first occasion, I was in a minority of ten or eleven. My opinion is unchanged. Indeed, it is confirmed by the fact that California has, by our military operations, become forever detached from Mexico. If it were to be abandoned by us, its forty thousand inhabitants would, undoubtedly, establish an independent government for themselves, and they would maintain it if undisturbed by foreign interference. I take the actual condition of things as I find it, and with an earnest desire to fulfil all the obligations it devolves on us in a spirit of justice towards Mexico and towards the people of our own.

I concur also in what the honorable Senator from South Carolina has said in relation to the influence of war on our political institutions. No man can deplore it under any circumstances, more than myself. Independently of the evils which it always brings in its train, there are considerations connected with our political organization and the nature of our social progress, which render it doubly pernicious in its tendencies. The final success of the experiment we are making in free government depends, in some degree, on a steady maintenance of the spirit of peace, in which our political system had its origin, and in which it has thus far been administered. Great as is our capacity for war, our whole scheme of government is averse to it. The greatest possible economy in expenditure; the least possible patronage in the hands of the Executive; the smallest pecuniary exactions from the people, consistent with our absolute wants; the absence of all demands on the public treasury, which call for unusual contributions of revenue or promote excessive disbursements; the exemption of the country from all exigencies which devolve on the legislative and executive departments of the government the exercise of extraordinary powers—these are the conditions under which the ends of our political organization are most likely to be fulfilled. Sir, none of these conditions belong to a state of war. Extravagant disbursements; extraordinary contributions of revenue—present prospective—present, in augmented burdens of taxation—prospective in the shape of loans and anticipations of income, leading ultimately to taxation; extraordinary powers summarily, and sometimes arbitrarily exercised—these are the inseparable companions of war; and they are inimical to the very genius of our social system.

There are considerations, which, in my judgment, render a war with Mexico peculiarly unfortunate, and which justify all the efforts we have made to bring it to an amicable termination. We are mutually engaged in carrying out on this continent the experiment of free-government, which in all other ages has proved abortive. We are trying it under eminently auspicious circumstances. We have no strong governments around us, founded upon antagonist principles and adverse in their example and influence to the success of ours. We are sustained by the faculty of popular representation, which was unknown, or at least imperfectly known, to the free States of antiquity, and by force of which we have been enabled to carry out, on geographical acres of indefinite extent, an organization which had previously been deemed applicable only to communities of limited population and territory. It is natural, under these circumstances, that the friends of free government, wherever they are to be found, should turn to us as the last hope of liberal institutions. They look to us for examples of moderation and forbearance in our intercourse with foreign nations—especially those having forms of government analogous to our own—and for an exemption from the evil passions which have embroiled the nations of the Old World, and involved them, century after century, with brief intermissions, in wars of ambition and revenge. In asserting the superiority of our own form of government, the strength of the argument will be weakened, if we shall be found no more exempt than those which are less popular, from strife and contention with neighboring States. Regarding the success of our institutions as affecting deeply the welfare of our race, and vindicating the competency of mankind to self-government, I have always esteemed it peculiarly unfortunate that any cause of alienation should have existed of sufficient magnitude to induce the two principal republics of the western hemisphere to turn their arms against each other. The cause of liberal government is injured, and far more deeply injured than it has been by the dissention of the republics in the southern portion of the American continent.

These are considerations which it were well for us always to keep in view—in peace, that we may not rush hastily into war; in war, that we may spare no honorable effort for a restoration of peace.

There is yet another consideration of a kindred character. While the monarchies of Europe are at peace with each other, and social improvement is advancing, on the continent at least, with unparalelled rapidity, almost the only wars now waging among neighboring States are between us and Mexico, between some of the South American republics. I desire, as much as any one can, to see these dissentions composed, and to see these republican States resume the fulfilment of their great mission among the nations—the maintenance of the principles of political liberty and the cultivation of the arts of civilization and peace.

In these views I concur with the Senator from South Carolina. But here I am constrained to separate from him. When we come to practical measures, our paths lie wide apart.

It is for these very reasons I have just stated that I cannot assent to the policy he proposes. I believe it calculated to prolong the war—not to terminate it; to keep alive the spirit of animosity which divides us from Mexico, instead of restoring the friendly relations which ought to exist between us. I am in favor, then, of standing as we are. And, sir, if she shall refuse to make peace; if we must continue in the occupation of her capital and three-fourths of her territory, it may be in the order of Providence that we shall, through this very necessity, become the instruments of her political and social regeneration. In the party conflicts which distract her, the means may be found of consolidating her government on a republican basis, of healing her dissensions, and of uniting her to us in bonds of friendship by an exercise of magnanimity and forbearance in the final adjustment of our difficulties with her. I believe even now something of the salutary influence of our presence in her capital and principal sea-ports, begins to be felt. The abolition of transit duties; the reduction of the imposts on foreign articles of necessity and convenience; and a freer commerce among the Mexican states, may, if continued, strike a fatal blow at the anti-commercial system by which her people have been oppressed, and the internal abuses by which her rulers have grown rich—a system of maladministration not even equalled by that which exists in old Spain. The higher improvement in goverment, in the arts, and in civilization under all its forms, which distinguishes our own people, may, by force of actual contact, be communicated to the Mexicans, and lay the foundation of an improved social order. Melancholy as the reflection is, it is nevertheless true, that civilization, and even christianity, have sometimes been propagated by arms where they would otherwise have been hopelessly excluded. Thus, the very passions which seem fitted only to desolate human society, may, in the hands of Providence, become the agents of its advancement. Let us, then, hope and trust that the contest in which we are engaged with a neighboring power, deplorable as we all consider it, may be an instrument of social and political amelioration to our adversary.

The Senator from South Carolina has said in his emphatic language that we are "tied to a corpse." It is a striking figure, Mr. President, and he partakes strongly of the boldness in which the illustrations of that distinguished Senator are always conceived. Mexico is, indeed, prostrate—almost politically inanimate, if you please—under the oppressions which have been heaped upon her, year after year, by unscrupulous rulers. But I should be sorry to believe her beyond the power of resuscitation, even by human means. I do not expect, as our contact with her becomes more intimate, to see her, like the dead body touched by the bones of the prophet, spring, at a single bound, to life and strength. But I hope to see her—possibly through our instrumentality—freed from the despotic sway of her military rulers, and rising, by sure degrees, to the national importance I wish her to possess—order and tranquility first, next social improvement and stable government, and at last an honorable rank among the nations of the earth. I contemplate no direct interference with her government—no permanent system of protection to be exercised over it—no alliance with her beyond what may be necessary to secure to us the objects of peace. But I do contemplate a treaty, stipulating for commercial arrangements, for protection and security to our own citizens in their future intercourse with her, and no withdrawal of our forces without it, at least until all chance of obtaining one shall prove hopeless. If we were to retire now, all commerce between her and us would cease and be transferred to our rivals, our frontier would be a line of war, not a boundary between peaceful neighbors, and unless the tide of conquest should be poured back upon her under the provocations such a condition of our relations would almost necessarily superinduce, no citizen of the United States could be expected for years to come, to plant his foot on Mexican soil. War dissolves the political and commercial relations of independent States, so far as they rest upon voluntary agreement. It is only by a treaty of peace that they can be revived or new relations be substituted for the old.

Mr. President: Advocating as I do the occupation of Mexico until she shall consent to make peace, it may be incumbent on me to state in what manner I think it can be best maintained. And here I must say, I think the estimates of the effective force in the field have been greatly overstated. I propose no specific plan for adoption. I leave all practical measures in the hands of those to whom they belong. I only purpose to state what suggests itself to my mind, as advisable. I think we should find it most advantageous to remain much as we are, excepting to occupy such ports on the Pacific as our fleet may reduce and maintain as commercial avenues to the interior. It may, however, become necessary to occupy San Luis Potosi and Zacatecas for the protection of the mining operations in those States and the agricultural districts near the city of Mexico to command supplies for the army. I should consider an army of twenty-five thousand well-disciplined effective men the smallest number adequate to the purpose of maintaining positions keeping open communications from the coast to the interior, and dispersing the enemy's troops if they shall be re-embodied; but in order to keep up such a force we should require a nominal organi-regiments at least forty thousand men with but thirty thousand under pay. The general staff, the twenty-two regiments of regulars now in service, and the ten new regiments proposed to be raised will nearly constitute such a force, and when the latter are organized and brought into the field, a portion of the volunteers may be discharged, if it shall be found prudent to do so. Many of the regiments are greatly reduced in numbers, and, as I understand, are anxious to return home. I doubt now whether there are more than twenty-five thousand effective men in all Mexico, though the rolls show over forty thousand. (General CASS, Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, here said, the Adjutant General was of opinion that they did not exceed 24,000.) Some of the returns, on which the Adjutant General's report is founded, are of as early a date as August last. It will be recollected that last summer, when there was great party in relation to General Scott, statements of the number of his troops were published here—they were founded on the returns in the Adjutant General's office, and in his official report of the battles before the city of Mexico, General Scott complained that his force had been greatly overstated. He said it had been "trebled" in these returns, if I recollect rightly, and that the army had been "disgusted" by the exaggeration. The returns of the army now should, in like manner, be subjected to great deductions in order to obtain the real effective force. If the ten regiments proposed by the bill are authorized, months will be required to raise them; they will not probably, as the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has stated, give many more than 7000 men, and in the mean time the army will become constantly diminished by the casualties of service. For these reasons, and for those given—and so ably given—some days since by my honorable friend from Mississippi, (Mr. DAVIS,) I support the bill. I support it for another reason which has governed me from the commencement of the war: to place at the control of the Executive the men and measures deemed necessary to bring it to an honorable termination.

As hostilities are now suspended, the chief province of the army will be to maintain internal tranquility, support the civil authorities in the execution of the laws, to free the country from the robber and guerrilla bands by which it is infested, and subserve the great purposes of government by affording security to liberty, property and life—a security the Mexicans have not often fully enjoyed. The very exercise of these beneficent agencies will tend to disarm hostility toward us with the thinking portion of the population. It will place our armies in a most favorable contrast with hers, which have been scourges rather than protectors to their own countrymen. I would, if possible, have no more bloodshed. I would make our armies the protectors, not the enemies, of the Mexican people, and render them subservient to the eradication of abuses and to the institution of a better civil administration under Mexican magistrates, abstaining from all interference with the frame of the government, and changing in its action only what, by universal consent, requires to be changed. If this course were to be adopted and steadily pursued, I should earnestly hope its effect would be at no distant time to make the capital, under our protection, the centre of an influence, which would lead to the re-establishment of the federative system on a durable basis, and give to that distracted country the settled order, which is alone necessary to make her happy and prosperous.

To abandon the City of Mexico would I fear put an end to all these prospects and hopes. That city is the political, as well as the financial centre of the Republic. Where governments have been instituted and deposed, armies levied, revenue systems devised and carried into execution. So long as we hold it and control the adjoining districts, I believe nothing but imprudence or mismanagement can raise up a formidable opposition to us. If we abandon it, all the resources of the country, which it commands, will again be at the control of its rulers, to be employed against us in the renewal of active hostilities. Before it was captured, energetic movements seemed to me our true policy. Now that it is in our undisputed possession, our leading object should be, to introduce better commercial and financial systems, and let them work out under our protection, their legitimate results.

Great qualities are necessary in him, who is charged with the execution of these delicate and responsible functions. He should have prudence, self-control, a knowledge of civil affairs, of the country, of the people, and their character, and, if possible, their language. Established institutions, existing usages, sometimes prejudices even must be respected. Some of the most disastrous reverses, which have befallen armies of occupation, have had their origin in violations of the prevailing customs and feelings of the people. To avoid this fatal error, everything depends on the discretion and wisdom of the executive authority.

It may be that all reasonable expectations will be disappointed, that the hostility of Mexico will prove unappeasable, that she will prefer the political disorganization, which now exists to an amicable arrangement with us. If so, circumstances must dictate the course to be pursued when this conviction shall be forced on us. But, sir, let us not adopt such a conclusion hastily. Let us rely on the influence of rational motives to give us peace.

And now, sir, I submit whether this course had not better be pursued for a while, if I am right in supposing the temporary occupation of Mexico, under discreet officers, accredited to establish peace, rather than to withdraw our forces, and leave the adjustment of difficulties to the uncertain chance of a restoration of a responsible government, to be terminated at last, perhaps, by the renewed arbitrament of arms.

I have thus stated with frankness the views I entertain in respect to the future conduct of the war. Notwithstanding the anxious consideration I have given to the subject, they may be erroneous. It is a question of great difficulty, on which differences of opinion may well exist, and on which a mistaken course of policy may lead to the most unpleasant consequences. Whatever faith I may entertain in the soundness of the opinions I have advanced, I certainly should have more if they were not totally at variance with those of gentlemen possessing, from longer experience, much higher claims than myself to public confidence. But I have not on this account thought proper to withhold them, knowing as we do that, from the very contrariety and conflict of thought and conviction, valuable deductions may sometimes be drawn.

Mr. President, I feel that I have already tre-passed on the indulgence of the Senate too long; but I am unwilling to close without asking its attention for a very few moments to some considerations connected with our future growth and progress, and with the influence we must, in spite of ourselves, exert over the destinies of Mexico. They are no new opinions: they have been expressed years ago, both in public and private.

Sir, no one who has paid a moderate degree of attention to the laws and elements of our increase, can doubt that our population is destined to spread itself across the American continent, filling up, with more or less completeness, according to attraction of soil and climate the space that intervenes between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. This eventual, and, perhaps, in the order of time, this not very distant extension of our settlements over a tract of country, with a diameter, as we go westward, greatly disproportioned to its length, becomes a subject of the highest interest to us. On the whole extent of our northern flank, from New Brunswick to the point where the northern boundary of Oregon touches the Pacific, we are in contact with British colonists having, for the most part, the same common origin with ourselves, but controlled and moulded by political influences from the eastern hemisphere, if not adverse, certainly not decidedly friendly to us. The strongest tie which can be relied on to bind us to them is the ties of friendship and good neighborhood, is that of commerce; and this, as we know, is apt to run into rivalry, and sometimes becomes a fruitful source of alienation.

From our northern boundary we turn to our southern. What races are to border on us here, what is to be their social and political character, and what their means of annoyance? Are our two frontiers, only seven parallels of latitude apart when we pass Texas, to be flanked by settlements having no common bond of union with ours? Our whole southern line is conterminous, throughout its whole extent, with the territories of Mexico, a large portion of which is nearly unpopulated. The geographical area of Mexico is about 1,700,000 square miles, and her population something more than 7,000,000 souls. The whole northern and central portion, taking the 26th parallel of latitude as the dividing line, containing more than 1,200,000 square miles, has about 750,000 inhabitants, about two inhabitants to three square miles. The southern portion, with less than 500,000 square miles, has a population of about six and a half millions of souls, or thirteen inhabitants to one square mile. The aboriginal races, which occupy and overrun a portion of California and New Mexico, must there, as everywhere else, give way to the advancing wave of civilization, either to be overwhelmed by it, or to be driven upon perpetually contracting areas, where from a diminution of their accustomed sources of subsistence, they must soon become extinct by force of an invincible law. We see the operation of this law in every portion of this continent. We have no power to control it, if we would. It is the behest of Providence that idleness and ignorance, and barbarism, shall give place to industry and knowledge, and civilization. The European and mixed races, which possess Mexico, are not likely, either from moral or physical energy, to become formidable rivals or enemies. The bold and courageous enterprise, which overran and conquered Mexico, appears not to have descended to the present possessors of the soil. Either from the influence of climate or the admixture of races, (the fusion of castes, to use the technical phrase,) the conquerors have, in turn, become the conquered. The ancient Castilian energy is, in a great degree, subdued; and it has given place, with many other noble traits of the Spanish character, to a peculiarity, which seems to have marked the race in that country, under whatever combinations it is found—a proneness to civil discord, and a suicidal waste of its own strength.

With such a territory and such a people on our southern border, what is to be the inevitable course of empire? It needs no powers of prophecy to foretell. Sir, I desire to speak plainly. Why should we not, when we are discussing the operation of moral and physical laws, which are beyond our control? As our population moves westward on our own territory, portions will cross our southern boundary. Settlements will be formed within the unoccupied and sparsely peopled territory of Mexico. Unconquerable habits and tastes, differences of political opinion and principle, and numberless other elements of diversity will lead to a separation of these newly formed societies from the inefficient government of Mexico. They will not endure to be held in subjection to a system, which neither yields them protection, nor offers any incentive to their proper development and growth. They will form independent States on the basis of constitutions identical in all their leading features with our own; and they will naturally seek to unite their fortunes to ours. The fate of California is already sealed: it can never be re-united to Mexico. The operation of the great causes, to which I have alluded, must, at no distant day, detach the whole of northern Mexico from the southern portion of that republic. It is for the very reason that Mexico is incapable of defending her possessions against the elements of disorder within and the progress of better influences from without, that I desire to see the inevitable political change, which is to be wrought in the condition of her northern departments, brought about without any improper interference on our part. I do not speak of our military movements. I refer to the time when our difficulties with her shall be healed, and when she shall be left to the operation of pacific influences—silent, but more powerful than the arm of force. For the reason that she is defenceless, if for no other, I should be opposed to all schemes of conquest. Acquisition by force is the vice of arbitrary governments. I desire never to see it the reproach of ours. For the sake of the national honor, as well as the permanency of our political institutions, I desire not to see it. The extension of free government on this continent can only be arrested, if arrested at all, by substituting war for the arts of peace. Leave it to itself, and nothing can prevent the progress of our population across the continent. Mr. Jefferson, with his prophetic forecast, foretold this result forty years ago. He prophecied the peaceful progress of our people to the Pacific. He foresaw them forming new set tlements, and, when strong enough to maintain themselves, organizing independent societies and governing themselves by constitutions and laws analagous to our own. It is true, he believed the area of freedom might be enlarged, advantageously to ourselves any others, without extending to the same broad limits the area of our jurisdiction. It was the progress and the triumph of great principles of political right, to which his philosophical mind instinctively turned as to the legitimate aim and boundary of our ambition and desires. Since his day the public mind in this country has greatly outrun his anticipations of our progress. It looks to the extension of our constitution and laws over regions which were formerly considered beyond our reach as integral portions of the same system of government. Modern improvements have given great strength to this prevailing sentiment. It is possible by steam power, if we can succeed in making the proper application of it, over so broad a surface, to reach the Pacific ocean from Lake Michigan, or the Mississippi, in eight or nine days—a period of time less than that, which was required to travel from Boston to Philadelphia, when the Congress of the American colonies first assembled in the latter city. Under those circumstances the extension of our political boundary so as to embrace all territory we may justly call our own, seems no longer to be considered a questionable policy. If other districts, not now within the territories of the Union, shall found independent governments and shall desire to unite themselves to us on terms mutually acceptable, it is a question which concerns only them and us, and in which no stranger can be permitted to intrude. When the time comes for the settlement of any such questions, they will doubtless be considered with all the solemnity which belongs to propositions involving the public welfare. To those with whom the decision belongs let us leave them, with the assurance that the wisdom which has governed and guided us so long, will still point out to us the path of liberty, tranquility and safety.

One position we have assumed, and I trust it will be maintained with inflexible firmness, that no power beyond this continent can be permitted to interfere with our progress, so long as there is on our part no violation of its own rights. I would resist, at the outset, as matter of the gravest offence, all indications of such interference. If the abstract right could be asserted on grounds of international law, there has been nothing in the nature of our extension, or the means by which it has been accomplished, to warrant its application to us. From the formation of our government, for nearly three-quarters of a century, military power—brute force—has had no agency in the conquests we have achieved. We have overrun no provinces or countries abounding in wealth. Our capital has witnessed no triumphal entries of returning armies bearing with them the spoils and trophies of conquest. Our ships have not been seen returning from subjugated districts, freighted with the tributes of an extended commerce. In the extension of our commercial intercourse, we have not, like our Anglo-Saxon mother, been seen hewing down with the sword, with unrelenting and remorseless determination, every obstacle which opposed itself to her progress. Our career thus far has been stained by no such companionship with evil. Our conquets have been the peaceful achievements of enterprise and industry—the one leading the way into the wilderness, the other following and completing the acquisition by the formal symbols of occupancy and possession. They have looked to no objects beyond the conversion of uninhabited wilds into abodes of civilization and freedom. Their only arms were the axe and the ploughshare. The accumuations of wealth they have brought were all extracted from the bosom of the earth by the unoffending hand of labor. If, in the progress of our people westward, they shall occupy territories not now our own, but to become ours by amicable arrangements with the governments to which they belong, which of the nations of the earth shall venture to stand forth, in the face of the civilized world, and call on me to pause in this great work of human improvement? It is as much the interest of Europe as it is ours, that we should be permitted to follow undisturbed the path which, in the allotment of national fortunes, we seem appointed to tread. Our country has long been a refuge for those who desire a larger liberty than they enjoy under their own rulers. It is an outlet for the political disaffection of the Old World—for social elements which might there have become sources of agitation, but which are here silently and tranquilly incorporated into our system, ceasing to be principles of disturbance as they attain the greater freedom, which was the object of their separation from less congenial combinations in other quarters of the globe. Nay more. It is into the vast reservoir of the western wilderness, teeming with fruitfulness and fertility, that Europe is constantly pouring, under our protection, her human surplusses, unable to draw from her own bosom the elements of their support and reproduction.—She is literally going along with us in our march to prosperity and power, to share with us in its triumphs and its fruits. Happily, this continent is not a legitimate theatre for the political arrangements of the sovereigns of the eastern Hemisphere. Their armies may range undisturbed by us over the plains of Europe, Asia, and Africa, dethroning monarchs, partitioning kingdoms and subverting republics as interest or caprice may dictate. But political justice demands that in one quarter of the globe self-government, freedom, the arts of peace, shall bo permitted to work out, unmolested, the great purposes of human civilization.

Mr. President: I trust there will be nothing in the final adjustment of our difficulties with Mexico to impair, in any degree, the moral of our example in the past. Our course, heretofore, has been one of perpetual exertion to bring about an amicable arrangement with her. I trust we shall persevere in the same course of conduct, whatever unwillingness she may exhibit to come to terms. Entertaining the opinions which I have expressed, I naturally feel a deep solicitude, as an American citizen, that our public conduct should comport with the dignity of the part we seem destined to perform in the great drama of international politics. I desire to see our good name unsullied, and the character we have gained for moderation, justice and scrupulousness in the discharge of our international obligations, maintained unimpaired. In these let us be assured our great strength consists; for it is these which make us strong in the opinion of mankind.

In what I have said concerning the progress of our people over the unpopulated regions west of us, and in respect to our responsibilities as a nation, I trust I shall have incurred no imputation of inconsistency. On the contrary, I trust I shall be considered consistent in all I have said. I regard our extension, as I have endeavoured to foreshadow it, to be the inevitable result of causes, the operation of which it is not in our power to arrest. At the same time, I hold it to be our sacred duty to see that it is not encouraged or promoted by improper means. While I should consider it the part of weakness to shrink from extension, under the apprehension that it might bring with it the elements of discord and disunion, as our political boundaries are enlarged, I should hold it to be the part of folly and dishonor to attempt to accelerate it by agencies incompatible with our obligations to other nations. It is the dictate of wisdom and of duty, to submit ourselves to the operation of the causes, which are at work, and which will work on in spite of us, in carrying civilization and freedom across the American continent.

In advocating a continued occupation of the cities and territory we have acquired in Mexico, until she shall assent to reasonable terms of peace, I trust also that I shall be deemed consistent with myself. Deprecating war as the greatest of calamities, especially for us, I desire to see this war brought to a close at the earliest practicable day. I am in favour of whatever measures are most likely to accomplish this desirable end. I am opposed to an abandonment of our position:

1st. Because I believe it would open a field of domestic dissension in Mexico which may be fatal to her existence as an independent state, or make her take refuge in the arms of despotism;

2d. Because it might lead to external interference in her affairs of the most dangerous tendency both to her and us; and

3d. Because I fear that we should only gain a temporary suspension of hostilities, to be renewed under great disadvantages to us, and with every prospect of a longer and more sanguinary contest.

Mr. President: It is this last consideration which weighs most heavily upon my own mind. I hold it to be indispensable to the public welfare, under all its aspects, that we should have, at the termination of this contest, a solid and stable peace. Unpromising as the condition of things seems at the present moment, my hope still is, that firmness tempered with prudence, will give us, not a mere outward pacification with secret irritation rankling within, but substantial concord and friendship, which shall leave no wound unhealed. We should be satisfied with nothing short of an accommodation of differences, which will enable the country with confidence to lay aside its armor, and to resume the peaceful pursuits, to which, by the inexorable law of our condition, we must look for prosperity and safety.

My advice then, (if I may presume to advise,) is to stand firm, holding ourselves ready at all times to make peace, and carrying into our negotiations for that purpose a determination to cement a future good understanding with our adversary, by an adjustment of our differences on terms of justice, moderation, and magnanimity.

Mr. PHELPS indicated a wish to address the Senate, but the hour being late,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, 1848.

EXPORTS FROM PUBLIC STORES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, made agreeably to law, with an abstract of returns of American goods exported during the year ending the 30th September, 1847, which was ordered to be printed.

Also, a report of the Secretary of War, made agreeably to law, showing the expenditures for the contingent expenses of the military establishment, during the year 1847; which was ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented the memorial of the Board of Managers of the American Indian Mission Association, praying the adoption of measures for improving the condition of the various Indian tribes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of John Charles Fremont, praying an investigation, by a committee, into claims on the government, originating in California, partly in the establishment of the independence of California, before the war with Mexico was known, and partly since in carrying on military operations under the authority of the United States, and afterwards in supporting the civil government there.

For part of these claims he said that the drafts drawn by the petitioner had been protested, and for these and other claims the Secretary of War had answered that "special legislation was necessary. For this special legislation the present petition was presented, and it asked the speedy action of Congress that the far distant claimants might not wait too long for tardy justice. The claims were meritorious; they were for personal services rendered in war—for supplies furnished—for sacrifices made, and all in a spirit of patriotism and honor. They had given California to the United States, and the gift was worth infinitely more than the cost even when all just claims were paid, and all justice done to the settlers. The nature and amount of the claims required a careful investigation: the good should be paid at once: the bad should be silenced forever; and now is the time to do it. The petition asked the establishment of a commission in California, to audit and allow the claims, the amounts to be paid there to the claimants by the proper officers of the pay, the quartermaster, and the commissary departments. Auditing the accounts there, and payment there, were the great points of security both to the government and the claimants. Nothing should be paid at Washington to agents or speculators: none but claimants in their own persons should be paid at Washington.

To go to paying claims here would open the door to unbounded fraud, which would not be closed in ten, nor twenty, nor fifty years. He believed he might say seventy-five years; for Congress was now paying revolutionary claims of that age; and the California claims, if allowed to fall into the hands of agents and speculators, would be a rich mine to be explored for a long time, and the longer the richer, especially after the death of Mr. Fremont. The establishment of a commission, to act on the spot, was the proper way to do justice and prevent frauds in future. The petition avowed that the petitioner knew almost every transaction on which a liability of the United States could arise. Where he did not know the transaction himself, he knew the men who did, and they could be equally prompt and correct, before a commission, in verifying an honest claim and detecting a false one.

What the petition specially asked was that the committee to be charged with the question, should take evidence on the spot, to ascertain the general nature and the general amount of the claim, with a view to judge the necessity of a commission and of the amount of the appropriation necessary to be made. For this purpose the petition asked that the testimony of persons now in the city, might be taken on oath, and reported to Congress as a guide to its action. Evidence enough was now in the city to enlighten Congress on these points. Military and naval officers were now in the city, who knew the general character and the probable aggregate amount of these claims. Citizens of California, of character, and not interested in the claims, were also present. Their testimony could easily be obtained; and the petition prayed that they should be summoned and examined.

He then presented three reasons why the course in settling the claims should be adopted which the petition recommends: First, Justice to the claimants, who, unless they were paid at home, would become the prey of agents and speculators. Secondly, Justice to the United States, which, unless it settled face to face with the claimants, and closed up the business at once, would have to pay false claims for indefinite time. False claims would cost less to the speculator than true ones; even the true would be got at half price or less, but the false much lower; and, when dependant upon vouchers here, the false and the true would be about on an equal footing. Thirdly, Justice to Mr. Fremont himself. This justice was of a twofold character—one to his purse, the other to his reputation. He was already under protest for large sums, and expected more—$40,000 or $50,000 in the whole. He was also liable for what was got from the inhabitants for the troops under his command, both under the revolutionary movement for independence, and afterwards, when the war was carried on for the direct benefit of the United States, it having also got the benefit of the revolutionary movement. Justice to his reputation required the course he recommended. In no other way could false claims be prevented from rising up to be charged to his operations. In no other way could his reputation be shielded from false accounts, founded on false charges of his having "taken property forcibly" from the people. Either of these reasons ought to be sufficient to have the commission established, and the business closed up at once: the three put together—justice to the claimants, to the public treasury, and to the reputation of Mr. Fremont—he hoped would be sufficient, not merely to secure a reference of the petition to the proper committee, (the Military,) but also to authorize the establishment of the commission which was prayed for.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of George Poindexter, praying compensation for the occupation and use of his property by volunteers mustered into the service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. BRADBURY, it was Ordered, That the documents relating to the claim of John Clarke, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Ordered, That the petition of Noah Miller, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Ordered, That the petition of Isaac Davenport, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THE SLAVERY QUESTION.

Mr. BAGBY said: Mr. President: The day before yesterday, I had the honor to present three resolutions, declaratory of certain fundamental principles, with respect to the truth and correctness of which, I am clearly and without a shadow of doubt, thoroughly convinced. These resolutions without amendment, alteration or modification, contain and express the convictions of my most deliberate judgment, upon the great and delicate questions to which they relate. They disclaim, and deny the power of Congress, and of the treaty making power, to interfere with the question of slavery in any state or territory of this Union, or adopt any limitation, prohibition or restriction, in regard to slavery in any territory hereafter acquired. So far, so good. It has occurred to me upon reflection, however, that they do not protect all the points I intended to secure. I hold in my hand, an additional resolution, which, I think, is necessary in order to complete the series, and which is intended to negative the idea entertained in quarters entitled to great respect, that there is a power in the inhabitants of the territory, to exclude slavery. The resolution I hold in my hand, declares that there is no such power in the legislature, or the people of a territory—that they possess no political power, except such as is conferred upon them by the act of Congress, authorizing them to form a territorial government—and that inasmuch as Congress does not possess this power, they cannot delegate it to the territories, or the inhabitants thereof. I ask, sir, that this resolution be laid upon the table and printed, and when my original resolutions are taken up, I shall move it as an amendment.

Mr. BAGBY then submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That neither the people nor the [illegible] of any territory [illegible] United States have any power to exclude slavery from any territory [illegible] United States, but that all such power is vested exclusively in the people thereof.

PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS.

Mr. DOWNS submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to report a bill granting to the purchaser of the fifty-acre lots [illegible] a pre-emption right to the [illegible] act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public land, and to grant preemption rights," the right of preemption was suspended by the commencement of hostilities with Mexico, and if so in the opinion of the committee, then to report a bill to revive said right of pre-emption, to confirm all claims that have been allowed by the officers of the Land Office, under the law as originally passed, and to report by bill or otherwise.

NAVAL.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Benjamin L. Cuthouse, reported a bill for the relief of Purser Benjamin L. Cuthouse, which was read and passed to the second reading.

Also, a bill for the relief of the widows and orphans of the officers, seamen, and marines of the brig of war Somers; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Reynolds May, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

RULES AND ARTICLES OF WAR.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BENTON asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the sixty-fifth and the ninety-third, of the Rules and Articles of War in relation to the practice of Courts-Martial and Courts of Inquiry, in the army of the United States; which was read the first and second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SAMUEL LEECH.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to provide for the compensation of Samuel Leech, for services in the investigation of suspended sales in the Mineral Point District, Wisconsin.

Mr. BREESE called for the reading of a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, explaining the merits of the case, and it was read by the SECRETARY.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be [illegible]

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted on the 24th instant by Mr. CAMERON:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be authorized to employ a clerk, to whom he shall per diem compensation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON stated that the Committee were entirely unable to discharge their duties without the aid of a clerk. The new law in reference to the execution of the public printing had devolved an immense amount of labor upon the Committee, rendering the assistance which was asked altogether indispensable.

Mr. CLAYTON did not exactly understand why the Committee on Printing should have a clerk, when other committees, whose labours were arduous, were not allowed that assistance. He believed that the Committee on Claims was the only Committee which was allowed a clerk, but as all knew, the amount of business devolving on that Committee was very great, and much writing had to be done.

Mr. CAMERON said that he had not anticipated the opposition of the Senator from Delaware. He would read a portion of the resolutions on the public printing, from which his friend from Delaware would at once perceive that it was necessary that the Committee should have a clerk. It was their duty to audit the accounts of the contractors for the public printing, and it was necessary to keep a set of books. So onerous indeed were the duties which this Committee were called on to discharge, that the gentleman who had been appointed Chairman of the Committee at the commencement of the session, had declined serving, and his successor now talked of declining also. He felt assured that when the Senator from Delaware understood the real state of the case, he would not offer any opposition to the resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON replied that the argument adduced in favor of the appointment of a clerk for the Committee on Printing applied with equal force to all other committees of that body, especially to the committee whose duty it was to audit the accounts of the Senate. It was an innovation; and with all deference to the Senator from Pennsylvania, he could hardly suppose that there could be writing enough in that Committee to justify the appointment of a clerk. If the committee were allowed a clerk, the other committees would, in all probability, also be eventually supplied with clerks. It appeared to him that the necessity of the case was not such as to justify the appointment of this clerk, and therefore he must oppose the resolution.

Mr. CAMERON thought that the Senator from Delaware must have forgotten that this was a new committee, acting under the new arrangement for the public printing, the entire supervision of which devolved on them. Already there were great complaints about the manner in which the work had been executed. If the Senate thought proper to refuse the clerk, he said that he would be obliged to decline serving on the committee.

Mr. CLAYTON suggested that the resolution might be allowed to lie over informally till an opportunity had been afforded for further investigation of the subject. If now driven to a vote, he must vote against the resolution.

Mr. Cameron said that he preferred a division on the question now.

The question was then put, and on a division—twenty voting in the affirmative, noes not counted—the resolution was adopted.

JESSE E. DOW.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. DICKINSON on the 20th instant, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That Jesse E. Dow, be admitted to a seat in the Reporter's gallery, from which he was excluded by an order of the Senate of 16th March, 1846.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. ASHLEY, on the 19th instant; which was modified by the mover, so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into and report to the Senate, the manner in which the printing of the Senate has been executed; whether it has been done in conformity with the terms of the contracts, either as to the quality of the paper and size of the pages furnished, or the manner in which the printing has been done; also, whether any unauthorized orders, or alterations, printed and distributed to the Patents to Congress, are correctly printed from the originals sent to their offices.

Mr. DICKINSON asked whether the law on the subject of the public printing could be strengthened by the passage of any resolution? The law required that the Committee on Printing should perform the very duty which this resolution prescribed; and therefore it appeared to him that this resolution was altogether unnecessary.

Mr. ASHLEY remarked that he had received an anonymous communication, pointing out upwards of twenty mistakes in two pages of the document containing the President's message. Finding that the statement thus communicated to him was correct, he had felt it to be his duty to introduce the resolution. He did not, of course, wish to deal at all unjustly or unkindly with the contractors for the public printing, or indeed to make any expose, but only asked the Committee to inquire and report whether the work had been properly executed. He hoped that the resolution would be passed.

Mr. CAMERON observed that he was not present when the Senator from Arkansas rose, but he would merely remark that the Committee had directed their attention to the subject to which that resolution referred. The Committee had been informed yesterday by the contractor, that the paper which had been used thus far was not of the quality ordered by him, the parties with whom he had made the contract for paper having failed to fulfil their engagement. If the printer did not amend in the course of the work, the Committee would introduce a proposition adapted to the case, for the action of the Senate. They entertained great hopes, however, that there would be an improvement in the execution of the work. He would add, that there should be allowances made in this case. The organization of so large an establishment, in which, he believed, no less than one hundred and twenty persons were employed, was an undertaking of considerable difficulty, and it could hardly be expected that all the details could be so completed at once as to ensure perfection in the work to be executed. As for himself, he had not a very favorable opinion of the new mode of executing the public printing, and he had opposed the passage of the law authorizing it to be done in this way. He was of opinion that under the former system the work would have been done more economically and in superior style; still it was proper that just allowances should be made for the difficulties under which the contractors labored, and that the best should be made of the new system.

Mr. DICKINSON said that he had a very good opinion of the new mode of executing the public printing, and regarded the principle established by it as eminently just and proper. It had broken up the old corrupt system of monopoly, by which large fortunes had been accumulated in a year or two out of the public purse. He believed that it had thus far been eminently successful, though its working was not entirely perfect. The Senator from Arkansas had stated that he had received complaints with regard to the execution of the public printing, through an anonymous source. (Mr. D.) would not insinuate that business competition had something to do with that communication, but he would take the liberty of reminding the Senator of the excellent suggestion made by a member of the Irish Parliament, that every anonymous author should be obliged to subscribe his name to his work! As to typographical errors, the documents printed under this former system have not been exempt from them. If the new establishment, when once fully organized, prove inadequate or inattentive, let it be dealt with as severely as the law requires. But he hoped that at least a fair trial would be allowed the new system, and he did not doubt that under the supervision of the Committee charged with the subject, a fair trial would be given to it.

Mr. NILES remarked, that the Joint Committee appointed for the supervision of the public printing had no authority to pass the accounts of the contractor. It was the duty of the committee in each House to examine these accounts; and as a member of the Senate committee, he wished to say, that unless the printing were executed substantially in conformity with the contracts—which it had not been thus far, as he had been informed—the accounts of the contractors would not be passed by that committee. Formerly the printing had been well executed—executed in good style, with promptitude—but did not appear to be the case at present. The whole subject, however, would come under the supervision of the committee, whose duty it was to audit the accounts of the contractors.

Mr. ASHLEY said, he certainly had not supposed that his resolution would have given rise to debate. The Senator from New York had entirely misapprehended his remark with regard to the anonymous communication. He had not acted on this communication; and it had only directed his attention to the matter. On examination he had found that pages 800 and 803 of the document referred to, were so marred by errors of the press as to require translation into plain English in order to be understood. It was discreditable to file such documents. The excuse which the contractors had offered relative to the quality of the paper he had used did not afford any explanation of these typographical errors. He did not know any of the parties who had contracted to do the work, and would not have moved in the matter had not his attention been directed to it, by the communication to which he had referred, and the allegations in which he had ascertained to be correct. He found that not only in the quality of the paper, but also in the size of the page, there was a departure from the terms of the contract. There was a diminution in the size of the page to the extent of seven or eight per cent. He hoped that the resolution would be at once passed.

Mr. WESTCOTT said that he believed he had reason to congratulate himself on the vote which he gave when the proposition to have the public printing executed by contract was first made. He had protested against it then, and predicted that the very state of things now presented, would occur early in the first session of Congress. But he was willing to lend his aid to any judicious movement for separating the public printing from the public press, although opposed to the idea of huckstering it out to the lowest bidder, who would execute it in a bungling manner, and delay it so as to retard the public business. He was perfectly satisfied that they never would have the public printing properly executed until they had a publishing office under the control of Congress, separated from the public press, and altogether free from the inconveniences of the paltry huckstering system of giving it out by contract. He was aware that this system would incur the objection that it would increase the patronage of Congress, but he was prepared to show that it was the only mode in which the public printing could be at once economically and properly executed.—With regard to the present contractors he did not blame them. The documents annexed to the President's message are this year exceedingly voluminous; they were five times the size of those of former years. It was utterly impossible for the contractors to avoid delay in furnishing these documents. If they had had a public printing office they could have had the work done at the end of the first week of the session. But the contractors could not have furnished it promptly, without losing all their profits and thirty or forty thousand dollars besides. As it was, he believed they would lose by their contract. He thought Congress were as much to blame as the contractors. It was quite true that many errors of the press had occurred in the documents, but he would appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Printing—himself a practical printer—whether these imperfections in the work were not attributable to the circumstances under which it was executed. He did not see any necessity for the resolution. The contractors themselves were much annoyed by the difficulties in which they were placed, and Congress certainly ought to treat them in a spirit of liberality.

Mr. CAMERON remarked that the Senator from Arkansas had been appointed a member of the Committee on Printing, but had not yet attended any of its meetings. The Committee would have been very happy to have had the opportunity of availing themselves of his services. The resolution, he repeated, could not do any good; the Committee were already acting in the matter. He thought it was reasonable that the contractors should be allowed a few days to complete their arrangements. It was time; the work had thus far been imperfectly executed. But there were two sides to the question: as had been remarked, the documents were this year very voluminous. The President's message and accompanying documents amounted to seventeen hundred pages, whilst hitherto they had not exceeded eight hundred pages. Besides, there appeared to be a combination in the District against the contractors. Every body connected with printing in the city seemed to have, in some degree, combined against them. The contractors, therefore, had a right to some sympathy; still he was for keeping them to their contract, although he believed the price to be too low. Common kindness required that they should deal liberally with the contractors, and at least giving them the opportunity of making such arrangements as would enable them to execute the work hereafter more perfectly than it had been done.

Mr. ASHLEY explained that he had been appointed on the Committee without his knowledge, and after the introduction of his resolution. He still insisted on the passage of the resolution, which, he remarked, went farther than the law.

Mr. TURNEY said that he was at a loss to understand the remarks which had been urged in extenuation of the manner in which the public printing had been executed. It was admitted on all hands that the work had not been properly executed, but it was alledged that the contractors had been placed in circumstances of great difficulty and embarrassment. Well, certainly they had been placed in that situation by their own act, and he could not see with what propriety that could be presented as an excuse for their failure to comply with the terms of the contract. He hoped that the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. CASS suggested that as the hour for taking up the special order had already passed, this resolution should be passed over.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and it was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his secretary:

Mr. President: The President of the United States approved and signed, on the 30th inst. the following act:

An act concerning certain navy and revenue vessels, and for other purposes.

An act to provide for the settlement of the accounts of the United States.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. PHELPS said, it is not my purpose, sir, in addressing the Senate at this time to go into an enquiry as to the origin of this war, as to its merits or demerits—nor, sir, to enquire where the blame rests, provided there be blame in its commencement. The important question now before us is, first, how shall this war be prosecuted successfully while it lasts, and, above all, how can it be terminated? When these questions are disposed of and the country restored to a state of peace, we may then perhaps amuse ourselves with the enquiry who has been in fault? In looking at this question, Mr. President, as it now presents itself to us, as a practical question, the position in which the Senate has been pleased to place me, has very naturally drawn my attention to the financial aspect of the question, and I have esteemed it to be my duty after having devoted some little attention to the subject—though not indeed so much as I should desire to do—to lay before the Senate the result of my investigations. I am aware, sir, that there is no amusement to be found in this enquiry, it will be, perhaps, not very interesting, but, sir, it is an enquiry which is not to be avoided. It is a matter of business and a matter of necessity.

Now, sir, if this war is to be prosecuted further—and such seems to be the fact—as yet, a very important question arises—What effect will it have on the financial and commercial interests of the country? How are the means to be obtained for its prosecution? and how are these means to be obtained, consistently with the prosperity of the country at large? Sir, in determining this question, the inquiry will be, what has been its effect thus far? and when we have ascertained that we may perhaps be able to judge what will be its effect hereafter? Sir, from the best computation I have been able to make, the Treasury has fallen in arrears within the past two years, or nearly two years—while this war has already lasted—to the extent of not much, if anything, short of seventy millions of dollars. Yes, sir, from the best computation which I am able to make, the revenues of this country have fallen short, if its expenditures for the past two years be an amount, not much, if any, of seventy millions of dollars. Well, sir, I will submit to the Senate certain estimates, which will conclusively prove this result, and I shall endeavor to show to the Senate, if they will give me their attention, from data in my possession, that this result must inevitably be produced.

Sir, in the first place, at the commencement of the war, or rather on the 1st of July, '46, after the war had been for some six weeks in existence, there was then—exclusively of the expenditures during the short period the war had then lasted—I believe in the Treasury of upwards of nine millions of dollars. I find from the several reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the government has borrowed, in Treasury notes and stocks, issued during the fiscal year ending 30th June, '47, nearly twenty-six millions of dollars, and that during the current fiscal year they have borrowed, in addition to this, six millions, two hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars. The Secretary of the Treasury tells us that at the close of the current fiscal year there will be a deficiency in the Treasury of nearly sixteen millions. I take the original report of the Secretary; though I am aware there has been a recent correction of that report. These sums—the balance in the Treasury 1st July, '46—the amount borrowed during the two succeeding years, and the deficiency anticipated at the close of the current fiscal year, as estimated by the Secretary, will amount to fifty-six millions, eight hundred and twenty thousand dollars. But this is not all. At the very commencement of this session we were informed by the Secretary, that there was a deficiency of appropriation for the current year of a little more than ten millions of dollars.—This addition to the previous result, gives the amount of about sixty seven millions as the deficiency of revenue below the amount of our expenditures for the last two years. From this, sir, I have deded six millions six hundred and eighty-one thousand dollars, because it is suggested—upon what evidence I know not exactly—that upon revising the estimates submitted to us it was ascertained that there was an error of nearly seven millions, there being that amount in the Treasury which is not represented in the statement communicated to us. Deducting, then, this sum, which is reported to be a little short of seven millions—but calling it six millions eight hundred and eighty-one thousand, the result is that there is a deficiency of sixty millions for the two years, or at the rate of thirty millions a year. But, sir, I am very far from being satisfied with the calculations of the Secretary. To satisfy my own judgment I will add eight millions; being the amount to which, as I believe, the Secretary has over-estimated the public revenue. This gives us the amount of sixty-eight millions as being the deficiency which has already accrued, or at the rate of thirty-four millions a year. For the coming year ending June, 1849, the Secretary has estimated the deficiency at $20,500,000. I have obtained this result by deducting the estimated deficiency for the current year, from the Secretary's estimate of the deficiency on the 30th June 1849. Well, sir, without going further—without at present enquiring into the accuracy of his estimates for the coming year—by taking the deficiency as estimated by himself, we have for the three years ending June 30th 1849, the sum of eighty-eight millions as the deficiency of our means below our expenditures. This Mr. President is a concise statement of our financial experience, thus far, as will appear by the following statements. And if we add to this, the sum of $9,000,000, which I shall endeavour to show the Senate, is an over estimate of the revenue, for the coming year, and the sum of $7,000,000, for under estimate of expenditure for that year, the deficiency for three years ending June 30th 1849, will be $104,000,000, or about thirty-five millions a year.

Statement of the receipts of Expenditures and income for 1847 and 1848, and for three years from July 1st, 1846 to June 30th 1849.

Total deficiency for three years		$104,500,000

What then, sir, is to be our future financial condition? I will submit another estimate which is intended to shew the Senate to what extent the deficiency is to go, and what amount of money will be necessary to be raised upon the public credit within a period of eighteen months from this time. This is my object.

I commence with the deficiency as estimated by the Secretary, of thirty-six millions on the 30th June, 1849. In addition to that, an over estimate, as I believe it to be, of the revenues for the current year have been made. In the first place, I deduct from the Secretary's estimate the sum of seven millions, estimated by him to be received from Customs in the current year. I also deduct one million from the estimated receipts from the sales of public lands. I deduct from his estimate of receipts for customs, for the coming year ending June, 1849, eight millions more; and I deduct for this year also one million, as an over estimate of the receipts from public lands. These deductions may appear to Senators to be large.—They may create an impression that the object is to present our financial affairs in their worst aspect. But, sir, I am confident that an examination of the estimates of the Secretary, coupled with the experience of the past, and reasoning from the present condition of the country, will convince the Senate that this deputation is by no means too large.

Secretary's Estimate of Deficiency, June 30, 1849		$36,000,000
Add for over estimate of receipts for Customs for the year ending June 30, 1849	$8,000,000
Deduct for over estimate of receipts for Public Lands,	1,000,000
Total over estimate of receipts,	$9,000,000
For the year ending June 30, 1849.
Amount of deficiencies for which the Secretary asks appropriations, but which are not included in the estimate of expenditure by his estimate over existing appropriations, say 3,000,000,	$7,000,000
Under estimate of expenditure for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1849,	7,000,000

		18,000,000
		$54,000,000
Amount,		54,000,000
Deduct error in official report,		7,000,000
Total to be raised by loan over and above the revenues of the country,		$82,000,000

In this estimate no notice is taken of the outstanding Treasury notes which may and probably will absorb the revenue to a great extent and make a further resort to credit necessary.

The first item of correction of the Secretary's report is the estimate of the receipts from customs for the current year. The honorable secretary estimates these receipts at thirty-one million of dollars. Sir, one year ago (in December, 1846,) he estimated the receipts from customs for the then current year at twenty-eight millions, and in point of fact, they fell short of twenty-four, an over estimate of over four millions, as tested by the actual receipts into the treasury. I take the liberty to say, that these estimates are always too large. And permit me to remark, that the estimates of our expenditures are always too small. Our receipts from customs for the past year have fallen short of twenty-four millions. And on what data, or on what ground of anticipation does the Secretary increase the sum this year to the amount of thirty-one millions—an excess in the revenue from this source estimated for the present year over and above the actual receipts of last year, to the extent of seven millions of dollars? Sir, let us institute a comparison between the condition of things during the past year and the present. The revenues for the past year were increased in the first place by the combined effect of the new tariff—which was to go into operation by its terms on the first of December, 1846; and the warehouse bill which went into effect on the day of its passage, viz: August 4, 1846. Both these bills had been long pending, one having been introduced into the Senate on the 21st January, and the other into the House on the 14th April, 1846; so that the passage of both was for a long time anticipated.

Sir, the passage of the Tariff bill gave notice to the commercial world that on the first of December following its passage, the duties were to be reduced. Your Warehouse bill tendered to them the privilege of storing their importations and retaining the duties upon them until they could be withdrawn upon payment of the reduced rate of duties under the new act. Under these circumstances, a very great portion of the importations of the latter part of 1846 were thrown over for the payment of the duties to the month of December. The result of it was, that there was a very great falling off in the amount of duties received in that portion of the year '46. Sir, I have an estimate which will show you the effect of these two measures upon our revenue for the year ending June, '47. The receipts for the months July, August, September, 1845, amounted to eight millions eight hundred and sixty-two thousand dollars. The receipts for the same months in the year '46 fell to six millions one hundred and fifty-four thousand, making a difference of two millions seven hundred and eight thousand dollars in the three months constituting the first quarter of the year ending 30th June, '47. This is shown more fully in the following table:

Receipts for July, August and September '45,	$8,811,962 on $2,953,977 per month.
Same months in '46,	6,108,856 on 2,036,285 "
Difference	$2,703,106	$902,702 per month.
Receipts for the months of the year '46	$8,173,856 equal to $2,724,618 per month.
Receipts for October and November '46,	1,935,000 equivalent to 644,340 per month.
Difference,	$1,303,856 per month.

Why was this? Was there anything in the commerce of the country to produce this decline in the revenue? Was not the country advancing in prosperity during those years? It was unquestionably the effect of the measures to which I have alluded. The revenue fell off because the importations were placed in warehouses to be entered upon payment of reduced duties. Well, what next? In the months of October and November your receipts fell to one million six hundred and eighty-four thousand dollars, or an average of eight hundred and eighty-four thousand dollars per month. During the months of July, August and September the duties, enlarged that ruinous importation. Instead of [illegible] The effect of these measures, then, was precisely what I have predicted on this floor. It was not apparent [illegible] of the community until the period of the 1st December, 1846, arrived, and then your revenue increased, and that increase of revenue has been thought of sufficient importance not only to be presented to us very formally by the Secretary of the Treasury, but to be [illegible]

If it be a matter of boasting to exhibit to the country at large the value of this improvement in our financial system, the new tariff, why let it pass. But if it is intended to lead us to the inference, that this increase of revenue is to continue, I beg to dissent altogether from any such conclusion.

[illegible] December 1st, 1846, and the year ending December 1st, 1847. For what purpose is the fiscal year abandoned, and the computation of time made from the first of December in one year to that period in the next year? Doubtless for the purpose of exhibiting the operation of the new tariff which went into operation on the 1st December, 1846. But as I have already remarked the revenue belonging to the latter portion of the year [illegible] upon the preceding months when the new Tariff bill went into operation, and this presented an accumulation of revenue during those months. Other circumstances combined to swell the revenue for the close of that year; the peculiar state of things in Europe, the extraordinary demand for our productions, and the increased importation consequent on the exportation of those productions, tended to throw upon the latter part of the year a large increase. In short, the year between December 1, 1846, and December 1, 1847, with the aid of the warehousing system, borrowed the revenues of the preceding year, and in consequence of the excessive importation growing out of our increased exportations, anticipating the future wants of the country, it anticipated the revenue of the succeeding year. Are we to suppose that because there was an increase of duties during that year, that that increase is to continue?—A moment's attention to the subject forbids any such conclusion. What causes are to operate? In the first place, when this great importation took place, the country was prosperous; money was flowing in from abroad; notwithstanding this great importation there was a balance of money coming into the country, to the extent of some twenty or thirty millions of dollars. What is the condition of the country now? Instead of having a surplus of capital you find a stringency in the money market. Instead of a surplus of capital, the surplus of a period of prosperity has sought investment in various ways. A vast amount has been invested and is in process of investment in rail-roads—fifty millions, it is computed, in New England alone—in manufacturing enterprizes and in our public debt—all this amount is absorbed by goods on hand—a rigid curtailment of the currency and a stringency in the money market almost unprecedented has ensued. Sir, are we seriously to calculate in this state of things upon the continuance of the same commercial activity, the same state of revenue?

But this is not all. The unusual importations, stimulated by the increased demand for our productions have thrown into the country a greater quantity of goods than were wanted. There is a surplus of goods. The importations increased some thirty or forty millions of dollars. Well, if there is a surplus to this amount there is no inducement to import; and, as I have already remarked, we are not able to purchase. Nor is this all. If the course of trade threw into the country a greater importation than the present demand warranted, your warehouse system furnished a resource by which the importer was saved from the necessity of advancing the amount of the duties upon his importation until there was a market for the goods. The importations hereafter, will go into the warehouses, and you will get no duties until the goods are wanted for consumption.

Sir, there seems to be a strange idea entertained in regard to this matter, and although strange it seems to be a favorite idea—it is, that our exportations are to be governed by our importations, and that we may increase our exportations by increasing our importations. This, sir, I believe is contrary to all experience. It is a theory which is calculated to bankrupt the public treasury, or to ruin the fortunes of any private individual who adopts and acts upon it. Sir, my theory is the reverse of this. Your exportations should govern your importations. You should buy only what you can pay for. I suppose that our importations must depend, to a very great extent, upon the amount of our exportations.

What has enabled us to increase our importations? The demand for our breadstuffs, which has now nearly ceased—the famine and distress abroad, which has now passed by; and, whatever may be the ability of other nations to purchase our productions, they will not buy what they do not need. There must be a falling off of our exportations; and, as a necessary consequence, a falling off of importations, and of revenue, also. Sir, the average rate of duty, under the present Tariff, is such as to require, at least, one hundred and fifty millions of importations, to raise thirty millions of revenue. I believe my honorable friend from Rhode Island estimated it at one hundred and seventy millions. He includes in his estimate the gross amount of importations, including free goods; my estimate is of dutiable goods only. If I recollect aright, the average rate of the existing tariff is [illegible] per cent. Now, such an importation exceeds the ability of the country. Such is our present situation; and what are we to expect for the period included between the [illegible] of July, 1847? Your necessities for money, your exhorbitant demand for loans, combined with the operation of the sub-treasury and its specie clause, pressing with combined action upon the money market, must perpetuate this state of things.

Sir, I have been comparing the estimated receipts for the current year with those of the last. I have remarked, that in these calculations the data are derived from the results of the past, from the estimates of previous years; and I have remarked further, that during the year 1847, a great part of the receipts consist of returns which properly belong to a former period. Now, I ask, on what ordinary calculations, in view of these circumstances, the honorable Secretary raises his estimates of the receipts from twenty-four, the actual receipts last year to thirty-one millions of dollars? What considerations furnish a basis for such a calculation.

I have taken some pains to ascertain how the honorable Secretary arrives at it. It is this: He takes, in the first place, the receipts for the first quarter, for July, August, and September. These are precisely the months in which we were getting returns for our breadstuffs. He then proceeds to tell us that assuming the revenue of the first quarter to be an average of the year—the proceeds from customs, for the whole year will amount to forty-five millions. It is enough to say of this calculation, that the honorable Secretary himself discards it at the basis of an estimate. Being dissatisfied with this result, he proceeds to ascertain the relative proportion of the revenue of the first quarter of the year as compared with the revenue of the year, for a series of years. He thus ascertains that the first quarter is the most productive, and by reducing his estimates in proportion, he brings his calculations down to forty millions, instead of forty-five. But he is still dissatisfied. The next step is to ascertain the revenue for the five months next previous to the first of December, 1847, which he tells us amounts to $15,506,257—or a little over $3,000,000, per month. Estimating the revenue for the twelve months at that rate (making, probably, an allowance for the greater productiveness of the first quarter,) he would make the revenue of the year amount to $35,000,000. But he is not satisfied with this. What next? He ascertains the receipts for the last two months of the five—viz. October and November—to be $2,200,000, per. month; and estimates the receipts for the residue of the fiscal year at that rate. To this he adds the actual receipts of the first quarter, and it gives about $31,000,000, for the year, as will be seen by the following table.

[illegible] December 1, 1847 -	$15,506,257
Receipts for first quarter as per annual report deducted -	11,106,257
[illegible] -	4,400,000
[illegible] -	19,400,000
[illegible] -	11,106,257
Gives for the year - - - - -	30,906,257
Or in round numbers - - - - -	31,000,000

Here you have the basis of the estimates of the honorable Secretary.

Now, the Secretary finds his receipts rapidly declining, because the importations are declining. It appears, as heretofore stated, that the receipts for the first quarter of the current year amount to $11,106,257, or equal to $3,702,085 per month. The receipts for October and November are equal to $2,200,000 per month. Thus we have a falling off during the first five months of the fiscal year from $3,702,085, for July, August and September to $2,200,000, the average of October, or a falling off of $1,500,000 per month.

Is it not apparent to every Senator who hears me, that this decline must continue? Is it not apparent that there is an overstock of goods in the country, and is it not well known that the scarcity of money has induced importers to countermand their orders for goods? Sir, we have it from the very best authority.

Under these circumstances, although there may be a great influx of revenue during the first quarter of the year, it is apparent that it is the mere effect of the accumulation of revenue in that quarter for the reasons I have mentioned: The very fact that your imports, and, consequently, your revenue, are increased in one portion of the year must lead you to expect that it will decline in the other portions.

Now I ask, on what principle it is expected that the amount of the revenue from imports this year will exceed that of the last?—Sir, the true rule of comparison would be to take the fiscal year, and that for the very reason that I have already assigned. The Tariff of 1846 covers the fiscal year ending 1st of June, 1847, although it went into effect in December, because the payment of duties was in a great measure suspended during the intervening time between the passage of the act and the time of its going into operation. Well, sir, I will not pursue this branch of the subject.

What is the next ground of the honorable Secretary's estimates? He estimates three and a half millions as the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. Well, sir, during the past year your sales did not reach two millions and a half. Upon what theory, then, it is, that the Secretary estimates one million more from the receipts for public lands than was actually received last year, I have yet to learn. It is a point which I am not prepared to discuss, because I can see no reason at all for such an estimate; and unless reasons are presented from some other quarter, I shall still be incredulous. I deduct, therefore, one million from the estimated receipts from the public lands, because the estimate exceeds all experience, and because no reason has been assigned, and none, in my judgment, can be assigned for it. That makes eight millions to be deducted from the Secretary's estimate of revenue for the current year 1847-8, and to be added to the estimate of deficiency.

The next item is an over-estimate of the revenue from customs for the year ending June, 1849. I have very little to say in regard to this, I merely refer to the fact that the revenue having fallen off, I cannot perceive upon what calculation it is that in the peculiar condition of the country the revenue from the customs is to rise to thirty-two millions for the ensuing year. The present state of the country renders it impossible, and as to any change I have not seen the slightest prospect of it. Well, sir, I take the Secretary's estimates, and I must deduct eight millions from his estimated receipts from customs for the year ending June, 1849. I then take the estimate of the receipts from public lands for the coming year, which he has given to us as three millions, and I ask upon what basis does this estimate rest? Do we not all know that we have granted land bounties to our soldiers to the extent of at least seventy thousand, which will cover twelve millions of acres of your public lands? Your average sales are but two and a half millions annually, and you have actually thrown into the market in bounties to your soldiers, enough to cover at this average an amount of sales for five years. Now, under these circumstances, when land warrants are thrown abroad over the country, sufficient to cover five years' sales, we are presented with a grave calculation of an increase of a million of dollars from this source. Time may possibly bring this about. The Secretary of the Treasury may be able to see further than the rest of us, but whether it may be brought about or not, in my humble judgment, such an estimate is not to be considered by us on this occasion as a satisfactory basis for our action.

I must add, then, to the Secretary's estimate of the deficiency, the sum of seventeen millions of dollars—being an over estimate by him—for these deductions from the estimates of receipts into the Public Treasury; a large sum, I admit, but if gentlemen will give a little attention to the subject, I think they will come to the conclusion at which I have arrived.

Sir, there is another branch of the subject which I desire to notice, and it is this: the expenditures of the current year, are estimated at fifty-six millions of dollars, exclusive of payments on account of the public debt, but as I have already remarked, the Secretary informed us at the commencement of the session, that an additional appropriation of ten millions was necessary to cover the expenses for the year. A question then arises, whether these ten millions are included in the fifty-six millions. It has cost me much trouble to ascertain it, but it is not. Of course this additional expenditure must be added to the Secretary's estimate of the deficiency. But, sir, let us look a little further into this.

The whole estimated expenditure for the current year as given in the annual report of the Secretary at the last session of Congress (December, 1846,) was forty-five millions of dollars. The actual expenditure for the same year, as now ascertained by him, (see his annual report to this Congress,) is fifty-eight millions and a fraction. Here we have a difference in the two estimates for the present year—one made at the commencement and the other at this time—of thirteen millions of dollars.

Sir, the appropriations made at the last session of Congress for the service of the current year (ending June 30, 1848,) exceeded, by the sum of nearly nine millions, the Secretary's estimates as submitted to Congress at that session. And yet the Secretary now asks an appropriation of over ten millions to cover deficiencies. It is proper for me to add that as near as I am able to ascertain the fact, the expenditure for the current year, as estimated by the Secretary in his recent report, exceeds the amount of appropriations by about three millions of dollars. In order, then, to ascertain the actual expenditure of the year, seven millions only should be added to this estimate. This will carry that expenditure up to more than sixty-five millions.

This sum of seven millions, it will be perceived, is added to his estimate upon his own authority; that is to say, his estimate of arrearages of the present session, and his demand for further appropriations.

The next particular in my table of corrections of the Secretary's estimate, is the item of seven millions for under estimate of the expenditure for the coming fiscal year, from July 1, 1848, to June 30, 1849.

These expenditures are estimated by the Secretary at the sum of $59,644,941. In what light are we to regard these estimates? Sir, all experience shows that these estimates are too low. Year after year Congress is called upon to supply deficiencies. This is not to be wondered at. It implies no censure of the officers charged with the duty of furnishing them. It is natural that every head of the Treasury department should endeavor to put the best aspect upon the financial affairs of the country, and heads of bureaus and other subordinates will reduce their estimates of expenditure as low as possible. Judging then from all past experience, we must regard these estimates as falling short of the actual expenditure. But there are special reasons for anticipating an excess of expenditure for the coming year over and above the present estimates. Let me advert to the report of the quartermaster-general. It will be borne in mind that this officer asks an additional appropriation of five millions to cover a deficiency in the appropriations for the current year. What does he say of his estimates for the next? In his letter to the Secretary of War, of November 15, 1847, he says:

> [illegible] which I submitted on the 4th inst. for the service of the next fiscal year, were made out from data derived from the experience of the last year. At your suggestion I have carefully re-examined every item and in all depending for its degree upon my own action or that of the officer of the department, I have made several considerable deductions. Whether these deductions be judicious time must determine. I would not have ventured to make them but for the fact that the estimates of the [illegible]

Sir, this is significant language. In plain English, it means this: the estimates are too small. They are not to be relied on; and would not be submitted, were it not that two sessions of Congress will intervene, and opportunity will be afforded to ask for further appropriation, before the expenditure is incurred. With the experience of the present year, (a deficiency in the estimates of this department of five millions,) an and estimate thus qualified, explained, not to say apologized for, what are we to expect as the result of these estimates for the coming year? Beyond all question that the expenditure will largely exceed the estimate, as it has done heretofore.

To what extent the estimates of the Quartermaster General were reduced at the suggestion of the Secretary, I am not able precisely to state. It is stated, however, by a Senator near me, (Mr. Clarke, of Rhode Island,) upon information said to be derived from that officer, and communicated by him to the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, that seven millions more will be required in that department alone, over and above the amount of the estimates submitted to us, for the ensuing fiscal year. If this be true, the addition which I made to the Secretary's extract of expenditure for that year, (7,000,000,) and which seems to excite the surprise of gentlemen on the other side, will be required for the service of that department alone.

It will be perceived, however, that I add that sum for the whole excess in every branch of expenditure, over and above the Secretary's estimates. The considerations upon which my estimate of this deficiency is based are these:

First, The expenditures of the current year, as now ascertained, will exceed the previous estimate of the Secretary, by the sum of thirteen millions, exclusive of the $10,061,844, now asked for, of which at least seven millions are to cover an expenditure, (as I have already shown,) over and above the amount of the Secretary's present estimate. In this calculation, the expenditure of the current fiscal year, will exceed the original estimate by twenty millions of dollars.

The estimates for the coming year are increased, exclusive of payments on account of the public debt, only about eight millions above the estimates furnished us at the last session, for the current year. Which will leave a deficiency for the coming year, if the expenditure of that year should equal that of the present, of twelve millions of dollars. I have reduced it to seven. It requires no spirit of prophecy to foresee, that at the next session of Congress, we shall be called upon for further appropriations to the extend of at least ten millions of dollars.

But will your expenditure be less for the coming, than for the current year? You propose a more extensive plan of operations—to add thirty thousand men to your military establishment—to occupy the whole Mexican territory—to spread your armies like the locusts of Egypt, over that whole Republic—and like the locusts of Egypt, to bring them to submission by eating up their substance—not merely to discomfit her armies in the field, but to dis place her whole government and civil arrangements; and, in the language of the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to occupy and retain all her positions, military and political. Will your expenditures be diminished? Upon what principle then is it, that we are furnished with an estimate for the coming year, which falls from ten to twelve millions short of the ascertained expenditure of the present?

I add the seven millions, therefore, to cover the under-rating of expenses, actually calculated for in the first place.

In the second place, I include in that sum a variety of contingencies not estimated for, and not susceptible of previous estimation. Such as the loss and destruction of military stores, provisions, and other property, by the ordinary modes of destruction, as well as the casualties of war. The Commissary of Subsistence tells us, in giving the causes of the deficiency in his department for the current year, that "owing to the nature of the climate of Mexico, and the imperfect store houses, (the articles of subsistence being perishable,) much has been lost from decay and wastage, as also from wrecks during transportion."

Thirdly, No estimate is made for the commutation of land bounties by the reception of money instead of land, at the option of the soldier, authorized by the act giving bounties to your soldiers. This item is not susceptible of accurate estimation.

Fourthly, There is no estimate for pensions to your wounded and disabled soldiers—an item of no inconsiderable magnitude. How many pensioners are to be billetted on the treasury as one of the fruits of this war, no man can tell.

And, lastly, I take into consideration the miscellaneous claims of citizens for services rendered, property taken or lost—contracts unfulfilled, &c. &c., which cannot be estimated or enumerated. Those who are familiar with the expenses growing out of the Seminole war, can form some conception of what may be expected from this source.

Now, sir, am I right or wrong in adding this sum of seven millions to the estimates of expenditures for the coming year, in view of these considerations?

But this is not all. This bill proposes to raise ten additional regiments. The expense of this force is not included in the Secretary's estimates. What will they cost? Sir, I am not enough of a military man to determine with precision. I find that the pay and subsistence of a regiment amounts to about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum. The additional expense of clothing will probably carry the expense up to three hundred thou-equal dollars. The bounties for 1,000 men amount to $12,000, and the expense of recruiting to about the same. The cost of raising a regiment and transporting it to the scene of action will not, in my opinion, fall short of one hundred thousand dollars. This gives you an expenditure of four hundred thousand dollars for a regiment for the year, or four millions in the aggregate for the troops to be raised by this bill. This estimate is, in my judgment, a low one; and as it is not included in the Secretary's estimate, I add it to his estimated deficiency.

I have one other item. The Secretary includes in his estimate of receipts for the current year [illegible] as available loans and treasury notes. Of this sum he reports $4,202,020, as available on the 1st January, 1847. [illegible] I suppose that on this last sum we are to be disappointed. I therefore carry it to the amount of the sums to be raised on the credit of the government.

The result of these corrections of the Secretary's estimate is, then, an [illegible] an under-estimate of expenditure of $18,000,000, or $35,000,000 in all; to which are to be added the sum of $4,000,000, (included in his estimate of receipts,) yet to be borrowed; and the deficiency of $36,000,000, as estimated by him, which will make the whole deficiency of revenue for the 30th June, 1849, or the excess of expenditure beyond our income amount to the sum of $75,000,000.

But it has been stated to us that there was an error in the Secretary's report of the condition of the treasury of nearly seven million of dollars; that sum being in the treasury, but not included in his estimate of means—and, consequently, that his estimate of deficiency should have been less by that sum. I therefore deduct the amount from the above result, which leaves the deficiency, on the 30th June, 1849, at the sum of $68,000,000. And in this there is no estimate for the provisional force of 20,000 volunteers contemplated to be raised.

This may appear a very large estimate, but it is justified by past experience. I stated to the Senate, in the course of my remarks, that the excess of expenditure hitherto has been from thirty to thirty-five millions a year—moving at the same conclusion as the Senator from Rhode Island, though by a different process. If such has been the deficiency heretofore, what is it to be hereafter? You propose a more extensive plan of operations—an increase of your standing army by ten thousand men, and a provisional force of twenty thousand men.

Sir, you have thus far carried on this war under the most favorable circumstances. I was about to say with the especial blessing of Providence. How it has been for the peculiar state of things in Europe—calling to an unprecedented extent for our productions, and pouring into this country an abundance of the precious metals, and thus furnishing an antidote to the exhaustion of your treasury and of the currency by your foreign expenditure under the operation of the sub-treasury, this war would have ceased long ago for want of the means to prosecute it. We have, by this drain of the precious metals, brought England to the verge of bankruptcy—the Bank of England to the brink of suspension, and thus rendered them tributary to this unfortunate war. But the state of things is changed. The specie is rapidly returning—the commercial tide is ebbing—commercial enterprise stagnating, and the currency is in a condition of rapid curtailment. You have before you the prospect of commercial and financial embarrassment.

This enormous sum of nearly seventy million of dollars must be raised within less than eighteen months from this time, because it is to be expended during that period. It is to be raised also upon the naked credit of the government, for let it be remembered that this sum is not the aggregate expenditure, but is the excess of expenditure beyond our revenue. This brings me, sir, to the important question—how shall it be obtained?

Two modes are suggested—

1st. A direct and permanent loan.

2d. An indirect and temporary loan in the form of an emission of treasury notes.

Sir, I will undertake to demonstrate to the Senate that neither of these modes will avail; that if this war continue the treasury cannot be permanently relieved by either, nor by both. Every consideration connected with the subject convinces me in my judgment to justify this assertion.

Where is this seventy millions to be had? Sir, I have it from the highest authority—authority which I apprehend will not be questioned by any member of this body, that the whole amount of specie in the banks of New York does not exceed five millions of dollars. The amount in Boston probably does not amount to four. I can not say how much may be in the banks of Philadelphia and Baltimore, probably [illegible] New York and Boston. The Senator from Maryland, (Mr. PEARCE,) says two millions in Baltimore. How much there may be in the southern cities, I am not able to say; but their resources are generally less than those of the northern cities, as their banks are generally the first to suspend and the last to resume. It is not probable in my opinion that all the banks in your commercial cities can command more than twenty-twenty-five millions. Where [illegible] the [illegible] amount which you require, to come from? There is now a bill in the other house authorizing a loan of eighteen and a half millions; and there has been much speculation in the country as to the probability that such an amount would be taken. But, sir, when you come to add fifty millions more to cover the deficiency of the coming year, I deny altogether the capacity of the country to furnish it. It is a physical impossibility. The amount is not in the country. You have dissolved your connection with the paper currency of the country, [illegible] upon gold and silver, which cannot be had, and which, in the present state of your commercial relations, is going out of the country instead of coming in. Relief to the treasury in this way, under the circumstances, I pronounce impracticable. No financial skill can accomplish it.

Sir, there are other insurmountable difficulties in the way of such enormous loans, even if you had not hampered yourselves with your sub-treasury, and its specie clause. The surplus capital growing out of your recent commercial prosperity, has already sought investment—some thirty or forty millions in your public debt—an immense amount in railroads and manufacturing enterprises, which have been stimulated by the unusual activity of commerce. Fifty millions, it is said, have been invested, and are in process of investment, in railroads in New England alone. The amount now being invested in manufacturing enterprises, is immense. Nor is this all. The investments are incomplete, and the amount already invested, must draw after it further investments, to a very great extent, or the enterprises must be abandoned. This circumstance will increase the demand for money, and will increase also, the competition with you in the market. Large amounts are absorbed in goods on hand, which cannot be realized until the goods are wanted for consumption, nor until the country acquires the ability to purchase. The greatest obstacle, perhaps, of all is to be found in the condition of the money market, and the state of the currency. Money is now worth upon the best security, one and a half per cent. per month. The currency is in a course of rapid and stringent contraction. The withdrawal for exportation of the specie basis, upon which that currency rests, renders this inevitable. This diminution of the currency, has an immediate effect, (whatever may be the ultimate effect) equivalent to the annihilation of so much capital. Property of all kinds depreciates, individual embarrassment and insolvency follow, and this in turn re-acts upon the currency, by endangering the assets of the banking institutions, and forcing them to further contractions. Such is the present condition of the currency and the money market. How long will it continue? So long as the cause which produced it continues to operate. That cause is this Mexican war.

I have spoken of the exportation of specie to England. To what is that owing? Not surely to any commercial debt we had contracted there. The balance of trade had been in our favor. The immense exportations of our productions to that country has drawn from them an immense amount of the precious metals exported from them under the penalty of starvation. The sudden reflux of specie to that country has resulted, not from our commercial relations with it, but from the expenditures of this Mexican war. To avoid the exportation of specie to Mexico we have sent treasury drafts and treasury notes. These have been cashed there by English capitalists; the money has been disbursed in Mexico by our officers; but the drafts have been presented for payment at the Treasury, and the avails exported to England. It has been found a convenient mode of remittance of the gold and silver of Mexico to England. You must either continue this process or send the gold and silver to Mexico (if you can command it) and whether you adopt one course or the other, is, so far as the currency is concerned, unimportant. No further exportation of specie can take place without crippling the currency.

But, sir, could you effect these loans under these circumstances, you would prostrate the whole commercial community; and with it you would sacrifice every other industrial interest and annihilate your revenue. If done at all, it must be done by hawking about your notes at a great depreciation. If capital is thus to be forced into new channels, the effect may be easily foreseen. The withdrawal of deposites from the banks—thus forcing them to further curtailments—the forced sale of stocks tending to farther depreciation of every species of property—would result in mischief indescribable—in general ruin. Fortunately for the country, it could not and would not sustain such a pressure, but your financial operations would fail. So much as I wish to see the credit of this government in the hands of usurers. This might be done if the rights and honor of the nation were at stake, but never, with my concurrence, for the purpose of carrying on a war commenced, in my humble judgment, without necessity, and prosecuted without a rational object.

With the sub-treasury in operation, you can never expect to supply the deficiency in your revenue. Will you modify that system by repealing the specie clause? Will that avail you? The effect will be merely to enable you to receive paper instead of coin.—That paper must be bank paper; there is no other. Your loans, whether obtained from banks or individuals, will be received in that currency. What, then, will be the result? You will require of the banks, first, a currency to meet the exigencies of the commercial world, and, secondly, a medium for your immense expenditure. If they attempt this, they must enlarge their circulation to an enormous extent, and if they do this, they will inevitably be driven to suspension. We shall find ourselves thrown back at once upon the financial policy of 1814—the government leaning upon suspended banks, and the banks countenanced and sustained in the suspension by the government.

This would be an amusing comment upon the boasted divorce of the banks and the government, the blessed influence of the constitutional treasury, and the glorious practical results of the specie humbug.

But notes of suspended banks would not answer your purpose. They could be used at home only, at a discount disguised under the device of high prices, increasing still farther your expenditures and your embarrassments, and would be useless in your foreign expenditure.

If these loans cannot be effected at home can it be done abroad?

No sir. The state of the monetary affairs in Europe is still embarrassed. They are just recovering, especially in England, from extreme pressure. Confidence is not yet fully restored. They have no money to spare—and if they had, they would not be much inclined to aid you. American public credit does not stand very high there; and above all, they have no sympathy with you in this war. They have seen enough of interminable war—they are disposed to peace. And they will not fail to regard this war as prosecuted for an unlawful purpose, and as originating in reckless ambition and love of conquest.

Mr. President: The next topic which I propose to discuss is the project of supplying the deficiency in your revenues by means of treasury notes; and this is to be considered first, as a mere revenue measure; and secondly, as a means of relief to the currency and business of the country.

Sir, as a revenue measure Treasury notes may serve as a temporary relief by enabling you for a short period to anticipate the revenue; but they can never supply a deficiency. If resorted to for that purpose they must necessarily fail. And the reason is, that they will absorb the revenue they are intended to eke out. To give them the effect intended they must be made payable at a future day and upon such rate of interest as will make them an object of investment, and this will put them off the footing of a mere security for a permanent loan. If placed upon this ground they will be effectual only when a loan upon stock, at the same rate, could be obtained.

The idea that treasury notes, as a government currency receivable for public dues, and convertible into money on demand, can be made to supply a deficiency of revenue, is to my mind an absurdity. Suppose your expenditure is $50,000,000, and your revenue $30,000,000—you issue treasury notes to $20,000,000 to cover the deficiency. You must make them receivable for public dues or they will be presented at the Treasury for payment. If receivable they will be paid—in lieu of revenue: and in either case they will absorb as much revenue as they represent. That is to say, they will absorb 20 of the $30,000,000 and leave the deficiency the same as in the outset. To avoid this result, they must be reissued or issued to an amount transcending the revenue; and if so, how shall they be redeemed? If not convertible into money at the pleasure of the holder will they answer your purpose at home or abroad? But there are other difficulties. If disbursed abroad they will fall into the hands of foreigners as they have hitherto done, and the specie will be demanded for exportation, as has been the case heretofore. If disbursed at home they will fall into the hands of the banks, who, in the present crisis, will be anxious to fortify themselves; and who will present them at the Treasury and transfer the specie to their vaults, if, indeed, the specie is to be had. But where is the specie to be had? Not at the custom house, for the treasury notes will be paid in there in lieu of specie. They are at this moment at a discount, and constitute, as is well known, almost the whole of your receipts there. Not at the treasury or the sub-treasury, because, it is not at the custom house.

These treasury notes must necessarily depreciate. They are depreciated now. They are issued confessedly to cover a deficiency of revenue, and have no basis to rest upon, as no means are provided for their redemption.

Sir, this evil of depreciation in the government securities is one which aggravates itself. It leads necessarily and inevitably to increased expenditure. The greater the depreciation the greater must be the issue; and the more there is issued the greater is the depreciation. Thus the process goes on; depreciation leading to extravagant issues, and extravagant issues to further depreciation until the treasury paper sinks below any standard of depreciation and becomes valueless, because it has no standard of value. Such has been, and such will be the fate of all issues upon the naked credit of the government unaccompanied by such efficient provision for their prompt redemption as renders them readily convertible, and thus sustains their credit.

It has been suggested that this species of paper may be issued as a mode of relief to the currency and the business operations of the country. This is the counter project to that of modifying the sub treasury. It raises the question whether the treasury shall take upon its shoulders the banks or the banks the treasury, when neither can stand alone. This scheme will furnish the country with a depreciated currency, and entail upon the country all the evils of a depreciated and still depreciating currency, in which evil, the government in all its financial interests must participate. The experiment cannot succeed. We cannot find an instance in the history of nations, where such a financial experiment has succeeded. The fate of the continental money of the revolution—of the French assignats—of the experiments in our own country of State banks to issue paper upon State credit, all show that a currency resting upon the naked credit of the government must necessarily fail.

National credit is like individual credit—of no value except as it is based upon adequate means of meeting its engagements. Paper issued professedly, to cover a deficiency of revenue, without provision for its redemption, will be like the paper of an insolvent individual, worthless.

I have said that treasury notes may enable you to anticipate revenue. But no man supposes, that while this war continues, you will have any surplus of revenue over your current expenditures. Nay, the reverse will be the case. There must be an annual accumulation of deficiency and of debt. If you would anticipate, you must look forward to a period beyond the duration of this war—to the revenues of peace—for an indefinite period. If, therefore, you would anticipate the means of redeeming them you must make your notes payable upon time, with a rate of interest corresponding with the value of your stock. This would place them on a par with that stock, and if the latter would not be taken the former would not avail. But if you make them a mode of investment they cease to be a currency.

There is but one mode in which treasury notes can be kept in credit as a currency, and that is as I have already suggested, by providing adequate means of redemption when the issue is authorized. But what means can you provide? Your current expenditure will absorb all your ordinary revenues, and all which can be derived from existing sources. You have but one resource left—a direct tax. I repeat you have no other mode of providing for an issue of treasury notes to cover the deficiency in the revenues—and this must be resorted to. And if the people of this country will submit to direct taxation, for the purposes of this Mexican war, they will give you strong evidence of their approbation of your policy.

I believe I have shown that neither loans or treasury notes will answer your purpose. You cannot command the means of relieving your treasury for the coming year. But the entire occupation of Mexico is contemplated, and it may last for years. If so, where are the means for a protracted warfare or occupation of that country to be found? What will be the condition of your finances or of the commercial and monetary affairs of this country, with an annual deficiency in your treasury for a series of years, of from thirty to forty millions a year?

Sir, these evils are only to be removed by removing the cause which has produced them. Put an end to this war, and let the finances and the country revive by force of its elastic energies under the sunshine of peace.

A few words as to the project of deriving a revenue from Mexico, or subsisting your armies there. Sir, I am rejoiced to find that the idea of indiscriminate plunder is abandoned, although the purpose of military contribution is still entertained. I have always regarded this plan as chimerical. How will you carry out your revenue system there? By means of the Mexican authorities? You cannot trust them. They would require more overseers than it would require to perform the service. If you employ American officers they will defraud and resist you. Military aid must be employed, and the whole matter would degenerate into military contribution, and military contribution into indiscriminate plunder.

As to military contributions it is enough to say of them, in the language of your commanding general: "they would exasperate the enemy and starve ourselves." Production would cease and the country become exhausted.

What expectations can you entertain of serious relief from that country? That people are already prostrated. Their means are exhausted by their efforts for their own defence. You have overrun their country, disorganized and displaced their government—you have broken in upon and suspended the occupations and employments of peace, and above all, have overlaid their industry and their resources with the incubus of a foreign army which you propose to spread over their republic, to be subsisted upon them. From a people thus trodden down, impoverished, dishonored, and exasperated, you can expect but a poor harvest of revenue. Sir, fire and sword are poor financiers. What you get from that source will be but a drop in the bucket. There may be a vision of wealth floating before the imagination of some in the mines of Mexico. But it is to be remembered first, that these mines are private property—many of them the property of Englishmen, the subjects of a power both able and willing to protect their rights; and secondly, that all the mines of Mexico in the hands of this government would prove a losing concern.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 28, 1848

RESOLUTION OF THE LEGISLATURE OF RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. GREENE presented a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, requesting the Senators and Representatives from that State in Congress, to oppose the laying of a duty upon tea and coffee; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented a memorial of citizens of Apalachicola, Florida, praying the purchase, by the United States, of Mount Vernon.

Mr. W. stated, that as similar petitions signed by more than two hundred thousand citizens of the United States, were to be speedily presented, he would move that, for the present, the petition lie upon the table; which was agreed to.

On motion, by Mr. GREENE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Welcome Parmeter, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion, by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Bancroft Woodcock, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

LIGHT-HOUSE IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the construction of a light-house on Raccoon Point, Dernier Isle, on the State of Louisiana, and into the expediency of making an appropriation for a floating light on Atchafalaya Bay, State of Louisiana.

DUTIES UPON EXPORTS TO MEXICO.

Mr. MILLER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether he has caused to be said and collected any taxes, duties or imposts upon goods and merchandize belonging to citizens of the United States, exported by such citizens from the United States, to Mexico; and if so, what is the rate of such duties, and what amount has been collected, and also by what authority the same have been laid and collected.

REIMBURSEMENT FOR STOLEN TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. STURGEON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill for the relief of Messrs. Cook, Anthony, Mahon, and others; which was read and passed to the second reading.

THE HAMILTON PAPERS.

Mr. PEARCE, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth Hamilton, reported a bill authorizing the purchase of the papers of Alexander Hamilton; which was read and passed to the second reading.

THE TEXAS NAVY.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. RUSK asked, and obtained leave, to bring in a bill to authorize the President to increase the naval establishment of the United States; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MONUMENTS TO DECEASED SENATORS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. HANNEGAN on the 20th instant, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire whether it may be necessary, in order to secure a suitable site for the future construction and preservation of the monuments to the memory of deceased members of the Senate, and to report such plan or plans as may be most suitable for that purpose; and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records, if they deem it necessary.

On motion, by Mr. HANNEGAN, it was Ordered, That the Committee consist of five members, to be appointed by the Vice President; and Mr. HANNEGAN, Mr. MANGUM, Mr. HUNTER, Mr. CRITTENDEN, and Mr. DOUGLAS, were appointed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

On motion, by Mr. BAGBY, the prior orders were postponed, and the bill to authorize the settlement of the account of the late Joseph Nourse, after being read a second time, was considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

On motion, by Mr. TURNEY, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to further extend the patent of Jethro Wood.

Mr. BALDWIN, having withdrawn the amendment previously submitted by him, moved the following proviso, to come in at the end of the bill:

Provided, nevertheless, that the owner of any plough heretofore constructed on the principle of said invention, or his assigns, shall continue to have the same right to use and dispose of such plough for use, that he or they would have had if this act had not been passed.

The bill was then passed over informally.

On motion, by Mr. UPHAM, the prior orders were postponed, and the bill for the relief of Richard Bloss and others, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and having been amended, it was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

WIDOWS OF REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

On motion, by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives, making further provisions for surviving widows of the soldiers of the Revolution; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following adverse reports, and they were concurred in:

From the Committee on Indian Affairs, on the memorial of George S. Gaines.

From the Committee on Pensions, on the petition of George Petty.

From the Committee on Naval Affairs, on the petition of William M. Glendy.

From the Committee of Claims, on the memorial of George Hervey.

From the same Committee, on the memorial of Hugh Munroe McLean.

THE TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. CASS.—I have been desired to state that it is the wish of my friends on this side of the chamber, that this debate should be brought to a close within the most reasonable time. There is no disposition on this side of the chamber, to interfere in the slightest degree with the freedom of debate, or to prevent the fullest expression of opinion on the part of every member of the Senate; but we believe that it is very important that the debate on this subject should be speedily brought to a close. There are other important measures which await the action of this body, which must necessary be delayed till this bill be disposed of. It has occurred to us that hereafter every gentleman who addresses the Senate on this bill, should terminate his speech on the same day. We will have great pleasure in sitting as late as may be necessary, but we do hope that no Senator will hereafter occupy more than one day.—I am requested, further, to state, that it is our hope that this debate may be brought to a close, if not at the end of next week, as early in the week after as possible.

Mr. PHELPS.—It is with the utmost repugnance that I trespass any further upon the patience of the Senate; and, I would most cheerfully consent, as far as I am concerned, to leave the subject here to be disposed of by the Senate; and I assure the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that if no other Senator on this side of the House is more disposed to protract the debate than I am, his wishes will be speedily gratified. Sir, perhaps I owe an apology to the Senate for having consumed so much time yesterday, without concluding my remarks; but my apology is, if an apology be required, that the subject to which my remarks were directed yesterday, is a subject, in itself, almost inexhaustible; and I have found it impossible to express fully my views in relation to it, without consuming much more time than I should desire.

But, without further preface, I will resume the thread of my remarks. I was speaking, yesterday, of the project of redeeming the Treasury by the emission of Treasury notes; and was adverting also, to another consideration connected with it—the proposed relief to the currency and the business of the country. I had submitted certain remarks in the Senate for the purpose of showing that such a device would prove ineffectual; that as a revenue measure it would absorb just as much as it would supply, and that it would, therefore, leave a deficiency in your finances as great as it found. I have a few additional remarks to make on this subject. In the first place, I repeat that treasury notes, although they may enable you to anticipate your revenue for a short period, can never supply a deficiency. Sir, our object is to anticipate our revenue, but not a revenue for the present; so long as this war continues, it must be obvious to every Senator who hears me, that the deficiency cannot be supplied. If, therefore, we wish to anticipate our revenue, we must look forward to a time of peace; we must look forward for an indefinite period, and we must anticipate the revenue after that period has arrived. Well, sir, in this state of things, it is perfectly apparent that no relief can be effectual unless it is by obtaining money, in some shape or other, on a credit which shall cover the continuance of this war, and carry us forward to a state of peace.

I have finished the remarks which I intended to make upon this branch of the subject. I should be willing to leave it here, but after all that has been said and done, and after all the anxiety which has been expressed and felt, and which is still felt, I may be permitted to follow the example of other gentlemen in presenting to the Senate and to my own constituents, some other reasons for the vote which I am about to give.

Sir, what is the object of this war? Not conquest, it has been said, although, sir, this subject has assumed a great many phases since we entered upon the war. But the object is said to be indemnity! For what? Indemnity for the sum of some four or five millions of dollars for claims against the government of Mexico in favor of our citizens? Well, sir, the collection of this paltry debt has already cost us some fifty odd millions, and if we are to regard this matter in a pecuniary point of view, it will yet cost us much more. We had much better abandon the project of recovering our debt in this way. But the President has told us (what is undoubtedly true,) that the Mexican government has no means of indemnifying us for our expenses. They have no money. What then are we to have by way of indemnity? He tells us that we must have land. But I am informed they have no public domain. You will therefore get no title to the land. You may get a cession of territory, and what does it amount to? Why it amounts to the acquisition of jurisdiction over a horde of people, which will prove nothing but a burden and a curse to you, as long as they are on your hands. Sir, it will be worse, infinitely worse than the Indian population; which has cost this Government so much trouble and so much money. What will you do with them? Will you assume the same relations to them that you do to the Indian tribes? That cannot be done. If you leave them the form of a government, as you leave to the Indian tribes, your relations to them must be one of perpetual war. No man can expect that quiet possession can be held of that country, so long as they have their own government, and, especially, if we recognise it. There is another project, which is, to hold it as a province. This has been already demonstrated by Senators to be impossible. Place them in the condition of a province, and they will knock at your doors until they place their representatives in these seats. This will be the unavoidable result. There is an end, therefore, to the idea of governing these people as a province. The result will be, as a matter of course, annexation. They must be taken into our Union. They must be brought in upon the footing of American citizens.

Sir, for one, I want no partnership with this people. I do not desire to see them brought into our political family. I know, sir, that what was once considered as a problem, is now regarded as settled—that extent of territory is no serious obstacle to a free and representative government—but, sir, whether your territory be great or small, it is indispensable to the maintenance of a representative government, that its population should be a homogenous people. Sir, I have had under my eye for years an experiment, which shows the utter impossibility of bringing a people of a different origin and of peculiar habits, to harmonize under a representative form of government. A few years since it was the policy of the English government to establish a Parliament and a system of representative government in Canada. What was the result? We all know that the French population of the Canadas areas distinct now from the English, as they were when the English supremacy was established there. They are as distinct from the English as if the two classes had resided in different hemispheres. The result was, that when they came to the polls, they were arrayed on the side of their respective races—and their dissensions instead of being diminished by lapse of time, were only increased. The principal object of the Crown became necessary, in order to counteract the superiority in numbers of the French population of the lower province, and this led to the paltry rebellion of which we have heard so much. It became necessary at last for the British Parliament to unite the two provinces in order, by the introduction of the English, Irish, and Scotch population of the upper province, to counterbalance the political weight of the French population in the lower. Now, I undertake to say, that if the people of Canada were left at this moment, with an independent and representative form of government, five years would not pass over their heads, without presenting to us as the result of the experiment, a civil war in that country. The population of Mexico is as distinct from the Anglo Saxon race, as any two races are distinct upon earth. Sir, do you expect the descendents of the Puritans to harmonize with this anomalous population? Can you reconcile the love of order, the submission to law, and the attachment to peace which has characterized the descendents of Puritans for centuries past, with the lawless and turbulent propensities of a people whose elements from the period of their first national existence to the present day have been anarchy and revolution? I need only to say to you, sir, that if such an event as the incorporation of that country into this Union should occur, we could not make its population harmonize with our own. Sir, I am not disposed to intimate authoritatively, nor in a manner which will admit of that construction, that the consequence will be a dissolution of this Union. But I may be permitted to say, that in reference to my own constituency, and the kindred population of the North, that in my humble judgment, if "thirty new Stars" are to be added to the Union, from this conquered country, it will be beyond our power if we would, to hold that Union together. Sir, my opinions are decided in regard to this matter. I want no persons admitted into this political family, who are not of the Anglo Saxon race; unless it be a race that can amalgamate with us, and be lost in one homogenous mass.

Sir, I think the ground taken by the honorable Senator from Maryland, who is not now present, exhibited a much more rational view of the subject. He told us, that our indemnity consisted in military glory, in the brilliancy of our achievements—in the exhibition of our power in the results of our splendid military career. I agree, sir, with the honorable Senator, that that is all the indemnity which we can get, and I believe if the honorable Senator were now present, he would agree with me, that if this is to be our indemnity, in God's name, we have had enough of it. Sir, is there any new lustre to be added to our career of conquest—any new or additional reputation to be acquired—is it necessary, in order to vindicate the honor of this Republic, that we should proceed to trample under foot—to denationalize, and reduce to perpetual subjection, a foe who has lost the power of resistance? Sir, I am so unfortunate, that I have not looked upon the glory and splendor of military achievements, with the same sentiment of unmingled admiration as others may have done. I am constrained to say, that I have turned disgusted, from the revolting details of human slaughter, which the history of this war presents. Sir, I have been disposed to ask, in the name of the country, in the name of a christian people, in the name of humanity, yes, sir, in the name of humanity's God—for what rational purposes are these scenes of human butchery enacted? Sir, when I am told that the object is the glory of military achievement, I confess that my feelings revolt at it. No, sir, if this be the purpose, in heaven's name, let us be satisfied with what we have done. Let us pursue this object no farther. What opinions must be entertained in other quarters of the world, in relation to this Mexican war? It must be regarded as a war for national plunder, I was about to say, of national piracy! And instead of adding to the honor of the nation, it will call down upon us, if persisted in, the execrations of the civilized world. But, sir, I leave this part of the subject.

Mr. President, it is somewhat amusing to witness the various phases which this subject has assumed. In May, 1846, we were told that American blood had been shed upon American soil. We were told that the honor of the nation was involved, and we were called upon to vote for a declaration of war, because the indignity which had been inflicted upon us by the shedding of American blood upon American soil called loudly for retribution. But, sir, soon this became a war of indemnity. We were pursuing this war for the purpose of indemnifying ourselves for claims which our citizens had against Mexico; and while we were pursuing it for this purpose, and justifying it upon this ground, we were told that Mexico herself begun it; as if the process of collecting this debt had begun not on the part of the creditor, but of the debtor. But we were soon told that no indemnity could be had except by the acquisition of territory—that Mexico had no other means for indemnifying us. We were next further informed that we must occupy all Mexico, in order to distress her and bring her to terms; yet this was no war of conquest. It was a war for territory, which was to be acquired by force, and kept by force, but not a war for conquest. Yes, sir, a year ago we were told that it was not a war for conquest, but a war for indemnity. Now, after the successes of the last campaign, we are told that it is still a war for indemnity—not for conquest, but that we must hold on to what we have got, and when we get possession of the rest of Mexico, we can then determine for ourselves whether we will keep it.—Here is a subtile distinction. It is acquiring the territory of neighboring nation by force and keeping it by force, but it is not conquest. It is a distinction between robbing your neighbor and eating him and taking from him by force the contents of his pocket. What next?

We are now told that the object is the conquest of Mexico, and the whole of Mexico. The wise discretion to which I have adverted has become obsolete. It is now conquest; and this conquest without any declaration of a purpose, under any circumstances or at any time, to relinquish our acquisitions. The honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, if I understood him, said that the purpose is the conquest of the country, and that whether we shall retain it or not when conquered, is a question to be settled hereafter.

Mr. CASS.—If the honorable Senator will allow me. I said that the object was conquest, with the view of conquering peace.

Mr. PHELPS.—Ah! it is a conquest of the country for the purpose of conquering peace. Will the honorable Senator tell me how the conquest of the country is to result in the conquest of peace? You propose the occupation of the whole country—to displace its government—to seize its revenues—to take its people under your protection. You leave no government to make peace with. You deal with the people and not with their government. You have taken possession of a portion of their territory, and we are advised by the President not to surrender it, but to extend our laws over it. Sir, if peace is to be attained in this way it must be by the utter extinction of Mexican power. A peace to be acquired in this way is a peace to be obtained by annihilating the power which is opposed to you. We are to place them in a condition in which they cannot resist, and we shall be at rest because their power of resistence is extinct. I can come to no other conclusion.

But, sir, the object is now stated in some quarters to be the conquest of the country, not for the sake of indemnity; that has become an obsolete idea; but it is to be a conquest for the benefit of Mexico. Yes, sir, we must conquer the country for the purpose of putting that nation to school. We must assume a guardianship over them and thus put an end to their dissensions. When we have reformed their habits and sufficiently indoctrinated them at the point of the bayonet into our customs and habits and political creed, and qualified them for self-government, by the salutary influence of military subjugation, we are then to declare them of age and emancipate them—if we please. Now, this last object, this newly discovered purpose for which this Mexican war is prosecuted, has this one quality to recommend it: it is philanthropic. It is not obnoxious to the objections which I have urged against the pursuit of military glory—the wholesale slaughter of human beings for the honor of the deed. For war, however glorious and dazzling may be some of its appendages, is little else than mere human butchery—justifiable it may be in some cases—but it unjustifiable, it is nothing short of wholesale murder.

How long are these Mexican people to be kept at school? How many generations are to pass before the habits, views and character of this people are to be changed? Will gentlemen tell us how many generations are required to extinguish the Castilian blood, which even at this day exhibits itself in bold relief in the characteristic obstinacy of this Mexican people? Sir, it will endure for centuries. These people as a conquered people will be a distinct race, and the longer you keep them in subjection the longer will be the necessity for continuing your conquest. If they have proved incompetent to self-government, they will not improve under military supervision—if unworthy of admission into the American family you will hardly elevate them in the scale of human respectability by a course of abject servitude to a people whom they hate. They will never be reconciled to your government, and your laws and institutions can be sustained among them only at the point of the bayonet. But, sir, it has been my object, I perfect that the people, instead of being schooled by us, be left to the management of their own affairs. I prefer altogether the doctrine which permits every nation to regulate its own internal affairs, and which forbids foreign interference.

Permit me in this view of the subject to express my deep regret, that the purpose of conquest—if it were the original object of the war—had not been openly avowed in the outset. It would have appeared better in my humble judgment, in the chief executive officer of this government, if before proceeding—as I may say by stealth—to the conquest of Mexico, he had submitted the question to the American Congress, and the American people. Sir, it is not statesmanlike to make these protestations to the world, that the purpose of the war was not conquest, when at the same time every proceeding on the part of the government, their whole policy is leading to that very result. All this, in my judgment, is utterly inconsistent with that ingeneous and straitforward course which ought ever to characterize the Chief Executive Magistrate of this nation. Sir, it is unfortunate, extremely unfortunate, that when the attention of the American people is at last called to the subject, and they seek to know the object for which the war is prosecuted, they are met by the declaration, that in all human probability conquest has become inevitable. We have proceeded too far to retrace our steps. We have gone on until we have acquired possession of the country. We have placed that people in a condition in which they have no government with which to negotiate. We have placed them in such a condition, that we must take them under our own protection, and all this before the sense of Congress or the American people is ascertained. Sir, it is not for me to say that conquest was the original object. Common courtesy forbids it. Were it otherwise it would ill become me, on this floor and on this occasion, to advance so grave a charge in the face of the repeated protestations of the Executive, however strongly the force of circumstances may indicate its truth. But I do say, that if such was the object, it is little short of treason to the American people to pursue it thus by stealth until the evil of throwing upon our hands an empire—peopled by a race of different origin, different language, customs, and opinions, both political and religious—to be governed as a dependent province or admitted as incongruous material into our political union, becomes inevitable. And thus to place us in a position where, however strongly we may disapprove this policy, and deprecate such a union, we have no alternative but acquiescence.

Sir, the questions growing out of this unfortunate war are too grave to be left to Executive discretion—its results involving as they do, the integrity of our Union and the perpetuity of our institutions, should not be entrusted to the judgment—the caprice—the policy—nor the ambition of a mere Executive officer. The inroad upon the spirit of the Constitution in this assumption of power by the Executive, in entering upon his own responsibility upon this career of conquest, would, but a few years since, have astounded the American people and the world. The countenance now given it by the people, indicates too decisively, the change which has taken place in the spirit of our institutions—and affords an alarming presage of greater changes hereafter. This is a very serious question—what effect will this spirit of conquest have upon the character and disposition of the American people, and upon the genius of their institutions? This passion for military glory has been the bane of all republics, the disease which has undermined their constitutions and led to their destruction. I did hope that our peculiar position—separated as we are from the old world and its wars by the ocean—would save us from this lawless spirit of domination, which, when it once comes to debauch a people, renders them incapable of self-government.

Sir, can any man define to me the relation in which that officer holds to the Constitution? On the one hand, he is the Chief Executive of a limited government with limited and delegated powers; responsible to the people; and on the other hand he is a military conqueror proceeding upon the right of conquest and standing upon the right of power. Yes, sir, the chief Executive officer of our limited Constitution stands at this moment with one foot upon the Constitution and the other upon the law of conquest. He is at this moment exercising the power conferred upon him by the Constitution, and he is at the same time wielding an absolute sovereignty over an empire unrestrained by any restrictions or limitations whatever. His is a most anamolous position. What are his powers?—and how are these limited and delegated and qualified powers to be dovetailed into the Constitution in connection with this unlimited and irresponsible power? Sir, we have heard much heretofore, and with great reason, of the encroachments of the Executive power; but I undertake to say, that the President of the United States, independently of this right of conquest which is carried out in Mexico, at this moment wields within the United States a power which the framers of the Constitution never contemplated.

The constant accumulation of power in the hands of the Executive bids fair to destroy the balance of the Constitution. It has been an object of much alarm, of anxious solicitude to the statesmen of this country, and may well excite the anxious solicitude of the country itself.

The immense amount of power vested in the Executive is extended already beyond any previous expectation. It reaches every nook and corner of this wide spread republic. It is a patronage all-pervading—a patronage increasing with a rapidity unexampled—as the blue book, now a ponderous volume, compared with the blue book of former years will illustrate. It expands itself with your growth and plants itself among the pioneers of civilization, in every new establishment of civilized life. Nay, it moves in advance of civilization, and finds a wide field for its exercise in your Indian department—in regions to which the Indian title is not yet extinguished, where savage life and savage manners have not yet given place, and which the tide of civilization has not yet reached. This immense and all-pervading power acts directly upon the very source of political power—the people. In connection with this is the Veto power, so engrafted upon the Constitution to sustain and preserve the legitimate powers of the Executive, but used of late without scruple, not for the purpose of protective the Executive from legislative encroachments, but as I am constrained to believe and to say, for the purpose of controling the legislative power—of holding it in check, and of moulding its action to the opinions, views and purposes of the Executive.

To these powers already threatening to destroy the balance of the constitution, is now to be added these anomalous powers appertaining to the President, as the head of the military establishment, and derived from the law of nations and of conquest.

How can you resist this tendency to absolute Executive supremacy? or this career of conquest? Direct legislative action will not avail the veto power will interpose. You must refuse to act—you must adopt the remedy of the English Commons of withholding supplies. But will this avail you? The President has assumed the power of levying money in Mexico—and if he can levy money, can he not also levy men? May he not have a purse and a sword independent of you?

Sir, let me suppose that we could exchange characters with the Mexican people; clothe them with our energy, and enterprise, and ambition, and place us in their degraded condition; give the President the power of levying men and money in Mexico, and how long would our ephemeral republic continue?

Sir, with the tremendous power thus accumulated, the President may overturn the constitution. Not, perhaps, with the bayonet at your breasts, but by the tremendous power thus acquired and thus wielded, in defiance of the constitution. Sir, I desire to learn how this assumption of the power of levying money in Mexico can be reconciled with the constitution. In what portion of that instrument is it to be found? It cannot be found there; if justified at all, it is upon the right of conquest, and is, therefore, independent of the constitution. What is to be done with these military contributions levied there? Upon what basis does the financial system established there by authority of the President rest? Are these military contributions a part of your financial system? Are they based upon any act or authority emanating from you?

Sir, I have seen this morning, for the first time, a general order from the commanding General in Mexico, levying contributions there. Will the President account to you for them? No, sir; he intends no such thing. He will dispose of them at his pleasure.—What is to be done with the revenue collected there? If paid into your Treasury it is by the President's permission. If expended there, as it will be, will he wait for an appropriation? The Secretary of the Treasury tells us that about half a million has already been collected there. If it be a part of your finances, in what item of the honorable Secretary's report on the finances is it to be found?

Sir, where is the ground of responsibility to you, and how will you enforce it? Upon what principle will you hold the subordinates employed in the collection of this revenue responsible?—Where will you find the ground of responsibility which can be made the subject of judicial cognizance? Will you assume that our constitution and laws extend to that country, and that they can be judicially extended to transactions occurring there? If so, then, that country, by becoming subject to your constitution and laws, becomes ipso facto a part of this Union, and annexation is effected by the act of the President alone. Again, sir, if the President is considered as acting within the pale of the constitution, and Mexico is considered pro tac vice subject to your jurisdiction, by what authority does he buy taxes without your concurrence? Nay, by what authority has he established a tariff of duties different from yours—an arbitrary tariff of his own? The result is that he must either be regarded if exercising these powers independently of the constitution, or of that country; he for the time being subject to your laws, he has violated the constitution by making himself the law-maker and disowning your jurisdiction.

Sir, if you leave him to the exercise of this despotic power, what will be the effect on the institutions of this country? The tendency of all this is to infuse a military spirit into the constitution—to engraft upon it an extraneous power of the most arbitrary character, which will absorb the limited and delegated powers of the constitution, and over ride its restrictions. What sort of an administration shall we have with a military head wielding a purse and a sword not subject to your control? This war is debauching the nation with the love of military glory—giving to our institutions a military character, and placing at their head, instead of the constitutional President, a military Colossus. This may lead to the overturning of your government and the destruction of your liberties. Sir, this is the worst aspect, in my humble judgment, in which this unfortunate war can be viewed.

We may yet feel safe. We may rely upon the energies of this people and their love of liberty. But who can penetrate the future? There are those now living whose memory can embrace both extremities thus far of our national existence—who remember the period of 1789, and the adoption of the constitution; and who are at this moment watching with extreme anxiety the issue of the present crisis. Who among them would have believed, had it been foretold, the astonishing advancement of this country! Sir, many of us of younger age have lived to see what we never imagined would occur in our day. Our progress in the gradations of national existence has been without a parallel; and if there be in national existence such a thing as youth, maturity, decrepitude and decay, we have gone through the first with unexampled rapidity, and may find ourselves at the last, ere we are aware of it. We have accomplished, within three score years, what has required centuries elsewhere. We may find our decline as rapid as our growth. We may be prepared for the fate of other republics in an early stage of our national existence, as our maturity has been early. We may find ourselves at a period corresponding with the rapidity of our national advancement, the subjects of corruption and decay, and like preceding republics, the subjects of a military usurper.

Sir, I hoped it would not be my fate to witness such a result; but that the present condition of the country tends to such a result, we have too much reason to fear. Sir, let this war be terminated—let us return to the healthful condition of peace—that condition best adapted to our institutions, and that alone in which they can be perpetuated.

How shall the war be terminated? My answer is, by demanding of Mexico no more than is reasonable and just. A sense of justice will help us more, if we desire peace, than all the armies in the world. Put yourselves, if you can, upon an equality with that people in point of power, and then ask yourselves what, under all circumstances, is proper to be required of them.

What has been our course hitherto? We have sent out Mr. Trist, our peace commissioner, but we have sent our armies with him. We have tendered negociation, but it has been negociation at the point of the bayonet. We have commenced negociation with a proposition to dismember their empire. Give us, say we, one half your empire, or we will take it by force, and the other half with it, to pay the costs of the proceeding. Had such a proposition been made to us by any power or by all the powers upon earth, what would have been the sentiment of the American people? Sir, I recollect well that at the commencement of negociations at Ghent, a proposition was made by the British commissioners, to establish what they called the old French line of Canada, which would have thrown me and a great portion of my humble constituency into the dominions of Queen Victoria. Has any one forgotten the burst of indignation which ran through this land at a proposition so humbling and insulting? or the indignant reply of our commissioner to the proposition? Sir, is there a man who hears me who would not, had he been a Mexican, as he is an American, have repelled the proposition with scorn?

Sir, if my advice were asked as to the best mode of terminating this war, I would tell you: Instead of indulging in the spirit of aggression and of conquest, infuse a little moderation into your counsels; abate a little of your high and offensive pretensions; show a disposition to preserve instead of destroying the nationality of Mexico—a disposition to leave to her the integrity of her empire, rather than to dismember it. Be satisfied with a reasonable provision for your claims. If this war be a war of indemnity and not of conquest, be satisfied with a reasonable indemnity; say no more about indemnity for the expenses of the war, which you know is altogether beyond her ability; and, above all, show a willingness to relieve her from the pressure of your armies, so offensive to her national pride. Place yourselves on this ground, and I will venture my humble prediction that this unfortunate war will soon be ended.

Mr. DOUGLAS then took the floor, but subsequently yielded it to Mr. DOWNS, with the informed understanding that he should follow the Senator from Louisiana.

After the consideration of Executive business,

The Senate adjourned until Monday next.

MEMORIALS AND RESOLUTIONS OF THE LEGISLATURE OF MISSOURI.

Mr. ATCHISON presented a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, praying for the establishment of a territorial government in the territory lying west of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Also, a memorial of the said General Assembly, praying a grant of public land to aid in the improvement of the Osage river; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of the said General Assembly, praying that the mounted volunteers of that State, mustered into the service of the United States, may receive their full pay as mounted men, and compensation for their horses lost in the public service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a memorial of the said General Assembly, praying the final adjustment of all claims to lands in that State, under French and Spanish grants; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, a memorial of the said General Assembly, praying a grant of public land for purposes of internal improvement; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, resolutions passed by the said General Assembly, in favor of the Tariff of July 30, 1846, and the Independent Treasury, and deprecating any change or modification affecting the principles of either of those acts; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, resolutions passed by the said General Assembly, in favor of a strict adherence to the principles of the 8th section of the act of March 6, 1820, (commonly called the Missouri Compromise,) in the organization of new States or territories, out of any territory now belonging to, or which may hereafter be acquired by, the United States; which were read and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. NILES presented two petitions of citizens of Connecticut, praying a reduction of the rates of postage on newspapers, which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DIX presented the memorial of Priscilla D. Twiggs, widow of Levi Twiggs, deceased, late an officer in the Marine Corps, praying to be allowed a pension in consideration of the loss of her only son, who was killed in battle; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of John Caldwell, praying the reimbursement of money paid by him for the public service, while acting as assistant quartermaster to a regiment of volunteers in Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CORWIN presented a petition of citizens of Warren county, Ohio, praying the establishment of a mail route from Springboro' to Ridgeville, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BENTON presented the memorial of John Baldwin, praying the payment of the unliquidated instalments of Mexican Indemnity, due him under the convention of January 30, 1843, either in money, or in a six per cent. stock of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HANNEGAN presented the petition of Isaac C. Elston, and the petition of James M. Kibben, each praying the relinquishment of the reversionary interest of the United States in certain Indian reservations purchased by them; which were severally referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAYTON presented a memorial of members of an agricultural society in New Castle, Delaware, praying an extension of a patent granted to Obed Hussey, for a reaping machine; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. BERRIEN presented the memorial of the Central Rail Road and Banking Company of Georgia, praying the cancellation of bonds given for duties on certain railroad iron imported for the use of their railroad.

It would be perceived, the Senator remarked, that the claim of these memorialists was to the legal right which they asserted they had for the cancellation of these bonds; they having complied with the requisitions of the then existing law. It was not, therefore, a question of finance, but one of legal right, which, in the event of its refusal by Congress, would have to be determined by the courts of justice. The memorialists believed they had complied with the requisitions of the law, which rendered null the bonds which they gave for the payment of these duties. The Secretary of the Treasury had suffered this matter to remain, awaiting the decision of Congress, but had recently notified them that unless Congress shall act definitely on the subject during the present session, these bonds will be put in suit. As it was, therefore, a legal question, presented by this memorial, he would move its reference to the Judiciary Committee.

The memorial was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted documents relating to the claim of the heirs of James Rumsey, deceased, to remuneration in consideration of the benefits which have resulted from the application of steam to the purposes of navigation and the mechanic arts, of which their ancestor was the original inventor; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RECEIVERS OF THE PUBLIC MONEY.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the Senate of the 29th December, respecting the compensating the receivers of the public money who perform the duties of Assistant Treasurers, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

OCEAN STEAMERS.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That so much of the report of the Postmaster General as relates to a contract made for the transportation of the mail in steamships between Charleston, South Carolina, and Havanna, in Cuba, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr President: The House of Representatives have passed bills of the following title:

An act for the relief of Mary Brown, widow of Jacob Brown.

An act for the relief of the legal representatives of James Brown, deceased.

An act for the relief of Edward Quinn.

An act for the relief of George Newton.

An act for the relief of Russell Goss.

An act for the relief of Alborne Allen.

They have passed the bill from the Senate entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act to regulate the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in certain cases, and for other purposes,'" with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed an enrolled bill, I am directed to bring it to the Senate, for the signature of their President.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Clements, Bryan and Company, submitted a report accompanied by a resolution for their relief.

The resolution was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Bailie Peyton, submitted a report accompanied by a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the Attorney General, to purchase for the United States, the interest of Bailie Peyton in the tract of land on which the light house stands at the South West Pass at the mouth of the Mississippi river.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William H. Prentiss, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN OREGON.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to create the office of Surveyor General of the public lands in the Territory of Oregon, and to grant donation rights to settlers therein, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

COMPENSATION TO ACTING PURSERS, ETC.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to enable and authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of certain acting officers therein mentioned; which was read and passed to the second reading.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, the said bill was read a second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title be as aforesaid

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

COMPENSATION OF POST MASTERS.

Mr. NILES, in reporting a bill from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in amendment of an act, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to reduce the rates of postages, to limit the use and correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of frauds on the revenues of the Post Office Department, passed the 3d of March, 1845,'" remarked, that the object of the bill was to correct a mistake made in the act of last session, which was intended to increase the commission of post masters, but which, by an inaccuracy in the drawing of the bill, was made to diminish the commission. In order to correct the mistake, and to give to the act the effect obviously intended by both Houses of Congress, this bill was now reported. It was also designed to authorize a resettlement of such accounts of post masters as had been made under the erroneous construction of the act, and to indemnify them, or in other words to give due effect to the act of last session, in the case of all accounts which had been settled under it.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committe on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Maria Caldwell Robertson, submitted an adverse report thereon.

JETHRO WOOD'S PATENT.

On motion by Mr. CLARKE, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to further extend the patent of Jethro Wood.

The question being put on agreeing to the amendment moved by Mr. BALDWIN, on the 28th inst., it was determined in the affirmative.

The bill was then reported to the Senate and the amendment concurred in

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass and that the title thereof be as aforesaid

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS IN THE PATENT OFFICE.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, the bill to provide for additional examining clerks in the Patent Office, and for additional fees in certain cases, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

On motion, by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

SIGNING OF A BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the enrolled bill, making further provision for surviving widows of the soldiers of the revolution; and it was delivered to the Committee to be presented to the President of the United States.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

I communicate herewith a report from the Secretary of War, with the accompanying documents, in answer to the resolution of the Senate, of the 24th instant, requesting to be furnished with "copies of the letters, reports or other communications, which are referred to in the letter of General Zachary Taylor, dated at New Orleans, 20th July, 1847, and addressed to the Secretary of War, and which are considered to be containing the views of General Taylor, previously communicated, in regard to the line proper to be occupied at that time by the troops of the United States, and any similar communication from any officer of the army on the same subject."

JAMES K. POLK

Washington, January 31, 1848

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of War, containing the information called for in the resolution of the Senate of the 20th instant, in relation to General Orders, No. 376, issued by General Scott, at Headquarters, Mexico, bearing date the 15th December last.

JAMES K. POLK

Washington, January 31, 1848

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith the annual report of the Director of the Mint at Philadelphia, showing the operation of the Mint and Branch Mints for the year 1847.

JAMES K. POLK

Washington, January 31, 1848.

The messages were severally read, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS FROM THE HOUSE.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of Mary Brown, widow of Jacob Brown; for the relief of George Newton; and for the relief of Russell Goss; were severally read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of the legal representatives of James Brown, deceased; and for the relief of Alborne Allen; were severally read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Edward Quinn, was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SEVIER asked the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments, in order to correct a misrepresentation of remarks made by him a few days since. He found an article in the "National Intelligencer" of Saturday last, under the imposing caption—"Acquisition of desired territory by force, and not of right, boldly avowed as the principle of the administration"—in which it was attempted to show, that he had affirmed such a principle. Now, he had never broached such a doctrine. He had never contended, he did not now contend, that any power had a right to take territory to which it had no claim. In the remarks made by him on which the article in question affected to be a commentary, he had distinctly and explicitly maintained, that the claim to the right of navigating the Mississippi was the ground on which the action of the government had been predicated; and that the claim on which the act of 1806 rested, was the title which the United States government believed they had by virtue of the purchase of Louisiana. He did not, however, charge the "Intelligencer" with deliberate misrepresentation, as the report of his remarks was not quite correct. In justice to the Reporter, it was proper to add, that the report was submitted to him (Mr. S.) but being engaged on committee business at the time, he was hurried, and did not notice the omission of a single word which obscured the sense. On the same occasion he had spoken of the Perdido as the eastern boundary. In the report it was made southern boundary, and he desired to correct that error, lest the "Intelligencer" should, perhaps, make it the ground of assailing him on the score of geographical knowledge.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. DOWNS.—I had no intention, Mr. President, when this bill first came up in the Senate, to say anything upon the subject. I thought, sir, that our progress in this war with Mexico was such—we having advanced to the interior of that country, taken possession of its capital, and accomplished everything, practically, that the army and the President could accomplished—that at the meeting of this Congress, when it came together, it would, in its deliberations upon this subject, rather indicate what further steps should be taken in the matter, and would occupy their time in action rather than words. I had no expectation whatever, when this bill was first introduced, that its passage would be delayed, and that the measures recommended by the President would be opposed.

I find, however, that I have been very much mistaken. When it was proposed, for the first time, to take up this bill, I happened not to be in the Senate on that day, and I believe it was the only day in which I was absent since the commencement of the session—not, upon inquiring, I found that opposition was made to such consideration, and there was a very close vote as to whether the bill should be taken up. I understood from that fact at that time, that some obstructions would be thrown in the way of its passage; but, still, I did not anticipate that decided opposition to the bill, which has since been manifested on the other side of the chamber.

Mr. President, as we have had so much discussion, and so much difference of opinion as to the origin of this war; and as, perhaps, we shall hereafter have a difference of opinion as to the position by whom the opposition to the bill was commenced, I wish to place on record, the history, as I understand it, of this debate. In so doing, it will be necessary for me to allude to the course of certain Senators upon this all important subject; for, in relation to the history of the action of the Senate, in the debate on this bill, I do not, for one, desire to have the question hid as to who commenced or protracted this war of discussion. When the attempt was first made, sir, to call this bill up for consideration, the objection, as I understood from the "Official Proceedings," to taking it up, was not one of direct opposition to the bill, but, simply, whether it should be taken up or not at that time. At all events, that appeared to be the light in which it was regarded by the chairman of the Military Committee.

We soon, however, came to another stage of procedure in this matter: some days after, when the bill was again called up, an amendment was offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] to change the provisions, &c. Still I did not understand that to be opposition to the bill, for, if I understood the Senator's remarks, on that subject, it was not denied that the President should be properly sustained in the conduct of this war. And I am more confirmed in that opinion, from an incident that occurred about that period. In some preliminary discussion at that time, I recollect very distictly that the honorable Senator from Kentucky, seemed to be very much surprised, at an incidental remark that fell from the Senator from Mississippi viz: that the prosecution of the war had been delayed, or procrastinated by Congress. I confess that I was very much of the opinion of the Senator from Kentucky, and I thought that the objection of the Senator from Mississippi was not so well founded, as he affirmed it to be. I supposed that there had been no serious objection at the former session designed against the particular measures recommended for the prosecution of the war. I did not understand from the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, that such opposition was intended; but that there was only some difference of opinion as to the details of this particular measure. But, Mr. President, we soon arrived at other stages of this business. It was remarked the other day, by an honorable Senator on the other side (I do not now recollect which,) that the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and those connected with him in the support of this bill, were "making considerable progress"—that he had at first disclaimed all idea of the conquest of all Mexico; but that he now seemed to be disposed to regard it as not so unreasonable, or so monstrous—that such an idea might be tolerated, and that therefore he was making some progress.

Now, I must say in reply, that those who are thus charging us with inconsistency, are changing the position which they had assumed at the commencement, very rapidly. It is they who have been making progress; but I must be allowed to say that it is a progress backwards—from the time when the bill was first proposed to the present moment, they have manifested an increasing opposition to the prosecution of this war. Not only do they find fault with the suggestions of the President of the United States; with the suggestions of the War Department; with the reports of the Chairman on Military Affairs, and with all the authorities usually allowed on such occasions, but they resist and contest them at every point, and have denounced in the strongest terms the prosecution of the war. That was the commencement of their procedure upon this subject, marked out by the Senator from Delaware. But they did not stop there. There was still another stage—where they will stop in their onward career, I cannot say; for soon after another honorale Senator—the Senator from Connecticut—offered a resolution which took still higher ground: in the first place that Mexico had no public domain, and, secondly, if she had, she had no power to cede any of said territory to us; and, therefore, our idea of acquiring territory for indemnity was altogether futile. Such has been the progress of the opposition to this bill, and, I must confess, sir, that every additional step that has been made has but astonished me the more. These latter positions assumed by an honorable Senator have especially astonished me more than all the rest. What are they? Why, that Mexico has no public domain, and that we can get nothing from her.—Well, sir, I will not stop to discuss that question, for I care very little whether she has any public domain or not, though I understand the fact very differently. I understand that Mexico has a public domain. I think it very immaterial, and that the acquisition of territory for the public land it brings into the country is of no great advantage. In regard to public lands generally, and in respect particularly to the immense territory we have held, I think they bring in but very little income to the government. I venture to say, that on examination in respect to the value of the public lands in this country, that after deducting the expenses of surveys, purchases, and the other necessary expenses, it would be found that it has been by no means a money-making business. There are other advantages in the acquisition of territory besides the mere value of the land. The increase of population, of commerce, and consequently of revenue resulting from such acquisition, must be taken into account. Suppose we had never received a dollar out of the immense territory acquired by the acquisition of Louisiana, would not the acquisition, considering the millions of revenue received at New Orleans, have been a sufficient inducement to its acquirement? I believe Mexico has a public domain to cede, but whether she has or not I do not care a straw. We want the territory for the spread of population, the increase of our commerce, and the extension of our liberties, just as we wanted Louisiana and the valley of the Mississippi, Floridas, and Texas. I shall not follow the Senator in his argument on this point. He cited from a work on international law, of which I profess to know but little. I shall not then follow him in that quotation. But I should think that such law as that which he cited is at variance with the practice of all nations, contrary to common sense, and not to be tolerated in this age of the world. How, I would ask, did we acquire the very ground on which this capitol stands? Tradition records, that the Indians once lighted their council fires on this very hill; would the Senator then resort to it, that we have no title to this, the site of our capitol, and that the remnant of these Indians could at any time, justly eject us from its possession? But if the Senator's argument should be correct, that Mexico has no power to cede territory, how will that help his cause. It will only make it the more necessary for us to take it, if she cannot cede it.

Such, then, sir, is the history of the opposition thus far, to this bill. Before I proceed further, however, I will advert to an argument made by the honorable Senator from Vermont, who last addressed the Senate. In the conclusion of his remarks, he complained of the exercise of what he was pleased to term—an almost despotic military power, in the hands of the President of the United States in Mexico, and declaimed at some length, against the dangers of an abuse of a military authority. But does not this military power continue to be exercised by the President, in the very necessity of the case, and because that legal provision has not yet been made by which he would have been relieved of that responsibility? So far from being desirous to hold California and New Mexico, by military tenure, rather than by the organization of civil goverment, the President has been anxions to be relieved of that responsibility, which the circumstances of the case have devolved upon him, and the gentleman from Vermont, can at any time contribute his share in the removal of that much of the military power of the President, by establishing civil or territorial government.

There is another preliminary remark which I desire to make, and it is in reference to the astonishing distrust manifested on the other side of the chamber, with respect to the recommendation of the President, the Secretary of War, and the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I believe it has hitherto been generally considered, that in cases where the honor and interest of the country are involved in a controversy with a foreign power, party spirit should be assuaged. And I think the history of the country shows that, in the highest party times, when such cases have arisen, party spirit has ceased. It was so, I recollect, some years ago, when the question of the North Eastern Boundary was in agitation. Then, nearly, by unanimous consent—indeed, I believe it was unanimous—means were placed at the disposal of the President, to meet any contingency which might arise. So it was also, I believe, at the commencement of this war, but the spirit of party opposition, has gradually arisen, and every measure suggested for the prosecution of the war, is now most scrupulously scrutinized.

I now proceed to give some of the grounds of my vote upon this bill, in addition to the reasons given for its passage by the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and so eloquently sustained by another member of the committee, (the Senator from Mississippi,) whose heroic and skilful exploits in two of the most brilliant battles—and I regret to say also as his own honorable wounds but too clearly attest—the most bloody battles of the war—Monterey and Buena Vista—adds a voice ought to whatever he says on this subject, which, it seems to me, ought to be conclusive. I felt sure it would be so then, but I find I was mistaken. His arguments have not been answered; they never can or will be answered on this floor or elsewhere. Still opposition to the bill appears to have constantly increased from that day to this. My thanks, and the thanks of this body and of the country are due to the honorable Senator from Mississippi, who is on the military committee, for what he said on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky. That amendment seemed almost to have reduced the friends of this bill to the necessity of undervaluing the efficiency of volunteers or to adopt the amendment. There is a difference of opinion on this subject both in the army and elsewhere. The honorable Senator was identified with both arms of the service, regulars and volunteers, and could have no partiality for either. Few men occupy the same position in this particular; he has said, therefore, all that is proper or necessary on the occasion, and, I have no doubt, satisfied both parties, that for the services contemplated regulars are to be preferred. While expressing then my thanks to that Senator, and my full concurrence in all he said on the respective merits of volunteers and regulars giving preference to neither in their appropriate sphere, but doing ample credit to both. I take occasion to state a fact and an opinion of volunteers I once heard from a very distinguished officer of the regular army in the war of 1812, now no more, and who, like my friend from Mississippi, bore about him wounds received on the battle fields of his country, and which, I believe, at last carried him prematurely to the grave—I mean the late General Ripley. I thought the fact stated and the opinion given a little extravagant. I now believe them both perfectly true. He said that in all the annals of American warfare American volunteers in anything like equal numbers never had been beaten, and never could while our present institutions existed. The battle fields of New Orleans, Buena Vista, Cerro Gordo, Brazito, Sacramento and others, attest the truth of what he said.

In the debates on this bill there has been, I think, some incorrectness in the statements of those who oppose the bill, no doubt, unintentional, as to the force now authorized and required by the Executive and the Committee, calculated to lead to error. It has been variously stated by different speakers, from ninety to a hundred thousand men, and the increase contemplated by the bill now under consideration, and the bill for twenty regiments of volunteers, as increasing the actual force in service thirty thousand men. I do not so understand it. As I understand it from the Reports of the Adjutant General's Office, the present forces authorized are:

Regulars,	30,350
Volunteers,	32,816
Total authorized,	63,166

If we add to this the ten regiments contemplated by this bill we make the whole amount 73,166. The force in actual service from the last returns are:

Regulars,	20,333
Volunteers,	20,286
Volunteers from Michigan and Alabama, on their way,	2,200
Making in all in actual service,	42,719

From these statements it will appear that the number that can be kept in service, of those authorized by law, is about two-thirds. This calculation will give for the actual force in service after the ten new regiments are added, about 48,925, say fifty thousand men. And if the twenty additional regiments of volunteers be added to the forces previously authorized, the number that would be actually kept in service according to this mode of calculation would be 62,000. This bill and the bill authorizing the twenty regiments of volunteers, does not, as has been represented, add thirty thousand men to the number in actual service. They do not necessarily add a single man to either arm of the service; they only authorize the President to do so if he deems it necessary.

While on this branch of the subject I desire to make a few remarks in reply to the arguments offered against the bill and in favor of the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. BUTLER,) which is still pending. That amendment proposes, instead of increasing the number of the regiments, to add a certain number of men to each company. I do not know much about military affairs, sir, but I confess that this amendment struck me as rather extraordinary, particularly when it was considered that the peace establishment of the United States had been already very much augmented in the manner proposed in the amendment; and above all, after the remarkable manifestations which the army had given of its efficiency under the present organization. The experiment of making that change in this organization appeared to me to be of doubtful expediency, to say the least of it. A slight departure, even from an established system which has proved so eminently efficient, might be attended with danger. I do not say that there would positively be danger in making the change proposed by the amendment, but I prefer leaving the organization of the army precisely as it is at present. The Senator from South Carolina recommends his amendment on the score of economy. In some cases great economy is the worst economy. We cannot expect when we go to war that we can prosecute it without expense. I perfectly agree with gentlemen, who declare that when we go to war, we must pay for it. We must tax the people. I regard as one of the consequences of this war, the necessity of imposing taxes to meet the expenditures. I admit that at once, and am ready to go as far as any reasonable man, in the imposition of taxes, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of this war. The expense I know must be great, and for it we must provide. But considerations of economy are not to enter into the calculations of a people, when they find it necessary to enter into a war. The great object of war is success, and that is to be sought at any cost. We are now engaged in war, and we must prosecute it to a successful close. It is no time now to sit down, and counting the cost, cut off some of the odds and ends. If economy is your object why not strike off half of the officers of the army? If we are to adopt this economical policy, why not proceed to cut down all the officers? I have no fear as to our inability to meet the expenses of this war. We have met them thus far, and we shall be fully able to meet them hereafter. I cannot, therefore, concur in the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

In the course of the argument on that amendment something was said about the patronage of the Executive, and in reference to that I have a few words to offer. I know that complaints have been made with reference to the patronage disposed of by the Executive in the appointment of the principal officers of the army engaged in this war. But, I think, sir, that an attentive examination of the army list will furnish evidence of some justification for the conduct of the Executive. At the head of the list there does seem to be a considerable preponderance of democratic names, but if you look further down you will discover that the officers appointed by the Executives of those States in which Whig influence prevails, have been selected from the ranks of that party. For myself, I would never permit such distinctions of party to operate in the selection of officers for the armies of the country; and never, in any recommendations which I have made, have such distinctions been permitted to exercise the slightest influence. In the defence of the honor and interests of the country, Whigs and Democrats alike have participated, and should fairly share in the offices and emoluments of the army. If the President had acted in this matter in the exclusive spirit, that has been alledged against him, I should have condemned him most emphatically. But when I find that the spirit of exclusiveness in appointments to office commenced on the other side, before the general staff was organized, I believe that the President was not at all to blame in attempting to make something like a balance, by appointing a large number of democrats.

Mr. MANGUM.—If the honorable Senator will allow me, I would remark that in reference to my own State, that such a course as he describes was not adopted by the Executive of that State; and that a very meritorious and scientific gentleman of the democratic party received an appointment; indeed, I believe that all the appointments were made irrespective of party considerations. As the Senator is aware, we had a Whig Executive in that State.

Mr. DOWNS.—I am very glad that the honorable Senator interrupted me, because if in error, at any time, I shall always be happy to be corrected. I recollect an instance in the gentleman's own State, which sustains me in the position I have assumed with respect to these appointments of the Executives of the States.—I had the pleasure of being introduced last summer to a gentleman who commanded one of the new regiments in the regular army—Colonel Wilson—and ascertained the fact that although a man of wealth and standing in the community, having volunteered when the first call was made on the country, and been elected to some subordinate office, yet contrary to general expectation, he did not receive from the State Executive the command of one of the regiments, and that in consequence of the neglect, the President appointed him to the command of one of the regiments. But I regarded it as a very strong case in point; and I had it in view when I made the remark which elicited the interruption of the honorable Senator.

Mr. MANGUM.—The fact is as stated by the honorable Senator. Colonel Wilson was afterwards appointed by the Executive here, and two strong letters from the Whig Senators of this body were written recommending him to the appointment. That was the spirit which, so far as I know, characterized the public authorities of North Carolina.

Mr. DOWNS.—I have no knowledge of the proceedings in North Carolina except in this instance, which I confess, struck me as one of those affording a justification of the course of the President. I did not, however, intend to refer to a particular case, but to speak generally of the course which had been taken in making the appointments. I do not pretend to go into all the instances occurring in the several States, but I speak of the general result, and I believe that upon investigation, it will be found that a large portion of the appointments of officers were made from the party which is opposed to the President in their political views. This, sir, I believe, has been the liberal course of the Executive on this subject.

Before I quit this part of the subject, there is one other reason which I will state, why I prefer regular forces to volunteers.—Their duties are very much the same, and as the war is conducted their period of service will be much the same, yet the difference between the officers of this description of force is very material.

The volunteer officers not holding their commissions from the United States, there is no opportunity for promotion. They may go there and fight for years, and though they perform the same duties as are performed by the officers of the regular army and achieve as gallant exploits, yet they can receive no advancement. Those who begin as captains will be captains still, and those who command as lieutenants will be lieutenants still.

There was a remark made by the honorable Senator from South Carolina who last addressed the Senate upon this subject, and who offered an amendment to this bill in which I cannot concur. It seemed to be based upon the idea that the engagement of volunteers or the enlistment of regular troops could not be accomplished. He says:

"Why is it that the Executive is now the alarmist, cannot raise the number of troops which he has the authority to raise, for carrying on the war in the valley of Mexico? Why is it? Does it arise from popular aversion against entering into such service as this? If it were a war for the defence of our own soil, do you believe that less than that number could not be called into requisition? Sir, at the voice of the Executive of the United States ten times that number would spring up, ready to defend the national honor and the soil of the Republic. And I must here make another remark, in order to put myself right upon this question, in relation to the power and propriety of carrying on this war. I would answer for it that the President could not say that it was out of his power to raise the number of troops which the laws of the country authorize him to raise. But, sir, the very fact that he is unable to raise these troops by the means which have been put in his power, is, I think, one of the omens which a wise ruler should regard in administering the trust—the sacred trust—that is committed to him."

Now, I do not understand the President as taking any such ground. I have never understood that there has been a single case in which a call has been made for volunteers, in which that call has not been fully and completely answered. In Kentucky, Tennessee, and, in fact, in all the States, the last calls were not only responded to at once, but more men were offered than could be received.

Mr. BUTLER.—I beg to interrupt the Senator for a moment. He has not exactly stated my proposition. In considering, as I did contend, that if the additional troops called for were necessary, they could be supplied in the manner proposed by an amendment to the bill, I asked the question, why not raise them in the West? One answer was that the men would prefer entering a new organization. But my proposition was, that if additional troops were needed they could be added to the old regiments instead of increasing the expense of creating new ones.

Mr. DOWNS.—I do not see in the remarks of the Senator any distinction between the two descriptions of forces. On the contrary, the ten regiments authorized by the bill of last session, were filled up with extraordinary rapidity. I do not know that there is any complaint in the recruiting for the old regiments. Almost every newspaper that has been received from New Orleans, announced the arrival of fresh troops, to fill up the reduced companies.

But, while upon this subject, permit me to make another remark, as an additional reason for the passage of this bill. There is no doubt that recruiting in the new regiments, will be more rapid than in the old regiments. And the reason is that, when you appoint officers from civil life, they go into the country where they are known, and, consequently, the men the more readily undertake to serve under them.

I do not know certainly how many of our troops in Mexico, were lost in battle, and by disease respectively, but I suppose at least as many were lost by the last, as by the first. Many at any rate fell by disease, and in consequence of the late period in which they arrived at Vera Cruz.

If we then pass this bill at once, we can send them off at an early period, so as to escape the diseases of the climate, which have been heretofore encountered. But if we continue to debate the bill indefinitely, if we go on talking without acting, we shall not only do as was done last session, but the evil will be much greater than last year; because this is a very long session, and may be extended indefinitely to the midst of summer; whereas last year the delay could not extend beyond the fourth of March. It was, for reasons of this kind, as stated by the Honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that I thought it would be far preferable to pass this bill without any unnecessary delay.

As the remarks which I shall make, are in a great degree in answer to arguments which have been made in opposition to the bill, I must say that I should not have spoken at all, if it had not been for those arguments.

I now wish to advert to another of the positions assumed by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, and lest I should be mistaken, I will quote the language of the gentlemen.

"But in that picture I will give an ultimatum and propose my terms to that Government. I would direct, in the first instance, all negotiations for it to the Rio Grande we are bound under the most solemn of pledges to accept the gift of Texas. But then the question may be asked, and it is a proper question, how would you establish any other line in regarding the territory of the United States from those of Mexico? Will you fall back upon any line which separates Oregon from Mexico? I think not sir. But by way of answer, I would propose to Mexico, and with a sincere desire to consummate the war, I would not ask it, if it were to be done to-morrow, to send the most illustrious embassy to Mexico, and to propose to her boundary upon the Nueces, with the right however, to extend beyond it to any other line to which we could consent, and for the claim we have against her; and I should think it no degradation."

Now, I have a very great objection to the first proposition, considered in this extract. I object totally and peremptorily to sending any more ambassadors to Mexico. We have sent too many already. The President was right at first, I think, because our true policy is for peace, where it can be honorably obtained. Yet, although the President at the early stages of this war did make them these offers of peace, nothing has been done towards the conclusion of a peace by them. Even now, after they are completely overthrown, their capital taken and army destroyed, still terms of peace are rejected.

Under these circumstances we ought not to send to them another ambassador, high or low. We have made propositions many times and they would not accept them—we have now conquered them—they are in our power. Shall we, then, solicit again until they consent to treat with us? If I were to send an embassy at all, it should not be with such an ultimatum as the honorable Senator from South Carolina proposes. Why should we now agree to take the Oregon boundary as the extent of our title, giving them to understand that we expect nothing more, and leaving to themselves to propose a boundary for indemnity.

This would be giving them new life or encouragement. If the President could be so weak as to present such a proposition, they would say at once "there is some mystery in the sudden change—some difficulty in the affairs of the American Government," which would encourage them to persevere in hostilities, under the impression that we would ultimately be compelled to give up our conquests; and this would be a reasonable conclusion from such a proposition.

I now come to some general remarks which I wish to make upon the question of the war with Mexico. And first of I have to say that there is one thing which has appeared to me very singular in this discussion on the part of gentlemen on the other side of the chamber. The President in his message has declared what he thinks as the right course to be pursued; and gentlemen of the Democratic party generally have concurred with the views he has taken; while those on the opposite side, object to the policy in the most decided manner. But they do not tell us what they would do. It is very easy to find fault, but not so easy to tell us what would be the right course to pursue.

The studied silence of our opponents on this subject is the more surprising because we had indications before the meeting of this session of Congress, that the objects of the war ought to be declared, and the President compelled to abide by them. Mr. Clay, in his Lexington speech, said:

"I say to the American Mr. President and fellow citizens, with entire confidence, that Congress has the right, either at the beginning or during the prosecution of any war, to declare the objects and purposes for which it was proclaimed, and for which it ought to be continued. And I think it is the duty of Congress, by some deliberate and authentic act, to declare for what objects the present war shall be longer prosecuted. I suppose the President would not hesitate to regulate his conduct by the pronounced will of Congress, and to employ the force and the diplomatic power of the nation to execute that will. But if the President should decline or refuse to do so, and, in contempt of the supreme authority of Congress, should persevere in waging the war for other objects than those proclaimed by Congress, then it would be the imperative duty of that body to vindicate its authority by the most stringent and effectual and appropriate measures. And if, on the contrary, the enemy should refuse to conclude a treaty containing stipulations securing the objects designated by Congress, it would become the duty of the whole Government to prosecute the war with all the national energy, until those objects were attained by a treaty of peace. There can be no insuperable difficulty in Congress making such an authoritative declaration. Let it resolve, simply, that the war shall, or shall not, be a war of conquest; and, if a war of conquest, what shall be conquered. Should a resolution pass disclaiming the design of conquest, peace would follow in less than sixty days, if the President would conform to his constitutional duty."

This is frank and decided. I do not see any reasonable objections to the course suggested.

I do not know what the President's opinions are—I speak only for myself—but I would be very glad, and I think the President would also be gratified if Congress would adopt such a course. Why has not this course been adopted?

There has been another announcement of this principle, and a very emphatic one from another quarter.

I read only this morning, this decided declaration of opinion from a gentleman in another department of the general government:

WASHINGTON, JANUARY 7, 1848.

My dear sir: I will inform you of the termination of this unequitable war with Mexico as soon as made known to me by the first blow we strike. In my judgment, it was unnecessarily and unconstitutionally commenced by marching our army into disputed territory in the possession of Mexico. And I think that Congress, who unquestionably have the power, should put an end to the war on just and honorable principles.

After agreeing upon the terms on which a treaty should be made, they should call upon the Executive by resolution to offer a peace to Mexico upon that basis, and, during the negotiation, hostilities should be suspended. If the President shall refuse to do this, in the military appropriation bills the army should be required to take such positions as shall carry out the views of Congress. These bills the President could not veto, and he would be bound by their requirements. This may be done by the House.

This is perfectly frank and clear and admits of no doubt.

If gentlemen approve of this doctrine let them subscribe to it boldly. There it is. I want a simple response—yes or no. Do you approve of it or do you not? I have, and the people have a right to demand from gentlemen on the other side, what are their views?

I have no idea that there will be any peace until the presidential election is over; and is it to be supposed that the people are going to vote in the dark?

I do hope, then, that those gentlemen who differ with us so much, and find so much fault, will propose a plan of their own, or at all events, that they will say on this question, yea or nay. Let them sign the bond. Here it is in unequivocal terms.

I want to know whether they will propose to withdraw the army, to give up not only the indemnity of millions, which our citizens claim, but say that all the blood and treasure which has been spent in the war, shall be thrown away, or whether in the spirit of the suggestion made by the Hon. Senator from South Carolina, go to Mexico, and fall on our knees, and entreat that she will make peace on her own terms.

Mr. BUTLER.—I beg the Senator will allow me to say that I never assumed any such proposition, and I do not think that my language on the occasion referred to, at all justifies such an inference as has been drawn. I am quite at a loss to know how the gentleman could have arrived at such a conclusion. I certainly said that I would allow Mexico the priviledge of indicating a line, without at all pledging myself to accede to it. I did not wish to extort terms from her under duresse—at the mouth of the cannon. So far as regards the indemnity due us, whatever be the amount, I stated that I would insist on an adjustment of it, allowing Mexico simply freedom in the conduct of the negociation—giving her the privilege of indicating such boundaries as would be most favorable to permanent peace between the two republics. I said nothing to authorize the extravagant proposition of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. DOWNS.—The gentleman, I hope, did not understand me as saying he used those identical words, "falling on our knees." That was a mere figure of speech; I did think, however, and still think, that that was very much the meaning of the language employed by the honorable Senator.

In the line of argument which I have marked out for myself on this subject, I shall next proceed to consider the causes of the war. It is said that the President made this war by ordering the troops to the Rio Grande. I differ from this opinion totally.

I believe the war could not have been avoided, that it was the natural consequence of the conduct and the folly of the weak and imbecile government of Mexico.

If it were necessary to look for other causes of the war, than this conduct of Mexico, I could suggest another cause much more probable than that of the conduct of the President.

I believe it grew out of the obstinacy of the Mexican government in insisting upon her claim to the dominion of Texas after all the principal nations of the world had recognized her as an independent republic. But, if I should look for other causes than this at home, and if I should say that it arose not alone from the perversity of Mexico, but from the actions and opinions of certain persons within the United States, I should be much nearer the truth than by attributing it to any act of the President or of General Taylor. It was more owing to the position taken by certain persons in this country. I allude to the announcement made in 1844 from a very high quarter, that the annexation of Texas was a cause of war. Mr. Clay in his letter of 1844 says:

"I consider the annexation of Texas at this time, without the assent of Mexico, compromising the national character and involving us certainly in war with Mexico, and with other foreign powers."

This cry has been kept up ever since, and is the more likely to be the cause of the war, than any act of the President.

Now I do not say that this declaration was the cause of war: very far from it; but if we are to attribute it to any cause arising within the country, this is the cause to which I would point. There were peculiar circumstances which gave to this declaration extraordinary weight, with Mexico, at that time.

The very fact that two great powers of Europe, England and France, had certain questions of interest connected with Texas, which made them opposed to the annexation of that republic to the United States, they felt, that if she became a portion of this Union their commercial privileges would be lost. They wished her to remain an independent nation, and to continue her commercial relations with them.

It was natural that Mexico should adopt the suggestions of the shrewd diplomatists of those nations, and resolve to fight it out.

There was another reason also, the Oregon dispute was then existing. Mexico in this whole affair has been unfortunate. One of these misfortunes is, that this Oregon question existed at the time Mr. Slidell was sent as our minister. There is every probability he would have been received and the dispute settled, if Mexico could have foreseen what occurred a few months afterwards, if it had not been for the idea, that we were likely to be involved in war with England on account of the Oregon question, she would have listened to reasonable terms, and the controversy would have been settled in 1845. I think then, that those who impute this war to the President of the United States, or to General Taylor's march to the Rio Grande should be very cautious how they use such a weapon.

I do not know what are the intentions or purposes of gentlemen on the other side in this matter, but I have a right to guess; and though I cannot divine their purposes, as they keep so close on the subject; if they do intend, by the position which they assumed here to fight the battle of annexation over again, I shall not shrink from the contest, though I did think that that question had been settled, and the people believed that it had been settled. It was a question about which we differed, and which we fought manfully. One party prevailed; and I, for one, was willing to let the question rest forever. But if you throw down a gauntlet, I will not hesitate to take it up.

While on the subject of the opinions of distinguished men, I wish to refer to another opinion. I allude, sir, to Mr. Gallatin and his pamphlet on the Mexican war. He says, too, that annexation was actual war. I cannot view that document in the same light I do the speech or letter of the distinguished statesman of Kentucky.—I may be wrong in this, but so it is, I differ in opinion equally from them both; but while I listen with respect and attention to one of them, the great Kentuckian, I cannot read the lucubrations of the other without indignation. And this feeling is not because I undervalue the admonitions of the aged, as the young are too apt to do; I am myself old enough to have got over that weakness if I ever had it. I listened not long since in this body, not only with respect and attention, but almost with filial reverence to opinions and arguments of a distinguished Senator, (Mr. CALHOUN) to not one of which scarcely, could I bring my mind to assent. I shall listen, whenever they speak, to other (Mr. D. here looked towards Messrs. BENTON and WEBSTER) distinguished Senators with like feelings. I feel, sir, and I believe that people of the United States feel that such men as I have just alluded to, have a right to speak and ought to be listened to with profound respect on questions of national honor and of foreign war. They were born in this land and have grown up with this country; they have done the state some service—their history, for almost half a century, is their country's history—

"The page of her story is filled with their names."

American genius has been appreciated, and American eloquence admitted and illustrated by them. Yes, sir, to such men, on all subjects, I will listen with respect, however I may differ with them. Not so, sir, with him who comes from other lands—first breathed other than American air—once owed allegiance to another power—has another native home, and attachments, and feelings, and prejudices, and opinions, and sympathies, more or less influenced, as they must be, by recollections of that native home. He school Americans in American honor and national decorum! No, sir! every impulse of my heart tells me no, and compels me to say it; I cannot and will not resist it. Doubtless we have committed errors in our foreign policy; we may commit others; we should be more than human if we did not. But such, as I believe, it ever has been—under all parties—through all the vicissitudes of the most eventful period in the world's history for seventy-two years, so I hope and believe it will continue, long after we have passed away, and when even these solid walls that have outlived the flames of one foreign war, shall moulder to decay and fall in ruins, American in origin—the inspiration of American mind, sustained by American arms and hearts—but uninfluenced by any thing that is not indegenous to our soil—foreign governments, foreign presses, foreign bayonets, foreign opinions of any, whether domiciliated at home or abroad, or any thing else foreign. Yes, sir, right or wrong, successful or unsuccessful, whig or democratic, I want it to be American, all American, and nothing but American.

Let it not be said I am a Native American, and decry foreigners, and would deprive them of all power. Far from it! I have always taken an opposite course in all my public life on this subject; nor have I changed my opinion in the least. I stand now where I ever have on this subject, where I stood in the legislative halls of my own State, when this subject was agitated in 1839, and where, on a still more memorable occasion, in the La Convention 1843-5, when a strong attempt was made, principally by those opposed to my party in politics, to disfranchise, in some degree, foreigners. In one of the most protracted and animated debates that, I believe, has ever occurred in America on the subject, I so effectually, with other democratic friends, sustained the rights of our adopted citizens, that a meeting of the naturalized citizens of New Orleans voted medals to some half a dozen of us, at the head of which was our eloquent leader on the occasion, my good friend Bernard Marigny, who, though born in a land then foreign, has, without changing his allegiance or the ties of his native home, become an American citizen by the process of annexation, and as good a one as ever lived in it. Yes, sir, give them almost all rights, as the federal constitution has, but I would request only that on questions of national honor and foreign war, they should not at least speak first and loudest, if they speak at all.

I now come to another branch of the subject, viz: The position assumed by Senators on the other side, that the President of the United States was the cause of the war; that he brought it on by the ordering the removal of the troops to the Rio Grande. I disagree totally from this opinion. My opinion is, that if this war was brought on by any cause within the control of this government, it was produced by other hands than those of the President of the United States.

And I think an examination of the facts connected with the history of the matter, will convince every impartial mind of its truth.

Whether annexation was a declaration of war or not, Mexico considered it so, and made war accordingly; and the President had no option—he did not make it. Here are the facts on this point:

Under date of August 23, 1843, the Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations, in the name of his government, addressed to our minister in Mexico the following language:

"The Mexican government will consider equivalent to a declaration of war against the Mexican republic the passage of an act for the incorporation of Texas with the territory of the United States. The adoption of the declaration without such which the President of the United States has objected in regard to the annexation of the department of Texas to the American Union, that the determination is founded upon the necessity which Mexico has declared to sustain, by force of arms, a war which has existed for eight years, and which she will maintain at all hazards.

On the 4th of June, 1845, President HERRERA issued a proclamation, announcing the intention of Mexico to resist by force the annexation of Texas, and affirming:

"That the law of the United States in relation to the annexation of Texas to the United States, does in many respects violate the rights that Mexico has as a sovereign power over that department."

Affixed to this proclamation and published with it were two decrees of the Mexican Congress, one setting forth that the Mexican nation calls upon all her children to the defence of her national independence;" and the other announcing that the government would "call to arms all the forces of the army, according to the authority granted to it by existing laws."

On the 24th of April, 1846, Paredes issued a manifesto expressing the determination in regard to the annexation which his government had taken immediately upon its accession to power in the beginning of that year, and while General Taylor was still at Corpus Christi. In this manifesto Paredes says:

"On assuming the supreme authority, I found the heavy responsibility of sustaining the decision of the nation, and I found myself DESIGNATED BEFOREHAND TO CHANGE ITS POLITICS FROM THE WEAK AND DEGRADING SYSTEM OF NEGOTIATION, UNDER WHICH HAVE ADVANCED THE United States of America, under the dominion of the parties, and which their government prepared for the occupations of Texas. By treacherous overthrow of the existing treaties, which guaranteed the limits of the republic, and the independence of which I solemnly declare, on my DEPARTMENT WITH ITS OWN CONSTITUENCY.

The old governors, the officers, and the Mexican nation, which has been in existence hardly two years, have been forced by the ANNEXATION OF TEXAS TO THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, TO BE REGARDED AS THE VICTIM OF AN UNJUSTIFIABLE AGGRESSION, AND AN UNPARALLELED INSULT TO THE NATIONAL CHARACTER.

On the 16th of April, Gen. Ampudia recognized a state of war, in his letter concerning Col. Cross, in these terms:

"In regard to the matter which you refer to, I have to answer, to state that if Colonel Cross, quartermaster general of the troops under your command, had been found at any of the military posts subject to my order, he would have been held as a prisoner of war, headed with the usual forms of the law of nations according to the rules prescribed by the laws of humanity and usage, and consigned to the disposition of the general in command."

On 24th of April, General Arista arrived, assumed the command, and notified Gen. Taylor of the existence of war, and on the same day, giving the word and the blow at the same time, Captain Thornton and his command, was attacked and defeated, as the following dispatch will show.

"Headquarters Army of Observation, Camp near Matamoras, Texas, April 25, 1846.

"Sir: I have the honor to report to General Taylor that I crossed to Matamoras on the 29th instant, and encamped the 2d regiment of the Mexican troops. On the same day he published a proclamation, which was received in consequence; but upon the 30th I received information that a considerable force of Mexican troops had crossed the river, and encamped on the road, about nine miles above Matamoras. Upon this I marched to meet them, with the 2d regiment of dragoons, and the 2d regiment of artillery, commanding in person. Advance of the rights and interests of all Mexicans residing on the river, and caused said orders to be communicated to every one of the said detachments, known on the Rio Grande, Texas under the pain of death, if they attempted to cross the river, and I am proud to say that upon the movement of one regiment we contained the operations of the army. On receipt of the 30th, General Arista communicated to Mexican officers that the whole of the 29th, at the rate of 3,000 men, but was told that the force consisted of 1,700 men. The river it would be considered as a declaration of war. Upon my marching I found that I was not 60 miles from the said authorities of Matamoras, and that the enemy were about 40 miles from the same, and I encamped between the two, and the army was at once. Mexican was would begin. While this communication was in my hands, it was discovered that the village of Frontone had been evacuated and dragoons. I crossed the river with the 3d and ordered the detachment that they communication would be at once to the Mexican, to the Matamoras, which was done in a quarter of an hour. On reaching the town I had spoken with the high to apply to the commanding general of Matamoras, the expulsion of my force for consideration, and that, without any delay, to the use of the citizens of Matamoras the port of Brazos Santiago until the question of boundary should be definitively settled. This officer received for reply, from the officer stationed in front each time that he should not, the Rio Bravo was and was a veritable land war, and he was decidedly refused in intercourse with the American general in order to exchange of notice. Notwithstanding, these repeated assurances on the part of the Mexican authorities, and notwithstanding the most obviously hostile preparations on the right bank of the river, accompanied by a legal and unwarrantable force I forbade the crossing of the Rio Bravo, and ordered the same of peaceable men in the act of hostility, and I notified them with me. One relations remained in this state until I had the honor to receive your note of the 12th instant, in which you do me the honor to inform me of your intention to commence A. I could not undertake to retreat, and I must say candor I expected the commence on offensive, and not to all events, as you do me the honor to suggest. But, without meeting milder measures before proceeding to others, I contented myself, in the first instance, with ordering a blockade of the mouth of the Rio Grande, the result of these measures orders. A proceeding perfectly consistent with the rule of which I have referred to exist, and which I am sure you do not object to. I do not wish to trouble you, Colonel Cross. If the case was once again, as I have in mind that it was, I have been found upon me by the enemy, and I am [illegible]. I have to add that [illegible] keep back to any extent, and hold a number of [illegible] I should [illegible] effect unless under circumstances [illegible] the friendly [illegible] tion between the governments, or until war shall be formally declared by either; in which case I shall [illegible] measures [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DICKINSON presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying the establishment of a port of entry at Rouse's Point, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOWNS presented a petition of Henry Frechen and others, citizens of the Parish of Natchitoches, Louisiana, praying the confirmation of their titles to certain lands in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

POST ROUTE IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. ASHLEY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Road be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a Post Route from Powhatan on Lake Creek, Arkansas, via Walnut Bend, to Village Creek, in Greene county, in said State.

CLAIMS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Military Committee, to which has been referred the petition of John C. Fremont, and claim to California claims on the government of the United States, unauthorized and directed to take testimony, written and oral, in regard to said claims, and for that purpose to summon witnesses now in or near the City of Washington, and to obtain testimony, to send witnesses, and take the testimony in writing; and to settle the Committee leave to employ a Clerk.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. BREESE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire what legislation is necessary for the disposal of the lands lying upon the Illinois river, in the Military Bounty Land District, and to report by bill or otherwise.

MILITARY LANDS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. BREESE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate what sum of the public land lying in the State of Illinois has been granted by location or patent since the 1st day of January, 1840; the price at which they were sold by the United States; what quantity, and also the quantity relinquished to the United States, and if the information can be given, to what amount.

NEW GARDEN SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

On motion by Mr. MANGUM, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the monthly meeting of Friends, held at New Garden, Chester county, Pennsylvania, and that it lie on the table.

PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to repeal a part of the act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and to grant preemption rights," which was read and passed to the second reading.

DUTIES ON GOODS EXPORTED TO MEXICO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted on the 25th of January by Mr. MILLER, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether any duties have been levied and collected on any description of goods exported to Mexico since the commencement of the war between the United States and that country; and if so, what amount of duties has been thus collected, and under what authority the same have been levied and collected.

COUNTY LAND CLAIMS.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, the prior orders were postponed, to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to allow further time for satisfying claims for bounty lands for military services in the late war with Great Britain, and for other purposes.

Mr. RUSK moved to amend the bill by striking out in the 8th line of the 1st section, the words "in the war of the revolution or."

Mr. UNDERWOOD said, that having introduced the bill he would make a single remark in reference to this amendment. He did not know that there was any revolutionary soldiers' bounty claims for military bounty land were unsettled. In drafting the bill, however, he had inserted a provision for their benefit in case there should be any left. There were some nine hundred soldiers of the last war who had claims to bounty lands which were still unsatisfied. His friend on the right (Mr. RUSK,) had information from the proper department on the subject, and it might be that these were all the claims which were yet to be adjusted. He believed that the amendment had been submitted in order to remove the apprehensions of some friends over the way lest the bill might otherwise open the door to the unsatisfied Virginia military land warrants. The bill had nothing to do with that subject, which it did not at all look to or embrace. That subject would come up for consideration when he should report a bill, of the introduction of which he had given notice. He would again express the hope that the amendment would be withdrawn, lest there might be a single revolutionary soldier left who was entitled to military bounty land who could receive it only because his claims were manifest by the records of the Department, and who would be entitled only to one hundred acres of land if he should successfully establish his claim. It seemed to him, therefore, to be better to allow the clause in the bill to remain. It was inserted in former laws on the subject, and he did not see any necessity to strike it out in the bill now before the Senate. He added, that he deemed it proper to make this explanation without having any very decided feeling one way or the other with regard to the amendment.

Mr. RUSK said that the only object he had in view in offering the amendment was to obviate the objections raised the other day against the bill; that it might open the door to the claims of revolutionary soldiers. He did not know whether there were any such claims in existence. This was simply a renewal of the law which expired in July last. However, he presumed that there would be no difficulty after the explanation of the gentleman who had reported the bill, and therefore, he would not press the amendment.

Mr. PHELPS had designed to offer the same amendment which had been submitted by the Senator from Texas, and he hoped that it would not be withdrawn. If there were no revolutionary claims, as had been stated, he did not see the necessity for retaining the clause in the bill which the amendment proposed to strike out. It was useless, and therefore on the very supposition that there was no case to be provided for, the clause was clearly unnecessary.—But the bill, as he understood it, admitted of a construction which would allow a vast amount of those claims for land bounties, hitherto the subject of so much discussion in both branches of Congress. His objection to the bill was, that it admitted of a construction which would again open the door for all the Virginia claims. To avoid that construction, which it seemed was not contemplated by the gentleman who reported it, he would desire to see the amendment made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD hoped that the bill would be amended as was desired; but he assured the Senator from Vermont that if the bill were susceptible of the construction which he had described, former bills were liable to the same objection. Each renewal of the law had been open to the same objection. The Senator was mistaken on the subject. The bill as it stood only related to the bounties which it proposed to give to the officers and soldiers of the revolutionary army, upon the continental establishment, and had nothing whatever to do with the promise of bounties made by the legislature of Virginia. But lest any difficulty should arise from the retention of the clause to which objection was made, he hoped that the amendment would be agreed to, so that the bill might at once pass, and these nine hundred soldiers of the late war receive the bounties to which they were entitled.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That it be engrossed, and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act to regulate the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court in certain cases, and for other purposes," which had been returned from the House of Representatives with amendments.

Ordered, That it lie on the table, and that the amendments be printed.

ADDITIONAL EXAMINERS IN THE PATENT OFFICE.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to provide for additional examining clerks in the Patent Office, and for additional fees in certain cases.

Mr. LEWIS moved to amend the first section of the bill, by striking out all after the enacting clause thereof, and inserting the following:

That there shall be appointed, in the manner provided in the second section of the act, entitled "An act to promote the progress of useful arts, and to repeal all acts and part of acts heretofore made for that purpose," approved July fourth eighteen hundred and thirty six, two principal examiners, and two assistant examiners, in addition to the number of examiners now employed in the Patent Office; and that hereafter each of the principal examiners employed in the Patent Office shall receive an annual salary of twenty five hundred dollars, and each of the assistant examiners an annual salary of fifteen hundred dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That it be engrossed, and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act to provide additional examiners in the Patent Office, and for other purposes."

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

PRESIDENT PRO TEM.

The VICE PRESIDENT.—It is proper and respectful to the Senate that I should apprize them I will be necessarily absent for a few days, so that Senators may be prepared, on entering the Senate Chamber to-morrow morning, to elect a presiding officer.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

Mr. President: The President of the United States, approved and signed on the 20th ultimo, the joint resolution authorizing the erection, on the public grounds in the city of Washington, of a monument to George Washington; and the act exempting vessels employed by the American Colonization Society, in transporting colored emigrants from the United States to the coast of Africa, from the provisions of the act of the 22d February, and 2d of March, 1847, regulating the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I hope it will not be inferred from the array of books, with which I am surrounded, that I intend subjecting the Senate to the infliction of hearing them read. My only object in bringing them here is, to be enabled to respond at once to inquiries, if any shall be made, as to the authority upon which my statements of fact may be predicated. I shall state no fact for the accuracy of which I have not the most conclusive authority in the books before me. I regret that I did not conclude to participate in the discussion at a period sufficiently early, to have enabled me to make the requisite preparation. If I had done so, I should have been able to have compressed what I have to say, within a much smaller compass, and to have said it in a manner more satisfactory to myself, and more intelligible to the Senate. I had supposed that the only question presented by the bill, was to determine whether the additional force provided for, was necessary for the prosecution of the existing war, to a speedy and honorable termination. The war has been in progress nearly two years. Its legal existence was recognized on the 13th of May, 1846, and it existed in fact, prior to that time, as the official reports of the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca will show. The campaign of 1846, resulted in a series of the most brilliant victories that ever adorned the arms of any nation. States and territories were overrun and subjected, equal in extent to one half of the Mexican confederacy. California, New Mexico, Chihuahua, Coahuila, New Leon, and Tamaulipas, besides many important towns and cities, in other States, were reduced to our possession. The official reports of these conquests are to be found in the published documents of last session. The President of the United States, in his message at the beginning of that session, gave us a succinct history of the progress of our arms, in these several Mexican provinces, and suggested the propriety of "providing for the security of these important conquests, by making an adequate appropriation for the purpose of erecting fortifications, and defraying the expenses necessarily incident to the maintenance of our possession and authority over them." In the same message, he referred to the three million appropriation, which he had asked for at the previous session, and renewed the recommendation. He referred to the appropriations which were made in anticipation of the Louisiana and Florida treaties, as precedents in this case, and adds, that "it was in contemplation at the time those appropriations were made, to acquire Louisiana from France, and to purchase the Floridas from Spain, and that they were intended to be applied as a part of the consideration, which might be paid for those territories." Upon this exposition of the progress of the war, and of the policy of the government in reference to it, the President asked for more men and money, for the purpose of conducting a campaign into the very heart of Mexico—of reducing her capital—and of holding possession of the whole country, until she should accede to such terms of boundary and indemnity, as we should deem just and honorable. The men and money were freely voted, including the three million appropriation, which was intended to be applied in part payment—the first instalment for instance—for such territory as we might acquire from Mexico in a treaty of peace, in addition to what should be deemed adequate remuneration for the expenses of the war, and indemnity to our citizens. I shall excite no surprise, therefore, when I say that I was not prepared to hear this unqualified denunciation of the war and of the recommendations of the President for its vigorous prosecution—especially from those Senators who voted for all the war measures of last session, and the preceeding one. I was not prepared to hear them denounce the war as unjust, unnecessary and unconstitutional—much less as a war of conquest, of rapine, and robbery. We have heard these denunciations within the last few days poured forth from the lips of Senators with a solemnity that would seem to carry conviction, at least, to the minds of those who made them, that they were well merited; and what is more astonishing, we have heard them from Senators, who by their votes, if not their speeches, have sustained every war measure which has passed since hostilities first commenced by the act of Mexico. They now contend, not only that the war was unnecessary and unconstitutional, but that the President of the United States is the sole author of the iniquity. Do gentlemen suppose that they can throw the responsibility of their own acts upon the President of the United States? Do they imagine that they can make the people believe that the Executive is alone responsible for all the consequences that may flow from the faithful execution of the laws which they enact, and under the constitution, compel him to execute? If it be a war of iniquity and injustice, you are the transgressors! If it be a war of robbery, you are the robbers! If it be a war against and in violation of the constitution, yours is the treason! You voted for it under the solemnity of your oaths. You voted the men and the money. You voted to recognise the legal and constitutional existence of the war. You helped to pass the law, and made it the sworn duty of the President to see it faithfully executed. It is your war as much as his and ours; and you will not be permitted to escape your share of its responsibility, while you participate in the credit which you claim from having given it your support. I do not intend to cast any unkind reflections upon any Senator, but I do think, that I am fully justified by the record in the observations which I have just made. It would seem that a great discovery has recently been made—that the Congress of the United States has been acting under an entire misapprehension in regard to the nature and character of this war. We are now told that the President has changed his ground, and now assigns causes and reasons totally different and inconsistent with those which he gave at the last and preceding sessions—that the causes then were: "that American blood have been shed upon American soil"—the reasons now given for its prosecution, are, "indemnity for the past and security for the future." The Senator from Delaware has made these two extracts from the President's messages the subject of much mirth and wit. He has told us that indemnity for the past, means one-half of Mexico, and security for the future, the other half. Conceived by this wonderful discovery that his efficient support of this war has been yielded under a fatal delusion as to its true character and objects, he feels constrained, now that he has recovered his mental vision, to make atonement for the past by withholding supplies in future. I cannot concede that there has been any change in the line of policy originally announced by the Executive and supported by his friends on this subject. We stand where we then stood. The causes and the objects of the war remain unchanged. They were then, and are now, comprised in the two brief extracts which have been so frequently quoted—"American blood has been shed upon American soil;" "Indemnity for the past, and security for the future."

In the President's message of the 11th of May, '46, in pursuance of which the original act recognizing the existance of a state of war was passed, he referred to "the grievous wrongs perpetrated by Mexicans upon our citizens, throughout a long period of years, remaining unredressed"—"solemn treaties pledging her public faith for this redress, having been disregarded"—"our commerce with Mexico having been almost annihilated—our merchants having been deterred from prosecuting it by the system of outrage and extortion which the Mexican authorities have pursued against them, while their appeals, through their own government, for indemnity have been made in vain."

These outrages upon our flag and citizens had been so enormous, that General Jackson, during his Presidential term, felt himself constrained to call the attention of Congress to them in a special message, and to express his decided opinion that they were sufficient, at that time, to justify immediate war. They continued with renewed insult and injury under Mr. Van Buren's administration, and he, too, expressed similar opinions to Congress upon the subject. The appropriate committees of both Houses of Congress, as near as I now recollect, made reports in which they fully concurred with the Executives in the opinions they had expressed as to the nature and extent of the outrages, and the justice of the remedy suggested. Congress allowed their sympathy for the weakness and degradation of a nominal sister republic to prevail over their sense of duty to the citizens and the [illegible] country. Had we acted with the promptness with [illegible] the British and French governments [illegible] we would have taught Mexico a lesson [illegible] would have deterred her from [illegible] country, and saved us the precious blood and treasure which have been so freely poured out in this war. The [illegible] of the French fleet upon Vera Cruz, and the capture of the famous Castle of San Juan de Ulloa for some of these very outrages committed indiscriminately upon British and American citizens, are familiar to the Senate. We all remember that the summary and effective action were forthcoming on the [illegible] of the French Admiral England, whose conduct [illegible] was marked in contrast with those of France and Great Britain. He did not [illegible] accompanied with the notice, that if it was not promptly responded to, her fleet would immediately sail from the Jamaica station. The money was paid, because the demand was made in a tone that Mexico could understand. America spoke, as one sister would speak to another, in a voice of kindness and sisterly affection, but it fell upon Mexican ears as an unknown tongue. Mexico, mistaking our magnanimity for pusillanimity, treated our complaints with contempt and our remonstrances with silence.

The President of the United States, in the message to which I have referred, spoke of these things as just ground of complaint and indemnity, but not as the causes of the existing war. For he informed us that the war existed by the act of Mexico—that the Mexican army had "invaded our territory, and shed American blood upon American soil." The precise spot [illegible] stated that the locality is well known to have been on the left bank of the Rio Grande, opposite, and not far from, Matamoras. Then and there the war actually commenced, the Mexican army making the attack—the commanding-general having, on the morning of the same day, given notice to General Taylor that "the considered hostilities commenced, and should prosecute them." This was on the 24th of April, 1846. The battle of Palo Alvorez [illegible] the 8th and Resaca de la Palma on the 9th of May. Congress [illegible] the existence of the war, and placed at the disposal of the President ten millions of money and fifty thousand volunteers, besides the army, the navy, and the militia of the United States, for its vigorous prosecution. The law passed almost unanimously, there being only fourteen dissenting voices in the House, and two in the Senate. If the war is unconstitutional now I suppose it was equally so then—and if it was unconstitutional then, it must necessarily be so now, unless that law legalized it, or (if I may be allowed to invent a more impressive term,) constitutionalized it. In either event, Congress sanctioned it by a vote almost unanimous, irrespective of party distinctions; and confirmed it by furnishing men and means to an almost unlimited extent. I now submit it to the consciences, as well as the patriotism, of Senators, who voted for that law, if they are not estoped from saying that the war is either unjust, unnecessary, or unconstitutional? But, I will return to the recently made discovery, that the President has changed his grounds in regard to the causes of the war, and the objects for prosecuting it. I have shown that the causes which produced it remain unchanged, and that the President set forth the insults to our flag, and the injuries to our commerce and citizens, as grievances to be redressed, in the message to which the act of the 13th of May, 1846, was a patriotic response. I now wish to invite the attention of the Senate—especially those Senators who have hitherto supported the war, and now oppose it upon the ground that the President has recently shifted positions by setting up a claim for indemnity—to the following extracts from a document which was sent to General Taylor from the War Department on the 13th of June, 1846, and by him promulgated to the Mexican people:

> A Proclamation by the General commanding the Army of the United States of America, to the people of Mexico:
>
> [illegible]
>
> [illegible]
>
> [illegible]
>
> [illegible]

The rebuke [illegible] which [illegible] Senator from Delaware from his propriety, if not his duty, [illegible] found in the President's late message, have converted the Senator from a time-tried [illegible] opponent of the war upon the ground that they furnish evidence of a change of policy on the part of the Executive! If indemnity for the past means one-half of Mexico, and security for the future the other half, why did not the Senator then see as clearly as he now sees, that it was the object of General Taylor as well as the President, to conquer and hold the whole of Mexico? Why did he not then, as well as now, denounce the war as a stupendous system of injustice and robbery?

Again, sir, it will be remembered, as I have already remarked, that the official reports, containing the detailed history of our conquests in California, New Mexico, Coahuila, New Leon, Tamaulipas and Tobasco, were before us at the last session of Congress. We also had before us at the same time the voluminous correspondence between the Departments of War and Navy, and our generals and commodores, commanding our armies and navies in Mexico, and upon her coast. The Senator from North Carolina, who favored the Senate with his views a few days ago, quoted largely from that correspondence, as published in the documents of the last Congress, to show that the President designed from the beginning to conquer and hold a large portion of the territory of Mexico. He felicitated himself that he had established this position beyond all controversy, by extracts from the instructions of the Navy Department to Commodores Connor, Sloat and Stockton, and from the War Department to Generals Taylor and Kearny. Indeed, all the arguments upon which Senators rely to prove that this is a war of conquest and robbery, repugnant to the genius, and fatal to the permanence of our institutions, are founded upon information communicated at the last session, and which was, or ought to have been, as familiar to them then as now. Besides, it was the fact that the President, at the opening of the last session, renewed his recommendation of the three million bill, with the distinct intimation that it was intended as the first instalment, in part payment of whatever territory we might acquire from Mexico by a treaty of peace and limits, after deducting all claims for indemnity—was sufficient notice that the Executive did, at that time, contemplate a cession of territory by Mexico, to the value of three millions of dollars at least, over and above the indemnity for injuries to our citizens, and the expenses of the war. Thus, with a full knowledge of the origin and history of the war—of the extent of our conquests and the line of policy in reference to its further prosecution, the war bills of the last session were passed, making liberal provision in men and means, not only for holding what we had conquered, but for making new conquests in the very heart of Mexico. These bills received the cordial and powerful support of Senators, who now tell us that we ought to withhold all further supplies, because the President has changed his whole policy and converted it into a war of conquest.

Sir, I do not understand that it is, or at any time has been, a war of conquest, in the proper sense of that term, much less a war of robbery. It is a war of self-defence, forced upon us by our enemy, and prosecuted on our part in vindication of our honor and the integrity of our territory. The enemy invaded our territory and we repelled the invasion, and demanded satisfaction for all our grievances. In order to compel Mexico to do us justice, it was necessary to follow her retreating armies into her territory, and take possession of State after State, and hold them until she would yield to our reasonable demands; and inasmuch as it was certain that she was unable to make indemnity in money, we must necessarily take it in land. Conquest was not the motive for the prosecution of the war—satisfaction, indemnity, security was the motive—conquest and territory the means.

Mr. President, I cannot dwell longer on the inconsistencies in which gentlemen on the opposite side involve themselves. I have already dwelt too long on these preliminary questions. I must proceed at once to the main point of my argument. I propose to examine the question, whether, on the 24th of May, 1846 American blood was shed on American soil, by the Mexican army. That the Mexican forces crossed the Rio Grande on that day—attacked and killed American soldiers stationed on the left bank, is conceded. But it is denied that the left bank of that river was American soil, or in other words, that the Rio Grande was the boundary line between Mexico and the United States, after the admission of Texas into the Union. It is my present purpose to establish the affirmative of this proposition.

I will premise, that, in my judgment, a radical error has generally obtained in regard to the character of the revolution which resulted in the establishment of the Republic of Texas. It seems to have been generally supposed that Texas rebelled against the constitutional authorities of Mexico, and, by means of a successful revolution, established her independence. No such thing. Texas never rebelled—never revolted. Precisely the reverse was the fact. A few military leaders, with Santa Anna at their head, conspired and rebelled against the Republic of Mexico—seized the reigns of government—abolished the Federal Constitution and the State governments—and established a military despotism in their stead. That rebellion, which commenced in the city of Mexico, assumed the dignity of a successful revolution, and by the aid of the army extended its power from state to state, until it had reduced to subjection, all that portion of the Republic of Mexico which lies to the south and west of the Rio Grande. That the people on this side of the Rio Grande took up arms in defence of the constitutional government of the Republic of Mexico—sustained federal—maintained their authority, and limited and confined the power of the revolutionary government to the right bank of that river. To show that I am clearly right in this position, it will be necessary for me to refer somewhat in detail to the most prominent facts connected with the history of Texas, as well as the revolution which lead to the establishment of that republic. From the date of the Louisiana treaty in 1803, to that of the Florida treaty in 1819, this government uniformly claimed the Rio Grande as the western boundary of the United States. In 1805, Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney declared to the Spanish Minister, that the United States considered their title to the Rio Grande as complete, under the Louisiana treaty, as to the island of New Orleans. A-later as 1818, Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, under Mr. Monroe, after carefully reviewing all the evidences of title, relating to the land to all the military records, maps, and geographical France and Spain, as well as England, affirmed the proposition that our title was as good to the Rio Grande, as to the island of New Orleans. In the meantime, and before the conclusion of the treaty between the Sabine and the Rio Grande to Spain by the Florida treaty, many American citizens had emigrated to that territory, in the full confidence that the government of the United States intended to maintain its claim to the country, and that they would be protected in the enjoyment of their rights as American citizens. When they found themselves abandoned by their own government, and by a treaty, stipulation converted into the degraded subjects of a foreign Prince, they instantly raised the standard of rebellion, protested against the ratification of the treaty, and proclaimed their firm resolve, in case it should be ratified, to free themselves by force of arms from Spanish dominion. The treaty was finally ratified in 1821, and the same year these Americans in Texas joined the Mexicans in a revolt, the object of which was to throw off the Spanish yoke and establish for themselves a republican government similar to our own. The revolution was successful, and on the 4th day of October, 1824, the federal constitution of the republic of Mexico was adopted. During the revolution a provisional government had been established for the purpose of affording protection to the inhabitants, and giving energy and proper direction to their patriotic efforts in behalf of freedom. By an act of this provisional government Texas, with her own consent, had been temporarily united with the province of Coahuila, with this limitation, "until Texas possesses the necessary elements to prove a separate state of herself." In 1820, after the Florida treaty had been signed, and before the revolution broke out, Moses Austin had proceeded from the Spanish authorities a grant of land upon which he was authorized to locate a colony of emigrants. He having died before the conditions of the grant could be complied with, his son Stephen F. Austin, procured its renewal and confirmation by the revolutionary authorities the next year, and proceeded to establish his colony under the protection of the provisional government. I have called the attention of the Senate to these facts, for the purpose of showing that the early American settlers in Texas were not a lawless band of intruders, who had forced their way into the country, in defiance of the laws and constitutional authorities. With the same view I will read the first section of the colonization law of the State of Coahuila and Texas, passed March 24th, 1825:

All foreigners who, in virtue of the general law of the 18th of last month, [meaning the colony of the state of Coahuila and Texas] may come to settle in this State, who have resided for the term of six consecutive years within the territory of the United Mexican States, and who may have obtained letters of naturalization, according to the decree of the General Congress of the 14th of February, 1823, and the State decree of the 6th of August, 1824, shall be considered citizens of this State.

Yes, sir, the State of Coahuila and Texas, in pursuance of the colonization law of the federal government, "invites" and "calls foreigners to come and settle within its limits. She went further, and offered large tracts of land as inducements to come, and conferred all the rights and privileges of citizenship upon every emigrant who might respond to the call. On the 11th day of March, 1827, the constitution of the State of Coahuila and Texas was adopted. It had been formed, in conformity with the federal constitution, and in pursuance of an act of the federal Congress. This state constitution, and the constitution of the republic, may be considered as the articles of compact—the bond of union—between the State and the confederation. They contain the terms and the conditions upon which the State of Coahuila and Texas constituted a member of the confederacy. I have these two instruments before me, and will invite the attention of the Senate to the first five articles of the constitution of the State of Coahuila and Texas:

Art. 1. The union of Coahuila and Texas is the name of the State.

Art. 2. Its limits, and corresponding sovereignty, are those marked out by the [illegible] and congress of the United Mexican States.

Art. 3. The integrity of the State and its sovereignty, as well as the independence of the United Mexican States, and of every other power and dominion whatsoever, shall be maintained by the inhabitants of Coahuila and Texas, who are bound to defend them with their arms, and to observe the laws and the acts of sovereignty that those pointed out in the constitution, and in the form which it points.

Art. 4. In all the territory of the United Mexican States, the inhabitants of Coahuila and Texas are bound to render obedience to the constitution and to the laws and decrees of the general congress, and to the constitution and laws of the State, and to the orders and decrees of the authorities established by the one and by the other, in the exercise of their respective functions, without any other qualifications than those which the law establishes.

Art. 5. Wherefore, the right of establishing it, fundamental laws through the medium of its representatives, in conformity to the basis established in the constitutive act and general constitution, belongs exclusively to the said State.

These were the conditions upon which the Texans became citizens of the Mexican confederacy, and were the terms alone upon which they could be required or expected to continue such. They had been invited and called there, through the colonization laws, with the guaranty that they should be protected in the enjoyment of all their rights as citizens, agreeably to the forms of the constitution. They were "free and independent of the other Mexican United States, and of every other power and dominion whatsoever." They continued true and law-abiding citizens—faithful to the Constitution of the State and the Confederation until their seat of government was invaded about the 1st of June, 1835, by a revolutionary army from the city of Mexico—a portion of the members of the legislature, which was then in session, captured and imprisoned, and the rest compelled to save their lives by flight and seek a place of refuge on this side of the Rio Grande. The inhabitants between that river and the Sabine instantly took up arms in defence of their liberties and republican institutions; and for the purpose of checking the progress of the invading revolutionary army. For the purpose of concentrating their forces and giving energy and a proper direction to their patriotic efforts, they assembled in Convention on the 3d of November, 1835, and after making a "solemn declaration" of the causes which had compelled them to take up arms, proceeded to organize a provisional government. I will read the first and the concluding paragraphs of this declaration:

Declaration of the People of Texas in General Convention assembled.

When General Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna and other military leaders, at the head of a victorious army, overthrew the General Institutions of Mexico and destroyed the federal system, texas expected that Texas and therefore the State of the Mexican Confederacy; now, the good people of Texas, availing themselve of their natural rights,

SOLEMNLY DECLARE:

1st. That they have taken up arms in defence of their rights and liberties which the constitution of the United States of 1824 and the laws and decrees of the rights from principles from the Federal Constitution of Mexico.

[illegible] Government, a military despotism, has deliberately determined to annihilate them; and should we patiently submit to such an accumulation of evils, we would be unworthy of liberty.

Now, sir, I propose to invite the attention of the Senate to the state of things then existing in the city of Mexico, and to trace the causes which had rendered it necessary for the Texans to take up arms in defence of the constitution and liberties of the republic of Mexico, which were in danger of being overthrown by military despots. In 1834, Santa Anna, who had been elevated to the Presidency by the military power (deposing Bustamente, the acting President, who had become very obnoxious to the people,) and had subsequently been confirmed in his seat by a popular election, proceeded to execute the design he had formed of subverting the constitutional government of Mexico and of establishing a military despotism in its place. In May of that year he dissolved the constitutional Congress by a military order, and at the same time by a similar order abolished the "council of government." This council was composed of one Senator from each State, and was required, by the Constitution, to remain in session during the recess of Congress—to act as the advisers of the President of the Republic, and "to see that the Constitution is strictly observed." The council of government was invested with various other powers and duties, which will be found in the fifth section of the Constitution of 1824, which I hold in my hand, and would invite the attention of Senators to 113th and 116th articles, but will not take the time to read them.*

I will here read a short extract from Mrs. Holley's Texas, to show how these changes in the government were effected, and a new congress assembled:

The constitutional general congress of 1834 was thus accidentally republican and federal was dissolved in May of that year by a military order of the President before its constitutional term had expired. The council of government of half the Senate which, according to the constitution, ought to have been called by the President during the session of Congress, was also dissolved; and a new revolutionary and unconstitutional Congress was convened by another military order of the President. This Congress met on the 23d January, 1835."

One of the first acts, if not the very first, of the new congress, was to depose the constitutional vice president, Gomez Farias, and to substitute in his place General Barragan, one of Santa Anna's co-conspirators. The next act of this revolutionary congress, is thus stated by Mrs. Holley:

It would be a waste of time to enter into the details of the proceedings of this congress. It annulled the constitution of 1824, and established in its stead a consolidated government. In accordance with these views, it passed a decree abolishing the federal constitution and [illegible] and established a centralized government.

I also hold in my hand another work—"a history of South America and Mexico," by a distinguished member of this body, in which the facts of this revolution are recorded with great clearness and precision. I read from Niles' History of Mexico:

"Pronunciamentos were again resorted to; these were now made to favor centralism, and on the strength of these resolutions of town meetings, manufactured by order of the military commandants, Congress proceeded to [illegible] constitution of 1824, and to establish THE SAME IMBECILE THE STATE GOVERNMENTS AND ESTABLISHMENTS."

I will read another paragraph to show the precautions, which were taken by the usurpers, to coerce the acquiescence of the people in the military despotism which they were about to establish on the ruins of the republican system:

Section 5th. [illegible] Congress.

113. During the recess of Congress there shall be council of Government, composed of one half of the members of the Senate, one for each State.

116. The attributes of this council are the following:—1st, to meet at the Congress assembled, and the constitutional act, and [illegible] and to give their advice in any incident relative to these objects. Second, to lay before the President any observations conducive for the better compliance of the Constitution and laws of the Union. Third, to determine of themselves only, the advice of the President, the calling of extraordinary sessions of Congress, but in either, it shall require the [illegible] Fourth, to grant their consent to the calling out of the local militia, in the manner stated in Article 110, attribution 11. Fifth, to approve the appointment of officers designated in attribution 6, Article 110. Sixth, to give their consent in the case referred to in Article 112, restriction first. Seventh, to name two individuals who shall [illegible] Eighth, to administer the oath stated in Article 101, to those individuals of the Supreme executive Power, in the term provided in this Constitution. Ninth, to give their opinion on subjects referred to them by the President, by virtue of the 21st faculty of Article 110, and all business of a grave or urgent character.

Scouting all opposition having been exhibited to carry out the [illegible] act of Congress, levelling the whole structure of their own government, and annihilating the very name of state sovereignty, and merging the [illegible] entire [illegible] and consolidated form of government [illegible] established in each state, under the command of the new functionaries [illegible] ed by the President.

The decree for the establishment of the new government bears date the 3d of October, '35, and is framed upon the principles I have for its basis." I have no less than three other decrees before me, in which the same transactions are recorded, and all agree on every material point. I will read from them at any Senator shall desire it. The presence of the military kept the people in subjection, and the revolution was complete so far as the Capital was concerned. Its power extended in every direction. State after State submitted unconditionally before the march of the revolutionary army, until it took up its position on the [illegible] of Zacatecas. Here, for the first time, it met with formidable opposition. Alvarez, the republican Governor of that State, had raised an army of five thousand men, and awaited the approach of the revolutionists for the purpose of deciding the fate of the republic, its constitution and liberties, by the wager of battle. Santa Anna, who commanded his troops in person, knew too well the character of these stern republicans to hazard his life and fortunes upon the issue of an engagement with them. They had fought with him and bled under him in achieving the liberties of the country; they had been his main reliance in many a hard fought battle in resisting the encroachments of despotism—they had been instrumental in his elevation to the Presidency under the conviction, that he, who had contributed so much to achieve, would exert himself to preserve their liberties. He feared, as well he might, a trial of strength with such men in such a cause. In this emergency he resorted to his usual resources—stratagem. Several of his most reliable officers in the revolutionary army deserted their posts, effected their escape, and joined the patriots with the avowed purpose of fighting in defence of the constitution. They tendered their services to command the patriot army, and unfortunately the offer was accepted. They marched the Zacatecans out to meet the enemy, and placed them in a position where Santa Anna surrounded and murdered more than one-half of them before the rest were aware of the treachery of their officers. The slaughter was indiscriminate, and continued for two entire days. It was not confined to those who bore arms. The streets of the city of Zacatecas were deluged in blood. The unoffending citizens shared the fate of those who had engaged in battle. Even foreigners, who had taken no part in the contest, were not permitted to escape the general massacre.

Those who survived, now submitted unconditionally to the power of the usurper, and no further resistence ensued. The revolutionary army now turned its course towards Monclova, the seat of government for the State of Coahuila and Texas, for the purpose of chastising the Coahuiltexanos for their obstinacy in adhering to the republican constitution: The legislature of that State had solemnly protested against those revolutionary movements, and announced its determination to sustain and enforce the constitution and form of government, which all were sworn to support. For this offence General Cos, the brother-in-law of Santa Anna, dispersed the legislature by military force, captured and imprisoned a portion of the members, while the others only saved themselves by fleeing across the Rio Grande. The Senate will pardon me for reading a single paragraph on this point from the report of Gen. Austin to the Texas Convention, on the 30th of November of that year:

"The constitutional authorities of the State of Coahuila and Texas assembled at Saltillo, on the change of government of the whole sect which were entirely subdued, Gen. Cos [illegible] and imprisoned. The people of Texas expected a similar fate if such a [illegible] as he should have landed by the government at Mexico.

Prior to the capture of Monclova, and in anticipation of such an event, the legislature had authorized Governor Viesca to remove the archives of State, and convene the representatives of the people at such point on this side of the Rio Grande as he should designate; General Cos pursued and captured the governor and archives, together with the gallant Colonel Milam, who afterwards fell so gloriously while storming San Antonio, and threw them into prison. At this period the actual war commenced between the republicans on this side of the Rio Grande, and the revolutionists from the other side. The former fighting in defence of their State and federal constitutions, and the latter for their total overthrow. There is no room for controversy as to the causes of that war, and the objects to be attained by the triumph of the one party or the other. It was a direct issue between constitutional republicanism and military despotism. The revolution had already been successful to the right bank of the Rio Grande, and its victorious arms were now preparing for new conquests on this side of that river. The republicans instantly seized their arms and attacked the garrisons, which the usurper had taken the precaution to station at various points for the purpose of overawing the people and holding them in subjection to the new government, which he was about to establish. All their early efforts were crowned with success. Victory perched upon their banners at every point. Gonzales, Conception, Goliad, San Patrick, and finally San Antonio—all surrendered to the republicans before Christmas. While these important movements were being enacted in the field, the republicans had not been unmindful of the necessity of establishing a provisional government, to combine and consolidate their resources and give force and direction to their efforts. After the capture and imprisonment of Governor Viesca, who had been authorized by the legislature to assemble the representatives of the people at such point as he should designate, they were left to select their own time and place of meeting. They did assemble at San Philipp de Austin on the 3d day of November, 1835, and put forth the "solemn declaration," to which I have already called the attention of the Senate, and proceeded to form a provissional government. In that declaration, it should be born in mind, they state distinctly that they had taken up arms in defence of the republican principles of the constitution of 1824. The revolutionary army, under General Cos, had passed the Rio Grande and marched upon San Antonio, and a republican army was immediately organized and sent to repel the invaders. I will not weary the Senate with the details of the movements on the plains of San Antonio. The gallant conduct of the heroic Milam, in leading the storming party into the very heart of the city, and his fall, just as victory was within his grasp, have commanded the admiration and sympathy of his countrymen. The next in command finished the work which had been so gloriously commenced, and General Cos and his entire army became prisoners of war to the republicans. I hold in my hand the terms of capitulation entered into on the 11th of December, '35, and invite the especial attenion of Senators to the articles which I shall read:

"Capitulation

"General-in-chief General Martin Perfecto de Cos, and his Permanent troops and General-in-chief Ben. Rush, and the Permanent troops of Texas.

"1st. That General Cos and his officers retire with their arms and private property, only by a pledge of honor not to take up the same at present time, that he will not in any way oppose the [illegible] federal constitution of 1824.

"2d. That the general with the convicts [illegible] in Col. Ugartechea [illegible] Rio Grande.

[illegible]

"11th. General Rush moved from Gonzales to the with such provisions as may be obtained necessary for the troops to the Rio Grande, of the northern point of the country."

Such was the fate of the first revolutionary army that invaded Texas. Defeated, captured, and dependent upon the generosity of the Texans for provisions to enable them to return to their own country. But there are two important points in these articles of capitulation which we should constantly bear in mind, while discussing the boundary of the Rio Grande. The first is, that Gen. Cos and his army were released upon the condition "that they will not in any way oppose the re-establishment of the federal constitution of 1824;" and secondly, that they should retire into the interior of the Mexican republic, taking with them the convicts "beyond the Rio Grande," being furnished with supplies by Gen. Burleston to that river. The preliminary conditions were complied with on both sides, and here ended the first Mexican campaign into Texas. There was not a Mexican garrison nor a Mexican soldier left on this side of the Rio Grande. One campaign had placed the whole country in the acknowledged and undisputed possession of the Texans. The withdrawal of the enemies troops gave the Texans time for deliberation—to devise and establish for themselves a more perfect government. On the 2d day of March, 1836, they adopted "the unanimous declaration of independence;" and on the 17th of the same month, they signed and published the constitution which I hold in my hand. It is the "constitution of the republic of Texas" which on all essential points conforms to the principles of the Mexican constitution of 1824, and our own free institutions. By looking over the signatures to this constitution, as well as the declaration of independence which preceded it, I find an important fact, which may throw some light on the question of boundary. From the municipality or county of Bexar, I find the following names, viz., Francisco Rouis, Antonio Navarro, J. B. Budgett. From the municipality or county of San Patricio, are the names of John Turner, B. B. Goodrich, Jesse Grimes, J. G. Swisher, G. W. Burnett. Now, sir, by reference to Mitchell's map, which I have before me, I find these municipalities or counties laid down as extending from the Neuces to the Rio Grande; and in Mrs. Holley's Texas, I find a very interesting account of the town of San Patrick, on the west side of the Neuces, and which, I understand, was the seat of justice of the county of San Patricio, until it was removed to Corpus Christi, by the act of the 18th of January, 1839.

I will read Mrs. Holley's description of San Patrick, written in the year 1836:

"San Patrick. [illegible] on both sides of the Neuces, [illegible] McMullen and McGloin, and on the road leading from Goliad to Matamoras, have settled here, at the mouth of [illegible] creeks, and have [illegible] at prospective points and eligible situations. [illegible] the county is the great object of the Empresarios with [illegible] The [illegible] commenced [illegible] on the 24th October, 1834.

I shall have occasion, before I close my remarks, to refer to the various acts of the Texan Congress, fixing the times of holding courts in the counties of San Patricio and Bexar, and especially the act of the 24th of May, 1838, establishing the dividing line between them. I will here content myself with the remark, that by that act, the boundary was declared to be a direct line from a certain point on the Rio Frio, thirty miles above its junction with the Nueces, to the town of Larredo, on the left bank of the Rio Grande. I am not now discussing the question, as to the boundaries of the department, called Bexar or Texas, under the Spanish government, or during the revolutionary struggle of the Mexican people for independence—much less the idle and useless question, as to the imaginary boundary, during the period that Texas and Coahuila constituted one state in Mexican confederacy. I care not whether Coahuila and Tamaulipas were supposed to have the oretical possessions on this side of the Rio Grande, prior to the overthrow of the federal constitution of 1824. If they had such possessions, they lost them when they lost their state sovereignty, by acquiescing in the revolution, and submitting to the degradation of becoming a mere department, in Santa Anna's military despotism, with their diminished and curtailed limits. By that act of submission, they forfeited all right to require their fellow-citizens on this side of the Rio Grande, to become co-sufferers in their degradation. The bond of union was dissolved by their own act, and by their wrong, and the people on this side, in the counties of San Patricio and Bexar had a right to be represented, as they were represented in the convention, which proclaimed the independence and formed the constitution of the republic of Texas. The question now to be determined is, what were the boundaries of the Republic, not the department of Texas. I have shown that the first invading army had been captured, and sent beyond the Rio Grande, and, that on the first day of January 1836, there was not a Mexican soldier on this side of that river. While the Texans were engaged in improving and remodeling their civil institutions, Santa Anna was preparing, and organizing a new army of invasion. He crossed the Rio Grande, and entered the settlements of Texas with two invading columns—the one in the direction of San Antonio, and the other upon Goliad. The slaughter of Travis, and his fellow patriots in the Alamo, and the murder of Fannin, and his entire command at Goliad, after they had entered into a capitulation, and become prisoners of war, foreshadowed the fate of all who might fall into the hands of the Dictator. The work of destruction continued, with fire and sword, until the two hostile armies met on the banks of the San Jacinto. There, on the 21st of April, 1836, the gallant little Texan army, under the command of the distinguished Senator before me, literally annihilated the Mexican forces, leaving more than one-half of them dead upon the field, and capturing the rest, not allowing even one to escape to tell the tale of the terrible retribution which the god of battles had inflicted upon them for their merciless crimes. The murderer of Fannin and his men was now a captive pleading for his life at the hands of the Texan general. The generals of the two armies, and the Executives of the two nations, (for such they were now acknowledged to be,) immediately opened negotiations for a treaty of peace, independence, and boundaries. At length, on the 12th of May, 1836, the treaty was signed by President Burnett and his cabinet, on the part of the Republic of Texas, and General Santa Anna on the part of Mexico. The capitulation shows who were the parties to this treaty. I will read it:

"Articles of agreement and solemn compact made and adopted by Ernest C. Burnet President of the Republic of Texas, and the undersigned members of the cabinet thereof, on the one part, and Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, President of the Republic of Mexico, and Don Vincente Filisola, General of Division, Don José Urea, Don Joaquim Ramirez y Sesma, and Don Antonio Gaona, Generals of Brigades of the armie of Mexico."

After a preamble the first article proceeds as follows?

"Therefore, it is agreed by the President Santa Anna, and the Generals Don Vincente Filisola, Don José Urea, Don Joaquim Ramirez y Sesma, and Don Antonio Gaona, 1st. That the armies of Mexico shall, with all practicable expedition, evacuate the territory of Texas, and retire to Monterey, beyond the Rio Grande."

The second article provides that the Mexican army "shall abstain from all pillage and devastation" on their retreat. I will invite especial attention to the third, and a part of the fourth articles, as follows:

"3d. That the army of Texas are to march westwardly, and to occupy such post as the commanding general may think proper, on the east side of the Rio Grande or Rio Bravo del Norte.

"4th. That the President Santa Anna, in his official character as chief of the Mexican nation, and the Generals Don Vincente Filisola, Don José Urea, Don Joaquim Ramirez y Sesma, and Don Antonio Gaona, as chiefs of armies, do solemnly acknowledge, sanction, and ratify, the full, entire, and perfect Independence of the Republic of Texas, with such boundaries as are hereafter set forth and agreed upon by the same."

The fifth article prescribes the boundaries of the Republic of Texas. I will read so much as relates to the south-western boundary:

"5th. That the following be, and the same are hereby established and made the lines of demarcation between the two Republics of Mexico and Texas, to wit: The line shall commence at the estuary or mouth of the Rio Grande, on the western bank thereof, and shall pursue the same bank of the said river, to the point where the river assumes the name of the Rio Bravo del Norte, from which point it shall proceed on the said western bank to the head waters, or source of said river, it being understood that the terms Rio Grande and Rio Bravo del Norte, apply to and designate one and the same stream."

The sixth and seventh articles relate to the release of prisoners and the restoration to Texas of all fortresses, artillery, and munitions of war, within her limits.

In article eighth Texas undertakes, in consideration of the foregoing provisions, to spare the life of Santa Anna and his officers, and to restore them to their liberty.

Article ninth is as follows:

"9th. The release of the President Santa Anna shall be made immediately, on receiving the signatures of Generals Don Vincente Filisola, Don José Urea, Don Joaquim Ramirez y Sesma, and Don Antonio Gaona, to this agreement, and his conveyance to Vera Cruz as soon afterwards as may be convenient."

It will be borne in mind that the generals named in the ninth article were not prisoners, and that after the capture of Santa Anna, General Filasola succeeded to his powers as commander-in-chief of the Mexican army. The remaining articles relate to the mode in which these were to be executed. General Filesola and the other officers named in the ninth article, did subsequently sign and ratify this treaty, and in pursuance of it were permitted to retire, with the forces under their command, in peace and security beyond the Rio Grande. Here ends the history of the second invasion of Texas by Mexico. Like the first, it resulted in the total annihilation of the invading army—its defeat and capture. Texas was now free and independent, without a hostile foot upon her soil. There was not a Mexican soldier to be found on this side of the Rio Grande. Those who survived the battle of San Jacinto and returned to their own country, did so by the permission of the Texan army, and under the sanctity of a treaty stipulation that the Rio Grande should forever remain the line of "demarkation between the two Republics of Mexico and Texas." It does seem to me that I might stop here, with safety, and rest the question of the boundary of the Rio Grande upon the incontrovertible facts which I have brought to the notice of the Senate. But, sir, I am well aware that, while no Senator will controvert the truth of any one material fact which I have stated, or the fairness and impartiality with which all my facts have been presented, yet it will be said that the treaty to which I have alluded was not binding upon the Mexican nation, because Santa Anna was a prisoner of war, in captivity, at the time of its execution. I do not deem it necessary to make an argument on this point, so far as Santa Anna is himself concerned; for it can make no difference with the result. General Filsoela, and the other generals who subsequently signed and ratified that treaty in conjunction with him, were not prisoners of war—were not in duress or captivity when they executed it. They were at the head of their respective commands, in the full enjoyment of all their faculties, and the free exercise of all their rights, when they signed and ratified the instrument. They acted upon their own judgments and of their own volition, and make no pretext of duress or coercion. If, then, the captivity of Santa Anna deprived him of the faculties of volition and action, Filasola succeeded to his position of commander-in-chief of the army, and was duly invested with all the powers of which he had been deprived. But, sir, I cannot concede that the acts of Santa Anna were not binding upon himself and his government. We must bear in mind that the government of Mexico at that time was a military despotism, erected upon the ruins of the republic, after the federal constitution had been abolished. Santa Anna was the head of that government, (if indeed he was not the government itself;) and the people were responsible for his acts, because they had submitted to his rule, and acquiesced in his authority. The government had no rightful existence, and no other authority than that which resulted from violence and power. It had extended its authority, by successful revolution, to the Rio Grande, and to that extent the people were bound by its acts. It had failed in two successive attempts to establish its power on this side of that river, and the evidence of that failure is to be found recorded in letters of blood in the treaty of San Jacinto, sealed with the seal of the government's captivity, and witnessed by the dead of more than one half of the revolutionary army. The failure of Mexico to conquer and reduce to subjugation, is conclusive evidence of the right of the inhabitants to govern themselves. This treaty is an acknowledgment of that right, and, as such, is good evidence of the independence and boundaries of the republic of Texas. I do not insist that the treaty conferred any new rights upon Texas, either in respect to her independence or limits; for they existed before the treaty was signed and independent of its provisions. Her inalienable right of independence resulted from the subversion of the constitutional government of the Mexican confederacy—the fact of independence, with the boundary of the Rio Grande, was evidenced by the total annihilation of every revolutionary army which had presumed to enter her territory, and the expulsion of every hostile foot from her soil. The treaty is a valid acknowledgment of both the right and the fact. It was entered into for a consideration, which, it is reasonable to suppose, was not only desirable, but invaluable to Mexico. The life of her Chief Magistrate, and the safety of thousands of her soldiers and officers, depended upon it, and were secured by it. In fact the whole conduct of the government of Mexico, from the date of that treaty through a long series of years, has clearly shown that she regarded the Rio Grande as the boundary of Texas: but claimed the right of reconquest, as she is pleased to term it, inasmuch as the treaty had not been ratified according to the forms of the constitution, which had been abolished nearly two years previous. Texas was permitted to remain in the undisturbed possession of the territory for years. Invasion and conquest were constantly threatened, but no attempt was ever made to carry the threat into execution by a regularly appointed army until the year 1842, six years after the battle and treaty of San Jacinto. In that year, Gen. Vascus ventured to cross the Rio Grande, and, by a rapid movement, succeeded, on the 6th of March, in reaching and plundering San Antonio. The Texans instantly seized their arms, and prepared to chastise and repulse the invaders. The result is thus recorded in Green's Mier expedition:

"A large number had already assembled under their certain leader, General Edward Burleson, always the first in the field and foremost in the fight. The enemy fled before them to THE RIO GRANDE, one hundred and fifty miles in retreat."

This was the end of the third regular invasion of Texas by Mexico. The invading army only escaped the fate of the two preceding ones by a hasty flight before the Texians across the Rio Grande. Now for the fourth and last invasion which Mexico ever attempted, unless, indeed, the marauding party under Canalles, which was promptly met and repulsed, is entitled to the dignity of that designation. About the 1st of September, 1842, Gen. Woll crossed the Rio Grande with his army, and by rapid marches took possession of San Antonio on the 11th of that month. A few days afterwards he succeeded in capturing and murdering a small party of Texans in the vicinity of that place. For the result of this invasion, I will invite the attention of the Senate to the passages which I will read from the work I have just quoted:

"After the above recital Bravard and his men [illegible] to the San Antonio road, by which [illegible] marched [illegible] and prepared [illegible] Gen. Woll [illegible] was readily assented upon, because [illegible] Mexican Main, and Mc[illegible] another, were raised in [illegible] to Rio Hondo [illegible] Woll [illegible] He rested at one [illegible] agree and send them [illegible] on each part. Much [illegible] the blame [illegible] this name that only [illegible] mischances in war, more the fault of accident, or the want of promptness, than the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] oil—only seek to cast [illegible]

Thus ended the fourth and last invasion of Texas by a regular army of Mexico. It seems [illegible] parties ever crossed the Rio Grande and approached the settlements, [illegible] before Hays and McCullough's Rangers, was more rapid than their original march. The repulse and retreat of Gen. Woll's army in the fall of 1842, again left Texas in the undisputed possession of her whole territorial limits, as defined in the treaty of San Jacinto and vindicated by her arms whenever invaded, since the date of Gen. Cos' expatriation in 1835. I have said that Hays and McCullough always held the marauding parties in check; and repulsed them whenever they invaded the country. On this point I will read a paragraph from the speech of Mr. Kauffman, of Texas, in the House of Representatives, on the 27th of June, 1846:

"Indeed, our Texas Rangers, under the gallant Hays and McCullough, for several years held undisputed sway over that territory, [the country between the Nueces and the Rio Grande] and exclusive [illegible] occupation of it. [illegible] and [illegible] of encroachment, constant and [illegible] No Mexican force had ever been known to [illegible] land on the left bank of the Rio Grande itself three miles from its mouth on that river, right!"

I am aware that I am accumulating evidence on this point, beyond what ought to be required to convince the most incredulous mind. Yet I must be permitted to call the attention of the Senate to one item more. I allude to the armistice which was concluded between the governments of Mexico and Texas, on the 15th of February, 1844, and the proclamation of Gen. Woll, announcing the re-opening of hostilities from and after the 11th of June, of that year. The hostilities which were re-opened existed only on paper, if we except the cruel and barbarous treatment of the Texan prisoners who had been unfortunate [illegible] to fall into the hands of the Mexicans in the previous campaigns. Gen. Woll, acting under the express orders of the Mexican government, at Mier, June 20th, 1844, issued an order or proclamation, of which the third section is as follows:

"3. Texas individual whatever [illegible] found [illegible] bank of the Rio Grande [illegible] will be [illegible] the EXPRESS ORDER THAT EACH CHIEF OR [illegible] country."

This order is important in two points of view: first, that while Mexico claimed the whole of Texas as her national territory, she at that time regarded and acknowledged the Rio Bravo, or Grande, as the boundary. She had previously declared an inhabitant of Texas rebels and traitors, who were to be put to immediate death, and by this order that sentence was applied to every person, whether Mexican or Texan, who should be found at the distance of three miles from the Rio Grande, upon the ground that the fact of being there was conclusive evidence that they favored the Texan cause. A Mexican might cross the river to the left bank, and save his life by showing that he was not a Texian, but if he went one league from the Rio Grande, death to the [illegible] no [illegible] explanation would be received. The next point upon which the order is important, is to be found in the fact of its express acknowledgement, that the Texans were in possession of the country:

"Every [illegible] who may be found at the distance of one league [illegible] Bank of the Rio Grande, will be considered a Texan and consequent of the [illegible] OF THAT PART OF THE NATIONAL TERRITORY."

It appears, then, that the Texans had usurped the territory on the left bank of Rio Bravo, or Grande. To usurp, according to Webster, is "to seize and hold in possession by force or without right." I have already disposed of the question as to the right of Texas "to seize and hold in possession by force" the country between the Nueces and the Rio Grande—and I am reinforced by the purpose that Mexico, in 1844, acknowledged the fact, that Texas had seized, and did then hold it in possession by force. I have now traced, with a minuteness which I fear has been tedious, every important fact [illegible] upon the question of boundary, since the submission of the federal constitution of 1824. In the examination of this subject my mind has been powerfully impressed by the circumstance, that in every occasion which Mexico has every modified the territory of Texas, the Rio Grande has been uniformly mentioned as the line which the army crossed, and beyond which it retreated whenever it was permitted to escape. The same may be said of the capitulations and treaties with the two captive armies. The Nueces is not even alluded to, nor can the name be found in any one of them. This circumstance is a powerful argument of itself, and is forced to make a deep impression upon the mind of every impartial man.

Having shown that Mexico has never held any portion of the country this side of the Rio Grande, (of course I speak of the lower Rio Grande,) since the subversion of the constitution of 1824, and that Texas has promptly repelled every invasion of her territory, I now propose to show that she has occupied and govefned it, by her civil institutions, during that whole period. I have already shown that every Mexican garrison, between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, as well as in all other portions of Texas, was reduced and captured in the fall of 1835—that the counties of San Patricio and Bexar were represented in the convention, which established the Provincial government in November '35, and also in the convention which declared the independence, and formed the constitution of the Republic of Texas in March '36—and that by that constitution, each of those counties constituted a congressional district, with the right of sending Representatives and Senators to the Congress of the Republic. I have referred also to the act of the Texian Congress of the 24th of May, '38, defining; with greater certainty, the dividing line between those counties from the Nueces to the Rio Grande, and confirming the surveys of land which had been made by the county surveyors of both respectively. On the 19th of December, 1836, the Congress of Texas passed an act defining the boundaries of the republic, and adopting those, designated in the treaty of San Jacinto. On the 4th of February, '42, an act was passed fixing the times of holding the higher courts in the counties of San Patricio and Bexar and for other purposes. On the 18th of January, '44, another act was passed regulating the times of holding courts in those counties, and on the 31st of December, '44, an act was passed changing the times of holding courts in those counties. On the 18th of January, '45, an act was passed removing the seat of justice of San Patricio county, to Corpus Christi, and providing for the appointment of a presiding judge of the county court. On the 1st of February, '45, an act providing for the re-survey of all the land in the counties of San Patricio, and Refugio, the title of which was derived from the Mexican government, or the state of Coahuila and Texas, and for returning the plats to the General Land Office of Texas. I have all these acts before me, but will not stop to read them, unless desired by some Senator. During the whole of the period from the establishment of the republic, these counties were represented in the Congress of Texas. They were also represented in the convention of the people of Texas, which agreed to the terms of annexation, and which formed the constitution of the State of Texas, with which she was admitted into our federal Union. I hold in my hand the present constitution of Texas—the same upon which our act of Congress was founded, admitting her into the Union, as a State, upon an equal footing with the original States, and, in the 30th section, of the 3d, article, I find that the county of San Patricio is constituted a Representative district, with one representative, and the county of Bexar, with two representatives; and in the 32d section of the same articles is the following provision: "the county of Bexar, the eighteenth district, shall elect one Senator. The counties of Goliad, Refugio, and San Patricio, the nineteenth district, shall elect one Senator."

The third section of the thirteenth article is as follows:

"[illegible] All the [illegible] of the Republic of Texas [illegible] to the United States, the said [illegible] Congress of the United States, the said [illegible] tion, shall continue and remain in force as the laws of this State, until they expire by [illegible]"

Now, sir, this provision ratifies and continues in force all the acts of the Texian Congress to which I have just read, and declares the Rio Grande to be its boundary, of the republic the act establishing the boundary lines of counties from the Nueces to the Rio Grande—the several acts providing for the surveys of lands and fixing the times of holding courts in those counties—all are confirmed by this section of the constitution. The Congress of the United States must be presumed to have been familiar with these laws and this section of the constitution, when the act was passed admitting her into the Union. This presumption is greatly strengthened by the fact, that within a few days after the admission of Texas, Congress passed an act extending our revenue laws over the territory of the State, and establishing a port of delivery, among other places, at Corpus Christi, in the county of San Patricio.

I have now concluded all I have to say on the question of boundary. Whether I have succeeded in establishing the boundary of the Rio Grande, is for the Senate and the country to judge. One thing is certain, Mexico never has disputed any other boundary than that of the Rio Grande or the Sabine. She was in possession of the country to the Rio Grande, and claimed the right to conquer to the Sabine. This was the position of Mexico towards Texas, as stated by herself, when the latter was annexed to this country and admitted into the Union.

The question now arises, who commenced the present war? The United States or Mexico? This seems to be a disputed point between the two great political parties in this country, although the governments of the two belligerent countries agree in relation to it. Our government has officially declared, in the form of a solemn law, all the departments concurring, that the war was commenced by "the act of Mexico." This is our statement of the question. Now for the Mexican side of the case as stated by her President, and Ministers of War and Foreign Affairs. I read from the President's annual message of December 8th, 1846.

"The apprehensions of a contemplated Mexican invasion have been since fully realized by the event. The determination of Mexico to push into hostilities with the United States was afterwards manifested from the whole tenor of the note of the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs to our minister, bearing date on the twelfth of March, 1846. Paredes had then revolutionized the government, and his minister, after referring to the resolution for the annexation of Texas, which had been passed by the two Houses of Congress in March, 1845, proceeds to declare that 'a fact such as this, so hostile, with greater exactness, so notable an act of usurpation, created an imperious necessity that Mexico, for her own honor, should repel it with proper firmness and dignity. The Supreme Government had beforehand declared that it would look upon such an act as a casus belli, and as a consequence of the declaration, repetatedly made, it had very recently, even, ordered measures for repelling force by force.' Measures, accordingly!

"It appears, also, that on the fourth of April following, General Paredes, through his minister of war, issued orders to the Mexican general in command on the Texan frontier to 'attack' our army 'by every means which war permits.' To this General Paredes had been pledged to the army and people of Mexico during the military revolution which had brought him into power. On the eighteenth of April, 1846, General Paredes addressed a letter to the commander of the Mexican army, which he stated to him, 'At the present date I suppose you at the head of that valiant army, either fighting already, or preparing for the operations of a campaign;' and 'supposing you already on the theatre of operations, and with all the forces assembled it is impossible that hostilities be commenced, more still taking the initiative against the enemy.'

Thus we find that the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs, on the 12th of March, 1846, notified our minister that "NEGOTIATIONS WAS, BY ITS VERY NATURE, AT AN END, and WAR WAS THE ONLY RECOURSE OF THE MEXICAN GOVERNMENT;" and that on the 18th day of April, 1846, the President of Mexico instructed the General of the Mexican army that it was "indispensable that hostilities be commenced, YOURSELF TAKING THE INITIATIVE AGAINST THE ENEMY." Mexico avows the act. It is her pride and boast that she commenced the war—that she took the "initiative" and struck the first blow. She made no complaint of General Taylor's march from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande. She knew nothing of that movement at the time she gave orders for the commencement of hostilities. Her complaint was, that our armies were stationed on the west side of the Sabine—that we had incorporated the country between the Sabine and the Rio Grande into our Union, and deprived her of the right which she claimed of re-conquest. This was her grievance, and for this grievance she boasted that she had the chivalry to take the initiative of the United States, and take the initiative. She knew nothing of the distinctions in the strength of her title on the one side or the other of the Nueces, until she found it explained in the speeches of American Senators. Those speeches are the foundation of her better title to the country west, than east of that river. Up to the commencement of this war, the name of the Nueces river cannot be found in any Mexican document—civil or military—addressed to this country, or the world, in which she claims a better, or any other title to that river, than to the Sabine. Her separate title to the Nueces is a whig title, originating in this country, and derived from whig newspapers and speeches, and adopted by the Mexican authorities, for the first time in the negotiation with Mr. Trist, "on the Chapultepec causeway." She now claims it, because she is told that it is hers; but she is unable to comprehend, much less explain, upon what principles her separate and better title rests. I repeat, that the Nueces line was manufactured in this country, for the purpose of erecting a platform, from which to assail the President of the United States, and, through him, the democratic party. The idea was conceived after the passage of the act of the 13th of May, 1846, recognizing "a state of war by the act of Mexico," and by gentlemen who voted for that law. Why did they not then tell us that the President had invaded the territory of Mexico in violation of the constitution of the United States, and instruct him to withdraw the army within the line of our rightful boundary, instead of furnishing ten millions of dollars, and fifty thousand men, to prosecute the invasion to the vitals of Mexico? I suppose the answer will be, if any answer shall be made, that they, at that time, were as ignorant as Mexico herself, of the existence of any better title, to the one side than the other of the Nueces.

But, there is a point more to which I wish to address a few remarks. It is strenuously insisted, here and elsewhere, that the letter of the Secretary of War, of the 13th of January, 1846, ordering General Taylor from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande, was the real cause of the war. Some go so far as to charge the President with giving the order for the purpose of producing war, while others, who are more charitable, content themselves with saying that it was an act so imprudent and reckless, that any man in his senses ought to have known that war would be the inevitable consequence. It often becomes necessary in military movements, on a theatre remote from the capital, to trust much to the superior local knowledge and discretion of the commanding general, in respect to the proper disposition of the forces under his command. Such was the case in this instance. General Taylor was put in full possession of the views of the government, in sending him to Texas, and left to select his own position. Those views were the defence of the western boundary of Texas from invasion, and the preservation of friendly relations with Mexico, if possible. He selected his position at Corpus Christi, and after remaining there several months, on the 4th of October, 1845, he wrote to the department as follows:

"I shall hesitate to suggest any considerations, in relation to the general position of our forces, and the disposition which it may become necessary for the more effectual prosecution of the objects for which he has been concentrated."

After a detailed exposition of the reasons for the recommendation which he was about to make, he proceeds as follows:

"For these reasons, our position thus far has, I think, been the best possible; but, now that the entire force will soon be concentrated, it may well be a question whether the views of government will be best carried out by our remaining at this point. It is with great diffidence that I make any suggestion on topics which may become important delicate in negotiation, but from government, in settling the question of boundary, makes the line of the Rio Grande as a maximum, I cannot doubt that the settlement will be greatly facilitated and hastened by our taking possession at once of one or more suitable points on, or quite near that river." Our strength and state of preparation should be displayed in a manner not to be mistaken. However salutary may be the effect produced upon the border people by our presence here, we are too far from the frontier to impress the government of Mexico with our readiness to vindicate, by force of arms, if necessary, our title to the country as far as the Rio Grande. The "army of occupation" will, in a few days, be concentrated at this point, in condition for vigorous and efficient service. Mexico having as yet made no positive declaration of war, or committed any overt act of hostilities, I do not feel at liberty, under any instructions, particularly those of July 8, to make a forward movement to the Rio Grande on my own responsibility. I shall, therefore, await the further views of the War Department."

These are the recommendations of General Taylor. "I cannot doubt that the settlement will be greatly facilitated and hastened by our taking possession at once of one or two suitable points on, or quite near that river," the Rio Grande. "I do not feel at liberty, under my instructions, particularly those of the 8th of July, to make a forward movement to the Rio Grande, without authority from the War Department." The commanding general on the theatre of action. He had better opportunities of knowing the movements, intentions, and feelings of the Mexicans than any one else. He had previously, July 20, 1845, given the department this assurance: "and the department may rest assured that I will take no step to interrupt the friendly relations between the United States and Mexico." Relying upon the faith of this assurance, and upon his better means of information, the department complied with his request, and gave him the desired order "for a forward movement to the Rio Grande." General Taylor had recommended it as a peace-measure, calculated to facilitate and hasten the settlement of the boundary question, and in that view, and on that recommendation, the order was given. It is clear, therefore, that General Taylor, and he alone, is responsible for that order. If it was right and wise, his is the merit; and if it was wrong, he ought—as I have no doubt, he is perfectly willing—to take the responsibility. I have no doubt, that the order was an act of policy and wisdom—nay, of necessity.

But, sir, who are the men that condemn this order, and for what purpose is the condemnation made at this time? They are the professed advocates of the election of General Taylor to the Presidency, and the order is condemned for the purpose of making political capital for themselves and their candidate, against the democratic party. Under the influence of the same patriotic motives, it has suddenly been discovered by a portion of those who voted for the war, that it was unjust, unnecessary, and unconstitutional. They can see no hope of rescuing the ship of state from the hands of the wicked rulers who are directing its course, except by the elevation to the Presidency of a man, whose very name has been introduced to the knowledge of the civilized world only by his extraordinary success in shedding human blood in an unjust cause. By denouncing the war as a scheme of rapine and robbery, they, in effect, charge Generals Taylor and Scott, and all the officers and men under their command, with being a band of successful robbers, murderers, and pirates, whose only titles to the gratitude of their countrymen is derived from a series of unparalleled triumphs in violation of the constitution of their country, over a weak and an unoffending people. Should it hereafter be to us a matter of surprise to hear all Europe, whose jealousy has been aroused by our growing greatness and importance among the nations of the world, denounce us a nation of robbers and pirates, when they can refer to the speeches of American Senators for the truth and justice of their statements? Suppose gentlemen succeed in making the world believe that the war in which we are engaged, and which has been sanctioned by the nation according to all the forms and solemnities known to the constitution, is unnecessary and unjust—a war of rapine and robbery—their only triumph, of which they can boast, will be that they have rendered the name and the fame of their country infamous in the eyes of christendom. Whose heart did not swell and pulsate with patriotic pride as he heard the shout of the glorious victories achieved by our countrymen wafted from the plains and mountains of Mexico, striking terror to the hearts of all enemies of republican institutions, and demonstrating that ours is the first military, as well as civil power, upon the globe? Sir, I shall never forget the proud and grateful emotions of my own breast, when the response was heard from all parts of the Union to the call for volunteers in the summer of 1846, showing that more than three hundred thousand had tendered their services, when only fifty thousand could be received. Was that response prompted by a love of plunder and robbery—or was it a patriotic response from the hearts of freemen, burning with a fervent desire to avenge their country's wrongs and vindicate her rights. Shall it be said that in Republican America the only sentiment which can animate and arouse the whole people—which can quell partizan strife and obliterate party distinction, for a time—is an insatiable lust for rapine and robbery, upon our unoffending and unfortunate neighbors? Such must be the fruits of the victory, if gentlemen triumph in the efforts they are now making in regard to this war. All the emotions of my heart and the feelings of my nature revolt at the idea. National and State pride rebels at the thought. My own State has sent nearly seven thousand men to this war, and has offered up more lives upon the field of battle, and sacrificed more by the diseases of the country, than any other State in the Union. Their patriotic deeds of noble daring have shed honor upon the State, as well as glory upon the American arms. I feel grateful to them—the living and the dead—for the services they have rendered and the renown they have won. Every other State has had its share in the glory of this war. If they have not furnished as many men, it was because the government declined to receive them. All have done their duty, and all ought to feel proud of their achievements.

Mr. BELL took the floor.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1848.

PRESIDENT PRO TEM.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent:

On motion by Mr. BENTON, seconded by Mr. MANGUM, it was Resolved, That [illegible] appointed President of the Senate pro tempore.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE LEGISLATURE OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. JOHNSON, of La., presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of that State, in favor of the passage of a law granting a portion of public lands to each of the officers and soldiers, or their legal representatives, who served, or may serve in the war with Mexico; which was read, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a resolution of the said Legislature, in favor of the passage of an act to indemnify citizens of the United States, for losses by French spoliations prior to 1800; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Also, resolutions of the said Legislature, in favor of the passage of a law authorizing the State of Louisiana to select other school land in lieu of such as are unfit for cultivation; which were read, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a memorial of the said Legislature, praying an enlargement of the powers of said Legislature, in reference to the selection and disposition of the 16th sections or school lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MEXICAN SPOLIATIONS.

In presenting the memorial of Philo B. Johnson, praying indemnity for injuries to his person and property, committed by Mexican citizens,

Mr. NILES said that though the memorial went somewhat into detail, yet he should request that it be read. He would state briefly the substance of it. The memorialist was one of the claimants for spoliations by the Mexican government. He had been subjected to gross outrages in the year 1831, at or near Tobasco. He was an old sea-captain, now a resident of New York, but a native of the State which he (Mr. N.) represented. His whole life had been spent on the high seas, and having, unfortunately, lost all his property, has presented himself as a claimant for redress on account of the injuries which he had sustained at the hands of the lawless agents of the Mexican government. The subject had some bearing on the great question before that body and the country, in regard to the character of claims of citizens of the United States against Mexico, of which they heard so much. It would seem to be admitted on all hands that it has become the duty of this government to take care of those who had just and honest claims against Mexico. This question had become one of some importance in relation to the present war with Mexico. It was in part, perhaps, an especial part of the indemnity claimed from Mexico. It had been contended, however, amongst others, by an honorable and distinguished gentleman, who had written a pamphlet on the subject, and who had been in office under this government, that these claims, being merely a debt, could not, according to the usages of nations, be made the subject of a war, or even, if he (Mr. N.) was not mistaken, enter into the considerations connected with the existing state of war. Now, these transactions took place years ago. The public mind was not, perhaps, much informed on the subject. But these claims had been in parcted upon—so far, at least, as they had come under the adjudication of the Convention to which they were referred, and whether they had or had not assumed the shape and form of debts; in their original character they were not debts—not at all. Of course, by the law of nations, they could not interfere to provide for the settlement of a debt which any citizen of the United States might have against the government of Mexico, that did not come within the province of the government. But these were claims arising under our treaties with Mexico, and under the laws of nations, for spoliations on our commerce, and for the robbery and plunder of the property of our citizens, who were doing business in Mexico—thus involving the grossest violation of our flag. The present was one of those cases; the vessel in charge of the memorialist was violently seized and taken possession of. He was himself violently seized, put in the stocks, and incarcerated in a prison. He was compelled, at the point of the bayonet, to carry in his own vessel a military force to aid in the civil wars of the country, first by one party, and then by the other. This was a fair sample of the general character of these claims. They arose from violence, from spoliation, from a gross disregard of the sober obligations of national law. Every one of these claims afforded in itself, distinctly considered, if not promptly met and redressed, a justifiable cause of war. He did not say that this war arose from these claims at all, but he did say, that this case and others showed that the conduct of the Mexican government, towards the United States, had been not only unfriendly, but had been marked by every species of injustice, violence, and rapacity, unexampled in the commercial intercourse of any people, making the slightest claim to civilization. It was not necessary to say anything more on the subject, as the memorialist asked that his story of wrongs might be read; he would conclude by moving that it be read.

The memorial having been read, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

CADETS.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause the Senate to be informed of the order, or law, by virtue of which the following words in relation to the promotion of Cadets have been inserted in the Army Register of the United States, page 15, for the year 1847:

"Cadets acting as supernumerary officers in the army, in virtue of their brevet, will be successively promoted to vacancies of the lowest grade which may first happen in the particular arm to which they may have been attached, according to the order of rank established at the military academy."

LIGHTING THE CAPITOL.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Public Buildings, reported a bill to pay James Crutchett two thousand dollars for lighting the Capitol and Capitol Grounds; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HUNTER asked the unanimous consent of the Senate, that the bill might have a second reading now.

Mr. NILES objected to the second reading, pronouncing the plan by which the Capitol grounds were lighted to be a humbug.

After an explanation by Mr. HUNTER that the bill was merely to meet a present emergency, Mr. NILES withdrew his objection, and said that he should defer what he wished to say until the subject should come up on its merits.

The bill was then read a second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

BRIG DOUGLASS.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of A. A. Frazier, for himself and Alvin Baker, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the memorial of A. A. Frazier, for himself and Alvin Baker, owners of the brig Douglass, praying indemnity for the losses caused by the alleged wrongful seizure by a British cruiser, be referred to the Secretary of State; and that the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate the originals, or copies of all depositions and other documents and papers in his department relating to said case; and likewise such correspondence as may have been had with the British government, or its officers, and our own, in relation thereto, which, in his opinion, may be made public consistent with the public interests; and that the Secretary of State do also make a report on said claims presented to his department.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph De La Francia, submitted a report accompanied by a bill supplementary to "An act to authorize the Secretary of State to liquidate certain claims therein mentioned," passed the 18th of April, 1814.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the same Committee, to whom was referred the petition of I. Bigelow, administrator on the estate of Francois Cazeau, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Francois Cazeau, late merchant at Montreal.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the same Committee, to whom was referred the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make an arrangement or compromise with Mangle M. Quackenbosse and his co-obligors, or any of them, for claims or bonds given by them as sureties to the United States, reported it without amendment.

PENSIONS TO THE ORDNANCE CORPS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Miss., said that, under existing laws, the enlisted men of the ordnance corps were exempted from the benefit of the pensions allowed to men wounded and disabled in the service of the United States. The attention of the Military Committee had been drawn to the fact, and he was instructed to report a bill to meet the case. Before introducing it, he would merely remark, that he supposed that the exemption in the original law resulted from the fact, that these men were enlisted under the title of "artificers, armorers, and master workmen," though regularly enlisted as soldiers, and liable to serve in the field. In their appropriate employment as artillerists they were exposed to more hazard than any other branch of the service. They were exposed to many accidents and casualties from the explosion of the combustible materials which they handled. They were also used in battle, generally in all siege trains, and were placed in charge of the artillery accompanying great marching armies. They had been used in this war in working rocket and howitzer batteries, and he had before him a statement relative to a single company engaged in working a mountain howitzer in Mexico, which in successive battles in the valley of Mexico, lost out of the one hundred and twenty men of which it was composed, in killed and wounded, twenty-three men, five killed and eighteen wounded. Some of the wounded men were totally disabled and had not been discharged, because no pension provision had been made for them; and if discharged, their disability from wounds received in battle, rendering them unable to obtain subsistence, they would have been thrown upon the charity of the country. In view of these considerations the present bill had been prepared, and was presented with a request, that by unanimous consent of the Senate, it should be passed to-day, or as soon as the Senate thought proper.

The said bill was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass; and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of La., from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of Francis O. Dorr and Andrew C. Dorr, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL COURT IN TEXAS.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to establish an additional District Court of the United States in the State of Texas, reported it without amendment.

DECISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas, Cowperthwaite & Co., reported a bill providing for the purchase and distribution of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States among the several States and Territories; which was read and passed to the second reading.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill entitled "An act to confirm the boundary between Missouri and Arkansas;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

TEN REGIMENT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.

Mr. BELL.—Mr. President: I believe it is in bad taste to offer any apology for addressing the Senate on the ground of feeble health or of inadequate preparation, or for any other cause. Every gentleman is at liberty to speak or be silent, as he may determine for himself. I will, therefore, make none for the remarks I propose to submit, although they may not be characterized by much novelty. But this is a question of such unusual importance that I think some allowance may be made for gentlemen, although they may fail to offer any thing fresh or interesting after a discussion so long continued and with such ability on both sides of the chamber; indeed, upon a subject presenting so wide a field for debate, and so rich and varied in its topics as the present, it must be the fault of the speaker if he can offer nothing somewhat new.

This is a question, sir, on which I could not feel justified in maintaining silence. I cannot say with the Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. BADGER,) that had this measure been permitted to pass without debate or a division by ayes and noes, I would have been content without expressing my views upon it. I feel bound to pursue a different course for several reasons. This is a question upon which the public mind is peculiarly sensitive.
